

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

TUNIS—CESSION OF ESPARTO GRASS DISTRICTS.

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

EARL DE LA WARR rose to ask the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs,
If a copy of the Concession to M. René Duplessis of the Esparto fibre districts in the Regency of Tunis between Sfax and the Tripolitan frontier can be laid upon the Table of the House; also any correspondence which may have taken place on the subject? The noble Earl observed that, although, perhaps, it might not be correct to say in so many words, as did the late Prime Minister of France,

M. Gambetta, that England had "recognized the Bardo Treaty," which had been obtained from the Bey of Tunis by France, he feared that facts of almost daily occurrence proved that, in practice, it was so. The instance to which he was about to refer, and the Papers which he was about to ask the noble Earl opposite to lay upon the Table of the House, formed, he might say, a convincing proof of the position occupied by this country at the present time as regarded trade and commerce. It appeared that a concession for a considerable number of years of the principal Esparto grass districts in the Regency of Tunis had been granted to a French house under the name of M. René Duplessis. The districts granted, as he was informed, comprised all the best parts of the country, and those which remained were comparatively unimportant. It appeared that the British trade in Esparto grass, recently discovered as being of great value in the manufacture of paper, had been of considerable importance; and in the Return of 1880 the quantity exported from Tunis and Tripoli to Great Britain amounted in value to £477,000. Now, it was quite clear that if what was virtually a monopoly had been established in favour of a French house, British merchants would be placed at a considerable disadvantage, and the Treaty of 1875 between this country and Tunis, so highly favourable to British trade, practically became of no effect. He would remind their Lordships that since the late unhappy events in Tunis, not only had they to regret the loss of that close and ancient alliance which had for so many years existed between this country and the Beys of Tunis, and which the present Bey had so earnestly desired to maintain, and which the Governments of Lord Palmerston and Lord Russell were so careful to uphold, but also there were now in the Regency of Tunis not fewer than 10,000 British subjects who would severely suffer unless more protection was afforded them than had hitherto been given since the occupation of the country by the French. He would now beg to ask the noble Earl the Question of which he had given Notice.

EARL GRANVILLE: In answer to the Question of the noble Earl, I have to state that Her Majesty's Government have received a telegraphic communication, but no copy of the concession has been referred to. It would not be convenient to lay upon the Table any of the correspondence relating to this matter, as communications are taking place with the French Government.

REPRESENTATIVE PEERS OF IRELAND. RESOLUTION.

THE EARL OF BELMORE moved
"That the Clerk of the Crown and do make a return of the dates of the issue of writs for the election of all Representatives of Ireland who have been elected since 1850; and also of the dates of the receipt of the latest return in each case which has been sent in to the Hanaper Office in obedience to the writs."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR understood to suggest an amendment to the Motion, by adding, after "Has been made," the words "in Ireland."

Motion, as amended, agreed to House adjourned at half past Ten o'clock, till To-morrow.

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND JUSTICE — CASES OF SUSPECTED POISONING.

MR. ST. AUBYN asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether, in cases of suspected poisoning, when an analysis is directed to be made, he would consider whether it would not be more satisfactory if the suspected persons should have an opportunity of being represented personally at such analysis?

Earl De La Warr

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I have considered this matter, and am clearly of opinion that it never would do to allow a delicate process of this kind to be conducted by a combination of persons, who might be acting in adverse interests, and thus defeat the object of the experiments, which are necessarily delicate. I quite understand the sentiment, that the persons who carry out the experiments should not be appointed by the Crown, so as to be considered parties in the prosecution. Therefore, I propose to ask the Presidents of the College of Surgeons and of the College of Physicians yearly to appoint two independent, experienced men of science to refer to in cases of this kind for the purposes of performing these experiments. That would secure what we want—namely, undisturbed action of impartial persons. In making this statement, I wish it distinctly to be understood that there is no hesitation whatever as to the entire ability and impartiality of the persons who have hitherto been employed by the Crown.

TURKEY (ALBANIA)—THE DEATH OF CAPTAIN SELBY.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, with reference to the unfortunate circumstances that resulted in the death of Captain Selby at the hands of an Albanian shepherd, Whether he will take any action on the following passage in Lord Dufferin's letter to Earl Granville, as printed in the Parliamentary Paper just issued,

"In talking over the matter with Mr. Wrench (Her Majesty's Consul at Constantinople) and with Hobart Pasha, who has often shot over the locality where the attack was made, I am inclined to think the Albanians were irritated at their flocks being disturbed by the noise of the guns and by the dogs of the shooting party ;"

and, whether he will inquire if any application was made to the Albanians for leave to shoot over their land; and, if it should be found that no such application was made, and that the shooting party were consequently there as trespassers, whether he will ask the Turkish Government to deal leniently with the Albanian shepherds, who are charged with having taken part in the attack?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Her Majesty's Government do not propose to take any action on the passage quoted by the hon. Member. They are informed that there is no law in Turkey by which the owner of land can prevent persons from walking or shooting over his property unless it is surrounded by a wall or fence; and that the plea of trespass has not been raised at the trial of the persons implicated in the assault on Captain Selby, which is being conducted very correctly and without pressure from Her Majesty's Embassy. The locality where the assault took place is stated to have been frequently visited by sportsmen, and on the previous day the party were assisted in their search for game by some of the shepherds. It would, in the opinion of Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople, who has been consulted on the point, be altogether premature to address the Turkish Government in reference to the shepherds now undergoing their trial.

POST OFFICE—PARCELS POST.

MR. MONK asked the Postmaster General, Whether he is now in a position to state the intentions of the Government with respect to the introduction of a Parcels Post into this Country?

MR. FAWCETT: When my hon. Friend asked me a Question on this subject at the beginning of the Session, I stated that I was about shortly to submit certain proposals to the Treasury for the establishment of a parcels post. These proposals have now been sanctioned by the Treasury, and the House may, I think, be interested to hear their character. It is proposed that parcels should be posted at any post-office of the United Kingdom where letters are received, and that, the postage being prepaid, they should be delivered free of further charge wherever letters are delivered. The maximum weight will be 7 lbs., for which the proposed charge will be 1s., less rates of postage being charged for parcels of lower weight. If this inland parcels post is established, it will immediately be linked with the international parcels post which is now in operation. This will enable parcels to be posted from any part of the United Kingdom to every other country in Europe except Russia, and to Egypt and Asiatic Turkey. I will not trouble the House by giving details of the rates of this international parcels post; but I may state, as an illustration, that if our arrangements are carried out, a parcel not exceeding three kilogrammes (about 6½ lbs.) in weight may be posted from any part of the United Kingdom to any part of France for a charge which cannot exceed 1s. 9d. I believe great advantages will result to the entire community from the establishment of a parcels post; and I am glad to think that the rural districts will largely participate in these advantages, because, at the present time, if it be desired to send a parcel to some village away from a railway station, it is often impossible to ascertain beforehand when the parcel will arrive, and how much the person who receives it will have to pay for its delivery. I will only further add that steps have been already taken to put the Post Office in communication with the Railway Companies, with the object of giving effect to the scheme. It will be obvious to the House that time will be required to complete the necessary arrangements for introducing so important an extension of the present postal system as a parcels post. I will, however, give an assurance that no effort shall be wanting on the part of the Post Office to bring the scheme into operation with the least practicable delay.

INDIA (FINANCE, &c.)—IMPORT DUTIES ON INDIAN PRODUCTS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, in consideration of the recent abolition of Indian Import Duties on English cottons, the Government of India will urge upon the Home Government the propriety of reciprocally acting up to the principles of free trade, and abolishing the English Import Duties upon Indian tea, coffee, and other products?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: I should be very glad, in the interest of the British consumer as well as of the Indian producer, if the Government could remove the duties, not only on Indian, but on all tea, coffee, and similar products. But I cannot admit that the fact that the Indian Government have been able to remit duties to the amount of more than £1,000,000 which pressed on the Indian consumer is any reason why I should ask the Government to reduce duties on Indian tea and coffee which are still levied on those articles coming from other countries and Colonies, and thus to establish a system of protection in favour of India.

MR. O'DONNELL gave Notice that, on an early day, he would call attention to the duties levied in this country on Indian products, and also to the manner in which Chinese tea was admitted duty free into India, while Indian tea was taxed on its admission to this country.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MICHAEL CONOLLY.

MR. O'DONNELL asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he will consider the case of Mr. Michael Conolly, farmer, near Athenry, who has been confined as a suspect, in Galway Gaol, since 9th July 1881, although the suspects arrested on the same day and same charge have been liberated four months ago; and, whether he has been informed that the continued imprisonment of Mr. Conolly will result in extreme loss or ruin to his family, who depend on him for the management of the farm?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): Before the hon. Member placed this question on the Paper, Mr. Conolly's case had been re-considered by the Lord Lieutenant pursuant to the Statute, and his release ordered.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—TREATMENT OF PERSONS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT—GALWAY GAOL.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, What accommodation is afforded to the suspects in Galway Gaol for association; whether it is true that the suspects complained of the accommodation, and asked to be allowed to remain in the open air during the two hours of association; whether the medical officer of the gaol made any representation to the Prisons Board on the unsuitableness of the association rooms; and, whether any notice has been taken of the complaint of the suspects or the representations of the medical officer?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): In reply to the hon. Member's first inquiry, I am informed that persons detained under the Protection Act in Galway Prison have the following accommodation for association—namely, three rooms, a large covered shed, and two exercise yards, in each of which is a ball alley. As to the rest of the Question, I am informed by the Prisons Board that no such complaint or application was made. The prison was inspected on Friday last, and no complaint was then made of the arrangement.

Mr. Fawcett

Mr. SEXTON inquired, if there was not a certain portion of the day when those places could not be utilized?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, that was not an inquiry as to a fact which he could answer without Notice.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—THE CORK GRAND JURY.

Mr. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the report of the proceedings of the Cork Grand Jury, in the "Cork Herald" of 17th instant, in the matter of Hayes' claim of £80 for malicious injury, in which the conduct of Captain Somerville is impugned, Mr. Barry having said he was not very well satisfied with the malice:

"Mr. Dunlea said that where a grand juror had said that he did not consider the injury very malicious, he would ask that his evidence as to the value should be heard. Captain Somerville—If you interfere any further we will make it £80. Mr. Dunlea—Well, if a grand juror chooses to hold out a threat of that kind to an attorney who appears here in the interests of the public, the Grand Jury can now do what they like in the matter; I will retire from it. The Grand Jury then passed the sum of £54 compensation for the injuries done, the amount to be levied off the parish; "

whether it is the fact that grand jurors have to pay none of the money they thus vote away; that the Presentment Sessions only passed £10, where the Grand Jury gave £54; if the Government can hold out any hope that the tax-paying classes in Ireland may speedily expect to see the present Grand Jury system exchanged for representative County Boards; whether his attention has been drawn to the report of a case in the same paper, which imputes improper language to Captain Somerville, J.P. in addressing a witness; and, if the reports are substantially true, whether the Government intend to retain, in the Commission of the Peace, a magistrate who has spoken and acted as Captain Somerville has done in these two cases?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): I have seen the report in The Cork Herald. It is not the fact that a grand juror does not pay county cess. Each barony in the county must be represented on the Grand Jury by a freeholder to the yearly value of £50, or leaseholder to the yearly value of £100 over the rent, and must be resident in the barony. He pays the entire county cess on all land in his own hands, and when not excluded by express contract, half the county cess of all his agricultural tenancies created since the 1st of August, 1870. Hayes, who is referred to in the Question of the hon. Member, was what is, unhappily, known as a "Boycotted" farmer. He had a well-bred mare, nearly three years old, which was maliciously stabbed. The presentment sessions found that the outrage was malicious, and assessed the value of the animal at £10, which was increased by the Grand Jury to £54. This presentment has been traversed, and the traverse will be tried by a jury before the Judge of Assize. While the Grand Jury were discussing the amount, the solicitor for the ratepayers interrupted, and Captain Somerville, one of the grand jurors, is reported to have said—"If you interfere any further we will make it £80." Of course, neither that nor another observation referred to in the Question was seriously meant, and might just as well not have been noticed. As to the last paragraph in the hon. Member's Question, it is the Lord Chancellor, and not the Government, who appoints and removes county magistrates in Ireland. The inquiry whether it may be expected that the Grand Jury system will be speedily changed for County Boards should, I apprehend, be addressed to the Prime Minister.

Mr. HEALY asked, whether it was a fact that the expression used by Captain Somerville was so indecent that the Clerk at the Table would not put it upon the Paper; and, whether, if that was the fact, it was necessary to ask the Lord Chancellor to remove Captain Somerville's name from the list of magistrates?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he was not acting as a magistrate on this occasion, but in the capacity of a grand juror discharging fiscal duties. He thought an expression of this kind should not be used at all; but he scarcely knew whether it was more improper to use it than to have it noticed in the papers.

MR. SEXTON asked, was it for any act of his, as a magistrate, that Mr. Parnell had been removed from the Commission of the Peace?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he did not know; but as there was a warrant for treasonable practices against the hon. Member for Cork City, it was impossible for him to remain upon the Commission of the Peace.

MR. SEXTON: Suspicion.

MR. HEALY gave Notice that he would ask the Attorney General for Ireland, at an early date, whether the Government had any intention of removing Captain Somerville from the Commission of the Peace?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he might as well answer the Question at once. The Government did not intend to take action in the matter. Anyone who thought fit could put the Lord Chancellor in motion on the subject.

CROWN RENTS (IRELAND).

MR. GIBSON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If he has given instructions not to press the landlords, whose rents have been withheld, for immediate payment of quit and Crown rent; and, whether he is aware that the collector of quit-rent in Wexford has refused to make any such allowance, and has intimated that he will take proceedings for quit-rent in arrear, including that due on the 25th March, if not then paid?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Where the persons liable for quit rent in Ireland have given satisfactory evidence of inability to pay, or have tendered a portion of the arrears due, the time for payment has been extended. But in cases where more than two years' arrears were due, and where, after repeated applications for payment, no satisfactory explanation of the default has been given, and also in cases where the Crown claim is disputed, instructions have been given for the recovery of the amount due. Nothing is known at the Office of Woods of the case in Wexford referred to in the Question; but if the right hon. and learned Gentleman will supply me with particulars, I will have immediate inquiry made.

MR. O'DONNELL asked, whether the Government would make this conditional on landlords ceasing to press for immediate payment of rents from tenants whose rents were exorbitant?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH wished for Notice of the Question.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked, whether the Government had not asked for these rents until they were at least two years due?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, in certain cases where the landlords were not able to pay, in consequence of their own rents not being paid, such a course was adopted.

STATE OF IRELAND—TIPPERARY— CONDUCT OF THE POLICE.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is true that on or about the 11th instant, Constable Kennedy, and a party of the Royal Irish Constabulary stationed in the town of Tipperary, tore down a number of placards calling upon the ratepayers of the local electoral divisions to vote for the popular candidates for the office of poor law guardians; whether the Executive justify the conduct of the police; and, if not, whether they will take any steps to prevent a recurrence of it; whether, on the same day, Constable Kennedy stopped in the streets of Tipperary, a man who was distributing the placards in question, deprived him of all the placards in his possession, and took his name; and, whether the police were justified in thus confiscating private property, and what charge, if any, can be made against the man who was engaged in distributing the placards?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The hon. Member now asks me as to the contents of the placards referred to in his Question; but as I have not seen the placard I am unable to answer the Question with which he now supplements his Question in the Paper. My reply to that Question is that anonymous inflammatory placards to intimidate voters for Poor Law Guardians having been posted up in the town of Tipperary were removed by the Constabulary, as was their duty. They also took similar placards from a bill-man who was distributing them, and they have summoned him. I should add that on the hearing of that summons the contents of the placards will be considered by the magistrates.

MR. SEXTON said, that in consequence of the answer he had received, he would take the earliest opportunity of calling attention to the outrage perpetrated by the police on this occasion.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION — ESTATE OF MR. TALBOT-CROSBIE.

MR. SEXTON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, if he can state why the cases of the tenants of Mr. William Talbot Crosbie, of Ardfert Abbey, county Kerry, whose rents were not increased in 1880, are not listed for hearing at the second sitting of the Sub-commission at Tralee, although the originating notices were served in the first week of last November; whether it is true that, after the service of the originating notices, the landlord changed his name from William Talbot Crosbie to William Talbot Crosbie Talbot, with the object of placing the cases lower in alphabetical order than they otherwise would have been, and thus postponing their hearing for a considerable time; whether he is aware that, at the opening of the Sub-Commission at Tralee, on the 14th of last December, a local solicitor, concerned for a large number of tenants, complained that the case of one of his clients, of whom Mr. Crosbie was the landlord, had been wrongfully removed from the position it occupied at the beginning of the list, and placed at the end, without any intimation to the tenant of its removal, and of the consequent impossibility of having it heard for more than a year, although the landlord must have been aware that the tenant had incurred considerable expense in preparing his case for trial at that sitting; and, whether the solicitor publicly charged Mr. Denis Godley, the secretary to the Land Commission, with having acted in collusion with Mr. Talbot Crosbie, to whom he was known, in effecting this alteration in the position of the case as it originally stood upon the list?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): I am sorry that my reply to this long Question will be very long. In reply to the first inquiry, I have to state that the cases are sent to the Sub-Commission for trial in the order of their receipt in the Land Commission Office, and for this reason the cases of Mr. Talbot-Crosbie's tenants could not have been listed for hearing without taking them out of their turn. As to the second and third inquiries in this Question, I am informed that one case of Mr. Talbot-Crosbie was placed in the list under the letter "C;" but that, on his representation that his surname was Talbot-Crosbie, and not Crosbie.—[MR. SEXTON: Talbot-Crosbie Talbot.] I am informed it is Talbot-Crosbie, and for this reason the case was removed to the letter "T." No delay, however, was thus occasioned beyond that involved in the adjournment from Tralee to Killarney, which was one week. The solicitor for the tenants, it is true, objected to the change; but as notice of the alteration had issued, the Land Commission declined to make further change. As to the rest of the Question, I understand that, according to the newspaper report of the proceedings, the tenants' solicitor charged Mr. Godley with having been in collusion with Mr. Talbot-Crosbie. Of course, there was nothing in it, and the newspaper also reports that the same solicitor withdrew the charge, which shows it ought not to have been made.

MR. O'DONNELL: Am I to understand from the right hon. and learned Gentleman that the Land Courts take the cases, not in the order of priority of application, but in the order of the alphabetical position of landlords' names?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): I suppose the hon. Member refers to the Sub-Commissioners. If so, the Sub-Commissioners take the cases in the order in which they are sent down by the Land Commissioners.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881.—TREATMENT OF PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following statement in the "Galway Observer" of Saturday March 18th:—

"On Sunday night last the chief warder, when going his rounds, found an empty pipe in the cell of Mr. Lydon, a highly respectable and independent merchant from Ballaghadereen, county Mayo. Although he explained satisfactorily how it came by being there, not for the purpose of smoking through, which he can swear on oath, he was taken next morning before the Governor, and sentenced to six days' solitary confinement, deprivations of visits, and refusals of all communications to or from friends, no matter how urgent his business. Already he is undergoing this sentence, which will not expire until Saturday next;"

whether he has also seen other statements in the same paper of alleged arbitrary and unjust treatment of suspects; and, whether he will order an inquiry to be made as to the truth of these allegations?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The same inquiry was made by the junior Member for County Galway some days ago. I have not yet received a reply to the Question which he put; and I must ask the hon. Member to postpone this Question.

THE JUDICATURE ACT—THE NEW RULES OF PROCEDURE.

MR. GREGORY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether, having regard to the importance of the new Rules of Procedure which are under the consideration of a Committee of Judges, and the alteration which they will effect in the administration of the Law, provision can be made for suspending the operation of them until there has been an opportunity for the consideration of them by this House?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he was in communication with the Lord Chancellor on the subject, and he understood from him that no new Rules had yet been made, although the Judges had held meetings and passed resolutions upon which Rules would be framed. The only provision to meet the case referred to in the latter part of the Question was contained in the 25th section of the Judicature Act.

INDIA—THE INDIAN COUNCIL—THE VACANCY.

MR. ONSLOW asked the Secretary of State for India, If he could state to the House the reasons why the vacancy in the Indian Council, caused by the retirement of Sir Erskine Perry some months ago, has not been filled up; and, whether he has considered the suggestion that the Government of India could be just as well administered if there were no further addition made to the number of Councillors at present existing?

Mr. Justin M'Carthy

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, in reply, said, that he had stated, in answer to a Question the other day, that he did not think it desirable, and that the House would not consider it necessary, that he should enter into an explanation of the reasons why there had been a delay in filling up the resignation of Sir Erskine Perry. He could only repeat that the appointment would be shortly made, and he hoped within a few days. With reference to the latter part of the Question, he did not know by whom the suggestion had been made, nor did he think it necessary to state whether the number of 15 was absolutely necessary for conducting the affairs of the Government of India. The hon. Member must be aware that the number had been fixed by Act of Parliament, and he had no power to alter it.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT — EDUCATION GRANTS UNDER THE NEW CODE.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked the Vice President of the Council, If he can give any estimate as to what the rate of grant paid per average attendance will be under the new Code; and, whether he thinks it will exceed or be less than the sixteen shillings estimated by the Education Office to be the sum earned this year under the present Code?

MR. MUNDELLA: The net earnings for 1880-1, ending the 31st of August last, were 15s. 8½d. per day scholar in average attendance. Up to the close of the present financial year the grant will average 15s. 10d. per scholar; and in preparing the Estimates for 1882-3, we have calculated for a further increase of 2d. per head, raising the grant to 16s. We have examined more than 200 schools of every description simultaneously under the new and the existing Codes, and it gave a result of about 2d. per head in favour of the schools examined under the new Code. But as the new Code is based on average attendance, it is quite possible that the ratio of average attendance to the number on the books may be considerably increased. This will, no doubt, be the case if managers are better supported by School Boards, School Attendance Committees, and the magistrates. In that event, the attendance of the children and the amount of the grants will be proportionately increased. As the noble Lord is aware, increased encouragement is given under the new Code for better teaching in infant schools and night schools.

ARMY ENLISTMENT—RE-ENGAGEMENTS.

COLONEL COLTHURST asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he case of private soldiers who enlisted prior to the 8th August 1870, and under the conditions laid down in the Act of 1867 for twelve years, and who are now desirous of re-engaging to complete twenty-one years' service, will be taken into consideration with a view of relaxing in their regard the provisions of paragraph 59, section XIX. Queen's Regulations, 1881, namely, that re-engagements will only be allowed in special cases?

MR. CHILDERS: Under the paragraph of the Warrant of June last to which my hon. and gallant Friend refers, commanding officers are at liberty to recommend the re-engagement of privates in the 12th year of their service; but they must do so on special grounds, which, however, are interpreted liberally. I have already approved the re-engagement of nearly 200 men; but do not propose to relax the practice in his respect.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—TREATMENT OF PERSONS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT—LIMERICK GAOL.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If he can state the reason why the "Kerry Independent" newspaper of the 13th instant, posted in the usual manner, in time for the morning delivery, to the Kerry "suspect" prisoners in Limerick, was not delivered by the gaol officials till 3 p.m. on the 17th, and then only after a portion had been removed, containing a Ladies' League meeting held in Tralee on Sunday the 12th; and, whether it is in accordance with his instructions that the newspaper in question should be always detained two or three days before the delivery?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): There was no mutilation or delay in Limerick Prison of the newspaper referred to in the hon. Member's Question. In giving the paper—which appeared to be a second-hand copy—to the person to whom it was addressed, the warder very properly called attention to its condition. The simple explanation appears to me to be that the condition of the paper and its delay in posting were due to the person who had the first reading of it before he posted it.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: The right hon. and learned Gentleman has not answered the last Question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): The answer, Sir, is No. I did not think it pertinent to the inquiry, otherwise I should have answered it.

NAVY—THE DOCKYARDS—THE BANK HOLIDAYS.

MR. GORST asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether the Lords Commissioners of the Admiralty will, this year, observe the bank holidays in Her Majesty's Dockyards?

MR. TREVELYAN: The workmen in the Dockyards have holidays on Good Friday, Christmas Day, the Queen's Birthday, and Coronation Day. Some of these are enjoyed by no other workmen in the Kingdom, and they are paid for these holidays just as if they were at work. They likewise work considerably shorter hours than in private yards. They get a half-holiday after each annual visitation of the Board of Admiralty, and a half-holiday occasionally when a large ship is launched in the middle of the day, for which they receive wages. Under these circumstances, it would not be fair to the taxpayer to add the Bank holidays to the list. Each holiday would be equivalent to making a present to the men of £4,000, besides the much more serious question of the delay of the all-important national work on which they are engaged.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF inquired whether a holiday would be given to the Dockyard workmen to attend the Volunteer Review?

MR. TREVELYAN: Arrangements will be made to enable the usual Dockyard workmen to attend the Review, and they will make up the time on other days.

MR. GORST inquired whether the men could legally work on Good Friday and Christmas Day?

MR. TREVELYAN: Two of the holidays which I mentioned are Coronation Day and the Queen's Birthday. If there were a general wish in the Dockyards to exchange these two days for the Bank holidays, Her Majesty's Government would consider it; but Her Majesty's pleasure would have to be specially taken.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—TREATMENT OF PERSONS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT—MR. P. CAHILL.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, What facilities will be afforded to Mr. Patrick Cahill, LL.B., at present imprisoned in Naas Gaol, for doing his work in connection with the "Leinster Leader" newspaper, of which he is proprietor and editor?

MR. SEXTON: Does the right hon. and learned Gentleman know whether the Executive refused to allow this gentleman to have the use of a harmonium offered him by some ladies?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): I cannot answer the latter Question without Notice. My reply to the Question of the hon. Member for Queen's County is the very suitable one that Mr. Cahill has made no application with reference to his duty as newspaper editor.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: May I ask what facilities will be afforded?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): If Mr. Cahill should apply I shall be able to inform him.

STATE OF IRELAND—MR. CARTER, J.P.
—POLICE PROTECTION.

MR. ION HAMILTON asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is the case that Mr. Tilson Shaen Carter, J.P., recently applied to the Government for police protection; and, if so, whether he will state upon what grounds such protection was refused?

Sir H. Drummond Wolff

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): I must ask the hon. Member to postpone this Question. I have telegraphed to-day twice for the purpose of getting clearer information; but on neither occasion did I obtain such information as would enable me to give him a satisfactory answer.

CRIMINAL LAW—CASE OF JANE M'EVROY.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the case of a woman named Jane M'Evoy, who was charged before Mr. Slade with having neglected, she being a person under police supervision, to report herself to the police; and, whether, if the facts are as stated by the prisoner, that she did "not think she had occasion to report herself after her term had expired," he will remit the whole or part of the sentence of one year's imprisonment imposed by the magistrate?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, he had inquired into this matter. The magistrate informed him that this woman was represented as a woman of the worst character, and it was also stated that she had been sentenced to several terms of imprisonment after she was released on licence, and this was confirmed by the police reports. It thus appeared that she was a person whom it was necessary to keep under police supervision; but she, after sufficient warning, refused to report herself, and the magistrate said that, in such circumstances, he must award the sentence provided by law for such cases.

STATE OF IRELAND — THE LADIES' LAND LEAGUE—JUDGE BARRY AND MISS M'CORMACK.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following extract from the "Daily Express" of last week:—

"A deputation of the citizens waited on Judge Barry, at his lodgings, Barrington Street, Limerick, this morning, for the purpose of requesting his Lordship to use his influence with the Government to have Miss McCormack, a member of the Dublin Ladies' Land League, released from the County Prison, where she is detained on a warrant issued by Mr. Clifford Lloyd, special resident magistrate, in default of finding securities of 'good behaviour.'

"Judge Barry, in reply, said that, as a judge, he could not interfere in any way whatever with the matter, and could not receive the deputation in his judicial capacity, but, as Charles Barry and a citizen of Limerick, he was always glad to see his fellow townsmen, and in that capacity alone he would use any private influence he had in forwarding the object of the deputation, and would write a private note to-day to the Chief Secretary, requesting, if it were possible to do so, that Miss McCormack should be released. The deputation thanked his Lordship for the courteous manner in which they were received, and withdrew."

whether he had yet received the private note from the learned judge; and, if so, what answer has been returned?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The Question I am asked to answer is, I understand, whether a certain private note has been received by the Chief Secretary. That is a matter I cannot answer.

MR. REDMOND: Will the Prime Minister state whether the Chief Secretary will be in his place at the Morning Sitting to-morrow, as that is one of the questions we are anxious should be considered before the Vote on Account is passed?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have every reason to expect that the Chief Secretary will be in his place then.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— SUB-CONSTABLE WALSH.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, if ex-sub-constable Walsh forwards to the proper authority the certificate which he holds from the Crown Solicitor at Cork, dated the 21st December, for his expenses as witness from the 5th to the 21st December, he will receive the usual allowance; if he will now state why Walsh was ordered from Cork on 10th February, at his own expense, to Kanturk, where he was informed of his discharge, when he might have been informed of his discharge in Cork, and save the expense of such transfer, having been at the time stationed at Tuckey Street Station, Cork; and, whether any instructions will be given to make good what the man was out of pocket?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): If ex-Sub-Constable Walsh has not received his expenses from the Crown Solicitor, the Inspector General will order him the regulation travelling expenses and extra pay while absent on duty from his station. He was ordered, according to the Rules of the Force, back to his station at Kanturk, to give up his arms and other public property, to receive his pay from his own officer, and to take away his effects.

In reply to a further Question from Mr. HEALY,

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON) was understood to say that Sub-Constable Walsh would be allowed the regulation expenses for his journey from Cork to Kanturk.

NAVY—TROOPSHIPS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, To state roughly the amount of first class accommodation on board the "Serapis," or any other of the five great troopships; if he can state roughly the percentage of non-combatants, other than medical officers or those of the pay department, who are carried in these vessels; also the percentage of officers not belonging to the regiments or troops on board who are generally carried on such vessels; if any great public or private inconvenience would be caused if the passage of one such non-combatant or unattached officer were paid by some other route, and if a Catholic chaplain were occasionally permitted to avail himself of the vacancy in accommodation thus created; and the average number of days the troopships take in performing the voyage to India, and if any considerable increase in speed has been attained since the pledge given on this subject by the late Government on the 1st August 1879?

MR. TREVELYAN: There is accommodation for 73 officers in cabin berths in each of the Indian troopships, which is in excess of the number required to do duty with the troops. The details as to the percentage of non-combatants cannot be given without a considerable amount of labour; but it may be assumed that it would seldom be an inconvenience to afford the accommodation of a berth in a cabin to an additional chaplain if the India Office and War Office wished that a chaplain should be embarked for the voyage. The voyage is short, being only 28 days—that is, three days less than in 1879. The voyage was accelerated in 1880.

RUSSIA—PERSECUTION OF THE JEWS.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether, since the Government decline to call on Her Majesty's Consuls by despatch to report specially on each Jewish outrage mentioned in any journal, he would state the reason why a different course should be followed in this respect than that urged upon the late Government by members of the present Government, in the case of the Bulgarian outrages; and, whether Her Majesty's Government will instruct Her Majesty's Consul at Moscow to inquire into and report on the outrages stated by the Moscow correspondent of the "Daily Telegraph" to have been committed in that city during the present month?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I have nothing to add to what the Prime Minister said on this subject in the debate lately raised by the hon. Member. As regards the second part of his Question, I have nothing to add to what I said on Thursday last.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: May I ask the hon. Gentleman, whether it is the intention of the Government not to instruct Her Majesty's Consuls to inquire and report upon the alleged outrages?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I must repeat what I said last Thursday—namely, that it is not thought desirable to call on the Consuls to report with regard to each statement that appears in a newspaper; but that they are in the habit of making Reports without being instructed.

BARON HENRY DE WORMS: Will they report?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I can only say that Reports from Consuls have been laid before the House up to a month ago. Should any further Reports be received on the question, they will be laid on the Table in due course.

NAVY—NAVAL BARRACKS AT PORTS- MOUTH.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is the intention of the Admiralty to erect Naval barracks at Portsmouth upon the site already selected; and, if he can state the causes of the delay which has occurred in proceeding with the construction of them?

MR. TREVELYAN: No final decision has been arrived at with reference to the construction of Naval barracks at Portsmouth. The Board wish to see the barracks at Keyham in a more forward state before they proceed to a final determination with regard to those for Portsmouth.

IRELAND—LOCAL CONTRACTS FOR UNIFORMS FOR ARMY AND OTHER SERVICES—MANUFACTURE OF UNL- FORMS IN IRELAND.

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Postmaster General, Whether, since the rule requiring the made up clothing to be sent over here from Ireland for inspection and approval is no longer insisted on, the Contract recently entered into has been given to an Irish firm; and, if not, whether the rejection of all tenders from Irish firms is caused by the question raised as to the hardship of requiring the clothing to be sent to London for inspection?

MR. FAWCETT, in reply, said, he thought it right to state that, finding these matters were all managed at the War Office, he wrote to the hon. Member requesting him to put the Question to the Secretary of State for War. No doubt, the right hon. Gentleman would be able to answer it.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PRO- PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—TREAT- MENT OF PERSONS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT—MICHAEL VEAL.

MR. R. POWER asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If it is true that Michael Veal, at present a prisoner in Naas Gaol under the Coercion Act, has been prohibited receiving certain books, among others "The Life and Speeches of Daniel O'Connell" and Mr. A. M. Sullivan's "Story of Ireland;" and, if he will give instructions that these books, which are the private property of Mr. Veal, may be given to him?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): I am informed, Sir, that the Governor of the prison detained two volumes of the select speeches of O'Connell, considering them "political." I do not myself see why Mr. Veal should not have these books, and will inquire about it. No other books were detained, so far as I am informed.

MR. HEALY: What about the other book?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): No other books were detained at all.

MR. R. POWER: In consequence of that answer, may I ask the Prime Minister, if he will allow, or give instructions, that the Governor will allow Mr. O'Connell's speeches to be given to Mr. Michael Veal, remembering the fact that the Prime Minister declared on the 8th of last October—

"That O'Connell professed his unconditional and unswerving loyalty to the Crown of England;"

O'Connell desired—

"Friendly relations with the people of this country." "Friendship with England was the motto of O'Connell." "O'Connell on every occasion declared his respect for property."

MR. GLADSTONE: I should not like to give a positive pledge in regard to a matter of prison regulation without first having an opportunity of making inquiry. I may state, however, that there are many of O'Connell's speeches which I should very strongly recommend to the attention of hon. Gentlemen opposite from Ireland.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY— CONSTABLE FORBES.

MR. METGE asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether he is aware that in the case of Constable Forbes, who was fined £3 at a court of inquiry at Kells, county Meath, for being drunk, and, consequently, lost all chance of future promotion, seven witnesses swore to his being sober, while only two witnesses swore to the contrary; whether two of the seven witnesses above mentioned were Doctors Ringwood and Sparrow, physicians of high standing; whether it is true that Dr. Sparrow swore on his oath that he "had at a doubt on his mind as to the defendant's sobriety." That "it was utterly impossible for the defendant," if drunk, to have got sober in the time" (viz. the time which elapsed between his rest and that at which Dr. Sparrow examined him), and, further, that, "if suffering from 'ear vertigo,' he would have all the appearance of a drunken man;" whether Dr. Ringwood swore on his oath—

"That the defendant was suffering from 'ear vertigo,' which would cause him to sway to and fro;" "that the symptoms came on suddenly;" "that the defendant could not have stated the symptoms of 'ear vertigo' more clearly if he was a medical man;" "that the symptoms could not possibly have been caused by intoxication," but that, if "he had met him in the street," he might, as the head constable had done, have "mistaken his case for one of intoxication;" whether, in pursuance of Section 1,637 of the Code of Regulations, which states that the court stated their reasons for having decided against the weight of the evidence; and, whether, seeing the hardship entailed by Constable Forbes, by reason of the record against his character, he will grant him a new trial before the bench of magistrates of Kells?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, I must apologize to you and the House for necessarily a somewhat long reply to this very lengthy Question. I am aware that seven witnesses, including two doctors, deposed to the constable's sobriety; and that two constables, by whom he was removed from duty, deposed to his insobriety. The rule of evidence is testes ponderantur, non numerantur, and observing that rule, no doubt, the Court acted on what they considered the reliable evidence. Neither of the doctors gave precisely the evidence attributed to him in this question. Dr. Sparrow—who saw the constable one hour and 25 minutes after the charge was made—deposed that he "examined the man by smelling his breath and walking him up and down the room," and concluded his evidence by stating that he "believed the constable was perfectly sober then." Dr. Ringwood—who saw the constable two hours after the charge was made—deposed that—

"From the symptoms he observed, and from the unprompted history given him by the constable, he was of opinion that the swaying motion and staggering gait were caused by 'ear vertigo,' and that such symptoms come on suddenly, and have often been mistaken for the effects of drink."

The Court did not decide against the weight of evidence. On the contrary, they decided according to the weight of the evidence, and not according to the number of witnesses examined on each side, and they pointed out that they believed the insobriety was slight in the first instance, and that in the interval the constable had recovered sobriety. In my opinion, this is entirely a matter of the discipline of the Force, which does not call for any interference by the Chief Secretary; but I am informed by the authorities that Sub-Constable Forbes does not by the fine on this occasion lose all chance of future promotion.

NAVY — PORTSMOUTH DOCKYARD — DISCHARGE OF WORKMEN.

MR. T. C. BRUCE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Whether it is true that a large number of men were temporarily discharged from Portsmouth Dockyard last Saturday, and a further number on Thursday; and, if so, what is the reason of this measure?

MR. TREVELYAN: No men have been actually discharged from the books of Portsmouth Dockyard; but 210 men who had been entered for temporary service, and who had, when entered, been informed that they would probably be discharged at the end of the financial year, were told that they would not be required in the Yard from the 20th to the 25th instant. To-day the whole of the men will resume work. The reason for their suspension was that the Yard was £300 to £400 short of money. Orders will be given that in future the Admiralty should be specially informed from the Dockyards, at the end of the financial year, whether a discharge of workmen is in contemplation, so that the Board may use its discretion, as it has done this year in the case of Sheerness.

NAVY—THE TROOPSHIP "ASSIST- ANCE."

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, If his attention has been drawn to the misery and discomfort attendant on the recent sea voyage of the 1st battalion Scots Guards from Dublin, lasting from 4 p.m. on the 18th instant to 3 p.m. on the 22nd instant; if it is correct that out of a total of 628 non-commissioned officers and men, 580 men were packed on the troop deck, and 48 compelled to find space where they could; if it is true that, during the whole of the voyage, not a single hammock was served out to these men; if it is also true that the washing accommodation for these 628 men was ten basins, to which access was only allowed for one hour and a-half in the morning; and, if, in addition to the above, 42 women and 95 children were packed in a space, in another part of the vessel, totally inadequate to receive them, and were subject, with the rest, to a condition of things during two days' rough weather which was neither decent nor humane?

MR. TREVELYAN: In 1875 the usual Committee of Naval and Military officers, including an officer of the Quartermaster General's Department and of the Army Medical Department, surveyed Her Majesty's ship Assistance, and fixed her capacity at 810 men and 142 women and children. On the occasion to which the noble Lord refers she carried 633 men and 127 women and children. It is a regulation that there should always be a guard on deck, and probably the 48 men referred to were the guard in question. Hammocks were available, and would have been issued if they had been asked for. The Quartermaster was offered to have blankets served out, but declined the offer. There were 15 basins in the troops' wash-places, which were open eight hours in the day. No complaint has ever before been received of the insufficiency of the accommodation on the Assistance for such numbers as were embarked on this occasion. The captain of the vessel reports, by telegraph, with reference to the voyage under consideration, that—

"The colonel, on leaving, took the opportunity of thanking me for all the comfort on board the ship; and, being asked by me if he had any complaint, said, 'No; only regretted passage was so short.'"

PARLIAMENT — PALACE OF WEST- MINSTER—THE CLOCK TOWER.

MR. SPENCER asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether, having regard to the fogs that have prevailed, he would take into consideration the advisability of having an electric instead of a gaslight in the Clock Tower?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE, in reply, said, that an experiment was made some time ago with the electric light at the House, with a result which was well known to them all. As the change suggested would involve some expense, and as experiments were still being made, he did not think it would be worth while to proceed with the alteration till the whole question of lighting the Houses of Parliament came up for consideration.

Mr. HEALY asked, whether it was not a fact that gas was best seen in a fog?

Mr. SHAW LEFEVRE said, that was a moot point; but he thought the general belief was that the electric light was seen best in foggy weather.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACT —RETURNS OF INFECTED AREAS.

Mr. HUSSEY VIVIAN asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he will direct that the weekly Returns of infected areas under the Contagious Diseases (Animals) Act, which are printed for the use of the central office, shall be forwarded to the clerks of the local authorities, in order to enable them to make adequate rules for the protection of their districts, without the necessity of constantly obtaining copies of, and searching through, the London Gazette?

Mr. MUNDELLA: The Returns of infected areas are advertised in The London Gazette for the convenience of local authorities. It would unnecessarily increase the trouble and expense if we were to undertake to furnish printed copies of these weekly Returns to the various committees, which number some thousands.

SPAIN—COMMERCIAL TREATY—NEGOTIATIONS.

Mr. O'SHEA asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether there is truth in the statement that Her Majesty's Government have lately made serious proposals to the Cabinet of Madrid as to a Commercial Treaty, and that the Cabinet of Madrid have, in reply, proposed that city as the place of negotiation?

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: In answer to the hon. Member, I have to say that the Government of Spain have expressed a wish to discuss the commercial relations of the two countries at Madrid.

TURKEY—THE HARBOUR OF SMYRNA.

Mr. W. H. SMITH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, If he is now able to state the result of the negotiations with the Porte for the retrocession of the hundred pico of free landing space in the harbour of Smyrna, which were reserved to the commercial community of that port in the original concession to the Smyrna Quay Company; and when the papers which have been promised on the subject will be laid upon the Table?

Sir CHARLES W. DILKE: The negotiations with the Porte on the subject of the free landing space in the harbour of Smyrna are not yet concluded; but Papers will be presented to Parliament in the course of the present week, and distributed early next week.

INDIA—CONVEYANCE OF STORES.

Mr. CODDINGTON asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether a Departmental Committee of the India Office recently recommended the system of public tender in respect of shipments made by the Indian Guaranteed Railways; and, if so, on what principle it has now adopted a secret system in obtaining freights for the conveyance of Government stores?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: About three years ago the system of public tender, which was already in force for India Office shipments, was recommended by a Departmental Committee for shipments, made by the Guaranteed Railways. Subsequent experience, however, had shown, as I stated last Monday, that there are objections to this system; and the change in the India Office arrangements, which I then explained, has, therefore, been made. The new system is not a secret one, and is that adopted by many large mercantile firms, as well as by other Government Departments concerned in the freight of stores. I see no reason to doubt its continuing to be satisfactory and economical.

STATE OF IRELAND — MR. MASSY, OF SUIR CASTLE.

Sir WILLIAM HART DYKE asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, If his attention has been called to the position and case of Mr. F. Massy, of Suir Castle, Golden; whether it is true that, at the request of the Government, Mr. Massey gave a piece of ground for the erection of a police hut; whether, in consequence of this loyal act, he has been Boycotted, and deserted by his domestic servants and farm labourers; and, whether the Government intend to take any steps for the relief of Mr. Massey, and to supply him with assistance to work his farm, now out of cultivation owing to his loyal aid offered to the Government?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): The Chief Secretary requests me to inform the right hon. Baronet that his attention has been given to the position and case of Mr. Massey, of Suir Castle; that it is the fact that Mr. Massey, at the request of the Government, gave a site for the erection of a police hut; and that, in consequence of this act in the interests of law and order by Mr. Massey, he has been "Boycotted," and has been deserted by his domestic servants and by his farm labourers. I have only to add that the Chief Secretary will see that anything in the power of the Government shall be done to alleviate Mr. Massey's position.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1851—MEMBERS OF THIS HOUSE ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that a number of suspects, at present confined in Irish gaols, have been liberated on parole, in order to attend to their private affairs; and, whether he will recommend the Irish Government to release on parole the honourable Member for Cork, the honourable Member for Tipperary, and the honourable Member for Roscommon, in order that they may vote on the Clôture Resolution?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, it is a fact that certain of the prisoners in Ireland have been set at liberty in order to attend to their private affairs; but that has been done with great care, and after strict investigation. I think the House will perceive that that can constitute no precedent whatever for the liberation suggested in the Question of the hon. Member. If that liberation were granted for the division on Thursday night, there is no reason why it should not be granted for every division which takes place in this House.

Sir William Hart Dyke

NAVY—ROMAN CATHOLIC CHAPLAINS FOR TROOPSHIPS.

COLONEL NOLAN asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If his attention has been called to the declaration on the 1st August 1879 of the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the then First Lord of the Admiralty had a difficulty in promising to meet the wishes of the Catholic Members on the subject of Catholic Chaplains for troopships, because this subject required the authority of departments other than the Admiralty, but that he, the Chancellor of the Exchequer, speaking for himself and his colleagues in the Government, would do their best to get carried out the proposal made with regard to the appointment, in certain cases, of Catholic Chaplains to troopships; and, if the present Chancellor of the Exchequer would do his best to get carried out the promise made by the late Chancellor of the Exchequer in his official capacity?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE), in reply, said, that neither the attention of the Secretary of State for War nor of the First Lord of the Admiralty had been drawn to this subject until the Question of the hon. and gallant Member appeared. All he could say at present was that he believed there was no difficulty in providing accommodation for Catholic chaplains; and his right hon. Friend at the head of the War Department and his noble Friend at the head of the Admiralty would carefully consider the best course to be adopted.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE—THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME.

MR. GREGORY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is understood by the promoters of the Channel Tunnel that they are proceeding with their respective undertakings entirely at their own risk, and that they will have no claim for compensation in case it should be considered necessary, for the defence of the Realm, to stop or suspend their works, or at any time to take possession of them, or of the Tunnel, when constructed, for such purpose?

MR. GLADSTONE: In answer to this Question, I have to state that a letter was addressed on the 6th of March to Sir Edward Watkin, as Chairman of the Company which is now engaged in con-part of the Question—namely, is there is power at any time to resection of the Tunnel when condensed—that rather presumed that arguments have been made for the action of the Tunnel, which at is not the case.

GREGORY: Would the Government exercise that power without the sanction?

GLADSTONE: I apprehend is no doubt of that as to the works.

O'SHEA: Has Sir Edward been informed whether he has to go beyond the foreshore?

GLADSTONE: I believe Sir d Watkin is very well informed all matters connected with the ny over which he presides, and it at all necessary for us to inform these matters.

LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE COURTS—LEGAL EXPENSES.

O'DONNELL asked the First of the Treasury, Whether his at has been directed to the letter Bence Jones in the "Standard" day, complaining of the excessive expenses incumbent upon even the necessitous applicants to the Land; whether the Government is aware the services of a solicitor can only ired by a payment of from £3 to the first stage of the tenant's and that the fee charged by valu-whose evidence is so necessary in tested claims, varies from £3 to

They have likewise thrown no difficulty whatever in the way of those tenants who may be disposed to conduct their own cases. There is no impediment thrown in their way with regard to valuers. The Commissioners state that there is a good deal of exaggeration about the fees, as they believe, that are paid by tenants to valuers. What they have to say is, in the first place, that they do not require a litigant to employ a valuator; and, in the second place, they do everything in their power to supply the place of valuers by making the personal inspection of the holding in every case they have to decide.

ROYAL COMMISSION ON AGRICULTURE—THE REPORT.

MR. JAMES HOWARD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he can give information as to the time when the Report of the Royal Commission on Agriculture may be expected to be in the hands of Members?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, he had himself no information as to the time at which the Report might be expected. The Clerk of the Commission, who had no information, was, so far as he knew, the only gentleman officially connected with the Commission who was in town. That gentleman informed the Government that the Chairman and the Secretary and the Assistant Secretary were all out of town, and he had been unable to obtain any information in regard to the Report. There were, he believed, several Members of the Coma riot which is stated to have occurred in the city of Galway between soldiers belonging to the 84th and 88th (Connaught Rangers) Regiments; whether the riot has resulted in serious injury to the combatants and others; and, if he will take any special measures for the better protection of life and property in Galway?

MR. CHILDERS: From information we have received, I believe that the accounts in the newspapers have been greatly exaggerated. What has happened is that a man of the dépôt of the Connaught Rangers was arrested by a picket of the detachment of the York and Lancaster Regiment now at Galway, and rescued by some men of the dépôt and some civilians. In the excitement which ensued a soldier was wounded. The General commanding the district has gone to Galway to investigate the matter.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [20th February],

"That when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker, or to the Chairman of a Committee of the whole House, during any Debate, to be the evident sense of the House, or of the Committee, that the Question be now put, he may so inform the House or the Committee; and, if a Motion be made 'That the Question be now put,' Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman, shall forthwith put such Question; and, if the same be decided in the affirmative, the Question under discussion shall be put forthwith: Provided that the Question shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear to have been supported by more than two hundred Members, or unless it shall appear to have been opposed by less than forty Members and supported by more than one hundred Members."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

And which Amendment was,

To leave out from the first word "That," to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "no Rules of Procedure will be satisfactory to this House which confer the power of closing a Debate upon a majority of Members,"—(Mr. Marriott,)
—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words 'when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker,' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

Mr. Sexton

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, that he hoped the House would allow him to recall to them the exact question which was before it. Some hon. Members approached—conspicuously the Home Secretary and the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian)—the question under debate as if it was a question of getting rid of those persons who wantonly placed impediments in the way of the discharge of Public Business. That, however, was not the question. The question under debate was whether a mere majority of the House should have the power to put an end to debate which was neither obstructive nor unduly repeated. If they wanted an illustration of the importance of keeping that distinction in view, they could not do better than to refer to the speech of the Prime Minister. It was idle to suppose that hon. Members on that side of the House were not heartily in accord with the Prime Minister in wishing to get rid of Obstruction. The right hon. Gentleman had pointed out the increase which had taken place in Public Business, and the necessity of devising some scheme for preventing wanton waste of time caused by repeatedly moving the adjournment and other obstructive tactics. But all these things were provided for by special Resolutions; and, therefore, do not let it be suggested and put before the country that the House was now discussing the question of whether or not the Forms of the Procedure of the House should or should not be altered, or whether they should prevent the adjournment of the House before the beginning of Public Business, or of continual Motions for the adjournment of the debate and of the House. The particular Resolution they were now engaged in discussing did not touch any of these things. Neither did it touch the question of a particular Member disregarding the authority of the Chair, or the question of a Member wantonly consuming time by tedious repetitions. All these things were specially provided for, as well as the question of Motions upon going into Committee of Supply. He had remarked, having the Paper in his hand as the Home Secretary spoke on Thursday night, that every one of the suggested cases which he gave the House as a possible course which might be pursued, and which this Rule was intended to prevent, were provided for in the other Rules which the House would hereafter have to discuss, and were not touched by this Rule. The question, therefore, which the House was now discussing, and the question which alone, it ought to be understood, was to be raised upon this debate and by this division, was that in a debate which was not obstructive, and which had not called for the intervention of the Chair, or in which no Member had continued speaking irrelevant matter, a single vote might put an end to debate, however orderly conducted. All this was to be done by the vote of a single Member. On reading through this Code of Procedure he confessed he was somewhat puzzled to know how the 1st Resolution got into its place, or how it got into the Code at all. It seemed to him as if some person had, with great care and skill, considered every form of Obstruction with which the House was familiar, and had carefully—and it might be wisely—provided for each one of them, and then that some stronger and different hand had come and placed this 1st Resolution in front of them all. He wished to say one word upon the safeguard which was supposed to be involved in the intervention of the Chair. In touching on the subject he was somewhat in a difficulty; for while what he said might be no more than justice, yet, addressed to the Chair itself, it might seem to amount to adulation. Yet for himself, and, he believed, many others, he believed that as long as the present Speaker occupied the Chair it would be very much better, in the view of great many Members of the House, that the Speaker should have the absolute decision of the question rather than leave it to that mixture of incongruous authorities by whom the suggested Resolution would be put in force. A great Party might recognize a responsibility; a single man might do so, but this system seemed ingeniously contrived to leave responsibility in neither one nor the other. No doubt anomalies might exist in any system without that system being bad. Whenever the Legislature determined to bestow the franchise, a line more or less arbitrary was drawn. But there was always a principle which dictated the point at which the division was made. What principle, however, could have suggested that 201 persons should have the power to close a debate which 200 desired to continue? But, to return to the Resolution itself, the hon. and learned Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. H. H. Fowler) had relied on the safeguard to be derived from the Speaker's authority, which was only to be exercised after the evident sense of the House had been shown. But how would that evident sense be apparent? Would it not be by cries from one side of the House or the other? An evident sense, it had been argued, would clearly not be that of a bare majority. But was that majority to be a majority of Members present, or what? What discretion, also, was to be allowed to the Speaker in putting the question? Upon the true construction of the Resolution he held that he had none. The words were that "Mr. Speaker may," and so on. His hon. and learned Friend, as a member of the Legal Profession, would know that the word "may," when so used in Acts of Parliament, was equivalent to the word "must," and the Speaker's discretion, therefore, amounted to nothing; otherwise, when invested with the power of closing debate Mr. Speaker deliberately refused to do so, Mr. Speaker would be acting in defiance of the evident sense of the House. He would suppose that in a particular case the Speaker, in the exercise of his discretion, came to the conclusion that it was the evident sense of the House that the debate should close. In the division, 201 voted for the closing of the debate, and 200 for its continuance. In that case the Speaker would have intervened in a mistake; because, in such a closely-balanced state of opinion, it was evidently not the sense of the House that the debate should close. The Speaker had intervened on one hypothesis, and the debate had closed on another. They would have attempted to ascertain whether the Speaker was right; they would find out that he was wrong; and then they would confirm his decision. The Home Secretary had told the House the other night that everything was decided by a majority; and the Prime Minister had said that a Government might be turned out, or a Bill passed, by a majority of 1. The hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. George Russell) went further, and declared that you could prevent even the introduction of a Bill by a majority. True; but not without debate. In this case the majority prevented the minority from exercising their right of discussion—a principle absolutely unconstitutional. The Home Secretary had also said this must necessarily become a Party question, and the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India also admitted it must become a Party question; but that was not what the House had been told by the Prime Minister, and was absolutely inaccurate in one view of the Rule. The Prime Minister had described the Rule to be for the purpose of regulating debate, and maintaining order, and decency, and decorum. He (Sir Hardinge Giffard) knew of no reason why, with regard to such a question as that, any political Party should refuse their acquiescence. The Government had a right to call upon the Members on that side to aid and assist in framing a system which was intended for the common benefit of all; but if they admitted it was for the purpose of aiding and assisting in carrying Party measures, they could not call upon Members on that side to help them in doing that which they believed to be injurious to the best interests of the country. Whatever might be the views of the Prime Minister, there were, he thought he might say, three other Gentlemen in the Government who, at any rate, regarded this Rule as a useful instrument in their hands for the purpose of forwarding their own particular Party views—he meant their views in favour of particular measures which were adopted by their Party and not by this—[Sir WILLIAM HARCOURT: The views of the majority.] Well, but what was a majority? The views of the majority were the will of the people.

“The will of the people practically means the will of the most numerous, or the most active, part of the people—the majority, or those who succeed in making themselves accepted as the majority. The people, consequently, may desire to oppress a part of their number, and precautions are as much needed against this as against any other abuse of power.”

That was the sentiment of that champion of bigoted Toryism, Mr. John Stuart Mill. In the minds of a great many, the significance of the Rules, and particularly of the 1st Rule, was very plainly interpreted by the utterances of Ministers themselves. A right hon. Gentleman said, not long ago—

“I do not think intelligent people can deny that we are on the eve of fresh political changes, which, I believe, might be accomplished without violence, and without danger to the foundations of our national greatness and prosperity.”

He also spoke of—

“Carrying out the beneficial work of harmonizing existing institutions with modern necessities and the spirit of the times.”

That language in the mouth of the President of the Board of Trade had its significance; and it seemed to him that if the changes he hinted at were so imminent, they ought to preserve the safeguards they had in the interests of both the great political Parties, and not surrender them into the hands of Ministers who were capable of using such language. He would only say one word after what fell from his hon. and learned Friend behind him the Member for Sheffield (Mr. Stuart-Wortley), about the example of foreign countries. In some of those countries, although the House should vote for the close of a debate, yet a Minister might, if he thought fit, reopen the debate, only with the consequence that it should be concluded in the ordinary form. And that was the sort of institution which was recommended by a Minister in the English House of Commons. The value of Parliamentary debates had probably never had a more eloquent exponent than the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister himself; and it was one, and not the least significant, of the signs of the times, that what the right hon. Gentleman wrote in 1879 he had not retracted himself in 1882; but it was absolutely inconsistent with the statement of many of his followers. It might well be that if the right hon. Gentleman was perfectly equipped with this weapon he would use it only for the purpose he had described; but how would he answer for those whose objects had been declared in the country, and which had not been disclaimed by them here? One valuable quality of Parliamentary debates, which it seemed to him most important that they should bear in mind, was the fact that when everybody had been heard, as in the analogous case of proceedings in Courts of Law, when a man was beaten he would say—“Well, after all, I was right; but still I had a fair trial,” the minority, as long as they believed they had fair play, and were enabled to express what their views were, were contented. But when they allowed the Party which was in the majority for the moment to intervene and say—“No, you have been sufficiently heard," would that contentment continue? It went somewhat farther than that, he thought; because if they caused discontent to Parties who were in a minority for the time, and made them believe that a measure had been passed notwithstanding their protest, and without giving them a proper hearing, the stability of those things which they had enacted was in peril. The right hon. Gentleman himself pointed that out in 1874, in speaking on the Endowed Schools Act. He would read one observation of the right hon. Gentleman, and let it not be supposed that he was reading it for the purpose of establishing any supposed inconsistency between the Prime Minister's observations then and his attitude now. He read it now because it was a valuable expression of opinion by the Prime Minister, which had not been answered, nor, as he understood, disavowed by the Prime Minister. What the Prime Minister then said was this—

"If you consult any one of those great political writers who adorn the literature of their countries, you will find their language reflecting us uniform. When they look at our political Constitution they are struck by the multitude of obstructions which, for the defence of minorities, we allow to be placed in the way of legislation. They are struck by observing that the immediate result is great slowness in the steps we take; but when they refer to the consequences of this slowness, they find one great and powerful compensation, and it is that England all progress is sure."—[3 Hansard, xx. 1709.]

seemed to him (Sir Hardinge Giffard), therefore, that they were in great peril of interfering with that course of things they adopted this Rule. Was it not a fact admitted almost by every Member of the House that the House was better governed than it could be governed under this Rule by an understanding of gentlemen on both sides of the House? The Prime Minister could not point to a single instance in which there had been any departure from the understanding of the great body of the House that the debate upon a particular question should close upon such and such a night when the Government had expressed a desire that it should close. Of course, it was all very well for hon. Members opposite to suppose they only meant to do what was right. He was surprised to hear so moderate, so candid, and, he would add, so wise a Member of the House as the hon. Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) say he would have no objection to this Rule, provided the power of enforcing it was always placed in the hands of his own Friends. That was, of course, what they would all say; but if they were to forge an instrument of this character it might get into what would be regarded as wrong hands; and the question was, whether it should be forged? He thought there was another danger connected with this question, and that was the effect which the adoption of this Rule would have upon the public mind out-of-doors. He believed that if there was one thing which was more firmly rooted in the mind of every Englishman than another it was this—that they had a House of Commons in which they could air their grievances, and that the House would make it impossible for any Minister, however powerful, to refuse to answer if a plausible case was made out. If this popular idea were interfered with, they would be interfering with what Mr. Roebuck—not the Mr. Roebuck of later years, hon. Gentlemen opposite might not accept his authority, but the Mr. Roebuck of an earlier time—had called the "safety valve." The Prime Minister had used the same metaphor. He said—

"It has been providentially allotted to this favoured Isle,"

—in those days a proud appeal to our favoured position was not a Jingo sentiment—

"that it should show to all the world how freedom and authority, in their due and wise developments, not only may co-exist in the same body, but may, instead of impairing, sustain and strengthen one another. Among Britons it is the extent and security of freedom which renders it safe to intrust large powers to Government; and it is the very largeness of those powers, and the vigour of their exercise, which constitute to each individual of the community the great practical safeguard of his liberties in return. The free expression of opinion, as our experience has taught us, is the safety-valve of passion. That noise, when the steam escapes, alarms the timid; but it is the sign that we are safe. . . . It is a great and noble secret, that of Constitutional freedom, which has given to us the largest liberties, with the steadiest Throne, and the most vigorous Executive in Christendom. I confess to my strong faith in the virtue of this principle. I have lived now for many years in the midst of the hottest and noisiest of its workshops"

—the language was figurative; but he understood that to be this House—

[Fourth Night.]

"and have seen that amidst the clatter and the din a ceaseless labour is going on, stubborn matter is reduced to obedience, and the brute powers of society, like the fire, air, water, and mineral of nature are, with clamour, indeed, but also with might, educated and shaped into the most refined and regular forms of usefulness for man."

He had sought to translate some of the metaphors; but he would not strive to render into words what were the "brute powers of society;" but he was satisfied that if the "safety-valve" was taken away the danger that metaphor suggested would surely come. There would be a great number throughout the country who would look upon this as a gagging Resolution. He hoped this instrument would retain its French name. It seemed to him to reflect a French spirit, that spirit which, as surely as night followed day, carried with it reprisals; that spirit which, ever since 1789, had made each successive Government in France impossible, because each successive Government strove to avenge itself upon its predecessor. He had heard from moderate men like the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) that the power of closing a debate would be very rarely used. That was a strange excuse for the alteration of the Constitutional principles of the House of Commons. But was it clear that the Rule would be put on the shelf? Some people seemed to think that when engaged in political discussion they would always be reasonable and willing to recognize the rights of their adversaries who formed an opinion differing from theirs. Was that view in accordance with the experience of political life of right hon. Gentlemen opposite?

MR. HUSSEY VIVIAN, interposing, explained that all he had said was that the clôture would be a powerful instrument to use when it should be required.

SIR HARDINGE GIFFARD said, he had understood the hon. Member to say that it was an instrument which would be put on the shelf. If, however, it was to be used when required, where was the moderating effect of the hon. Member's argument? If it was to be used when the majority thought that it was required, and when they thought that the minority were perverse, unreasonable, and even stupid, as they had sometimes been called, he feared that it would be found to be a convenient instrument by the aid of which hon. Members opposite would be able to fulfil their desires. The fact that some of them had suggested that it would not be used, or used but rarely, showed that they distrusted their own convictions. The Home Secretary had predicted that the Government proposal would be carried by a majority. He would like to ask hon. Members opposite whether, if this were not a Party question, recommended by the Ministry of the day, they thought a majority would be obtained for such a proposal as the present one? If it had come from his own side of the House, how many hon. Members on the Ministerial side would vote for it? They had heard a good deal lately about the Parties that existed in the House and in the country; it was apparent that the old Party lines had undergone some change, and that differences existed among the constituencies represented by hon. Gentlemen opposite. Were the Moderate Liberals, who had inherited the traditions of the great Liberal Party, sure that in the time to come this fetter which they would have helped to forge would not be applied to them, when the differences to which he had alluded should have broken up Parties and brought about a crossing of Party lines? The question they were discussing was whether or not the whole tradition of the Liberal Party was to be reversed, and without the pretence of misconduct in debate, but simply from a desire to make things "more quick and satisfying," to quote the language of a Cabinet Minister, and, for the sake of assisting particular Party measures, they were to abandon the tradition of centuries, which had made the House of Commons the home of free speech? If the Moderate Liberals should think it right to aid in the forging of the proposed fetter, they would, he believed, find at no distant date that they had acted with fatal imprudence, and not more injuriously to the interests of the country than in defiance of the traditions of their own Party.

MR. DODSON said, that though the hon. and learned Member who had just sat down had not actually sounded such extravagant notes of alarm as had emanated from many hon. Members opposite, the hypothesis underlying the whole of his speech was yet that of the extreme alarmists. They had heard from him that the effect of the Resolution would be the suppression of free speech, and that the proposed Rule was not intended to defeat Obstruction, but to put down opposition. There was, he thought, a confusion of ideas in the minds of hon. Members opposite. The freedom of speech which their ancestors asserted, the freedom of speech which had been inherited from them, the freedom of speech which the Speaker claimed at the beginning of a new Parliament, was the privilege and the right of the House to discuss any particular subjects it saw fit; and the right of Members in discussing these subjects, to express opinions freely, without fear of consequences. But this freedom of speech was not unrestricted loquacity. The Tudors and the Stuarts would not have objected to any amount of prolixity of debate, provided the House would have abstained from discussing subjects that were inconvenient, and expressing opinions that were unpalatable to the Crown. That was not freedom of speech which left the House, not under the moral influence of its most able and trusted Members, but placed it physically at the mercy of the most persistent and the most pertinacious—at the mercy of those who were most callous to the sense of what was due to themselves and to their brother Representatives. It was pointed out by the Secretary of State for India that no Member had a right to unlimited speech. The right of speech was exercised, and always had been exercised, subject to Rules, conditions, and limitations imposed by the House itself and varied from time to time. There were Rules which prevented a Member from bringing forward a subject at all under certain conditions. The Rules as to Adjournment and the Half-past 12 Rule had that effect. They were not shocked at such Rules as those; but the House was shocked at a minor proposition to close a debate on a subject after it had been fully and exhaustively discussed. In every practical Assembly—in every Assembly which pretended to be more than a debating club—there must be a time when discussion must cease, and the judgment of the House be ascertained with certainty, and expressed with authority. That was the object of this Rule—to secure that power to the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman had said that the question before them was whether a bare majority should have power to stop a debate which was neither a repetition nor Obstruction. That was a pure assumption. It was never suggested by anyone on that side that they should stop a debate which was neither repetition nor Obstruction. Then it was said that the subsequent proposals of the Government were sufficient to meet the case of Obstruction. What about the case of last year; what would have happened had the Speaker not intervened? But, apart from that, let them take the case of a Bill which must be passed by a certain date. Suppose the Mutiny Bill was met with Obstruction, would the subsequent Rules secure the passage of that Bill by the necessary day? The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the power of the initiative placed in the hands of the Speaker could not be over-estimated. But the late Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir R. Assheton Cross) made light of the initiative of the Speaker. The Speaker, he said, was only to declare the temper of the House. He (Mr. Dodson) ventured to point out that the temper of the House was not the sense of the House, any more than the temper of an individual was the sense of the individual. With all respect for the legal interpretation placed on the word by the hon. and learned Gentleman, “may” in the Resolution would not be construed to mean “shall.” Hon. Gentlemen opposite assumed that this Rule was devised for Party purposes, for the suppression of discussion, for the injury of the Conservative, and the benefit of the Liberal Party. He ventured to say that if the effect of the Rule was to be as described by the hon. and learned Gentleman who had just spoken, the Liberal Party had most to suffer by its exercise. Rightly or wrongly, the Liberal Party believed their views gained by discussion; that their measures were, in the long run, advanced by the fullest discussion; and they believed, as it had been in the past, so it would be in the future. Therefore, entertaining that belief, surely they would be a most benighted set of personages if they proposed a Rule that was to have such an effect. Then, as to its being aimed at the Opposition, did hon. Gentlemen suppose the Liberals were so blind as not to know that the time must come when they would be in Opposition, and consequently, if that were the case, it might be very damaging to themselves? The hypothesis that an unworthy manœuvre could be successfully resorted to under the circumstances assumed by hon. Gentlemen to close a debate proceeded upon a series of improbabilities amounting together to an impossibility. It was assumed that the Leader of the House would signal to the Speaker to declare the sense of the House. Let them consider the position. What sort of a Speaker must they have to accept the signal? What sort of a Prime Minister must they have to give it? The Leader of the House acted under the highest responsibility; his character, position, and career were at stake. The Speaker was not less responsible than the Leader of the House. He was placed by the House in a post of judicial trust. Then the suggestion was that, at a signal from the Leader of the House, he was to betray his trust—to rise from the Chair with a lie in his mouth, and declare that it was the evident sense of the House that the Question should be now put. But that was not all; they must have men so reckless of consequences to themselves as to support such a manœuvre. Let them calculate the depth to which a Party must have sunk—[Mr. WARTON: It has sunk.]—before it lent itself to such a proceeding. What a cry it would give to the Opposition if it could only plausibly represent to the country that legitimate discussion had been burked. For behind the majority would be the public out-of-doors. For the success, therefore, of this unworthy manœuvre they must have an infatuated Minister, a dishonest Speaker, an absolutely blind and reckless majority, and torpid, or utterly unintelligent constituencies. If ever they had such a combination as that, it would not much matter whether this or any other particular Resolution was standing upon the Order Book of that House or not. The Leader of the Opposition felt the absurdity of the hypothesis upon which his allies proceeded, and took different ground. He assumed that pressure from outside would be put upon Members to enforce the closing of a debate. But if the clôture was only to be put in operation when a debate had been so protracted that the public out-of-doors rose in sickness and indignation, reasonable liberty of speech could not be in any appreciable danger. Again, consider the position of a Speaker who, having rashly averred that it was the evident sense of the House that a debate should close, found, on a division, that only a minority was in favour of this step. He would look foolish. If it turned out that a narrow majority was in its favour his position would be even worse. He would have committed a mistake he could not retrieve, and exposed himself to imputations of partiality. The House might depend upon it that no Speaker would act in the matter, unless he were satisfied that a preponderating majority would support him when he took upon himself the responsibility of closing a debate. He saw no reason to suppose that future Speakers would be partizans, or that they would cease to be men of honour and independence. The Chair was, to a great extent, removed from Party strifes. But, even if the Speaker remained a politician and took part in the debates, there was no reason to suppose that he would exercise the power intrusted to him unfairly. The Lord Chancellor was the Speaker of the House of Lords, and remained a foremost Member of the Government of the day; yet no one would suppose that an Earl Cairns or a Lord Selborne would, even after making the most telling Party speech on the floor of the House, use his judicial power improperly for Party purposes. If he were to criticize the Amendment with the closeness with which the Resolution had been criticized, he should say that it proposed that no majority should have power to close a debate. The hon. and learned Member said he hoped the French name of clôture would be retained. If they were to quarrel with a thing because it had a French name, they would have to quarrel with several good things which were not altogether inappropriate to an hour which was not far distant; and were they to object to "Parliament," which was a French word? The hon. and learned Gentleman said the institution was French; but it would be more correct to say that the power of closing a debate was European and American, and that it had been adopted in almost every one of those Parliamentary Assemblies which had been based on the model of our own. But if they wanted an English name, closure was an English word. The word could be found in Johnson's Dictionary, and he supposed hon. Members would allow that Shakspeare and Pope knew something of English, and they were authorities for the word closure. But he neither accepted nor rejected the Resolution because it had a French name or was a French institution, or because it had an English name or had been an English institution. He supported the Resolution because he thought it was suited to the circumstances of the case. As a matter of fact, not only had they the word closure, but they had the thing, to a certain extent, in that House. What was a "count out" but the closing of a debate? and what did the hands of the clock do at a quarter to 6 o'clock on Wednesday but close a debate? It was perfectly true they did not provide for the coming to a decision on a question; but that used to be effected by an understanding between opposing Parties in the House, when they all felt that a subject had been sufficiently discussed; and when that was the case, it was the practice always for the minority, although unconvinced by the arguments of their opponents, to allow the debate to be stopped, and to accept the decision of the House. For reasons which were apparent to all, it was now considered that an explicit Resolution of this kind had become necessary to secure to the House the just and reasonable power of bringing a debate to a conclusion, when the matter had been fully discussed, and was ripe for determination. It had been urged that this subject should not have been made a Party question; but who was to blame for having made it a Party question? The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon and the late Home Secretary had, early in the autumn, announced their intention of opposing any proposal of this kind to the utmost, and their cry had been followed by their Party. The truth was that this Resolution was necessary to enable the House to get through the multiplicity of its own Business, and to become master of its own time. It had been said that though Foreign Assemblies had the clôture we did not want it, and the reason given was that we had more Business. It was just because of that that it was necessary to have some Rule, in order that the House might be master of its own time. There never was an Empire which was so extended and diversified as this; and yet, while their possessions abroad were extending, their foreign relations increasing, and their commercial interests multiplying, Parliament was so far from showing a disposition to relax its hold on domestic matters, over which it had heretofore exercised control, that it seemed rather disposed to take more of those affairs into its keeping. On the whole, he believed that the Resolution would prove beneficial in its working; and he hoped, therefore, that it would be accepted by the House.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY said, that hon. Members on the Opposition Benches had been charged with holding extravagant views on the Rule under discussion; but he was not inclined to be classed among that number. The loudest note of alarm had been sounded by the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. In the early part of his speech the right hon. Gentleman spoke of the clôture as the minor proposition; and if that Resolution for gagging the House were the minor proposition, one would like to know what were the major propositions that were to follow when that had been forced upon the House? Speaking in no Party sense, he (Sir John Mowbray) deeply deplored the position into which this question had drifted. He lamented the paralysis of Business in the House, and thought the Prime Minister had a right to complain, as Leader of a large majority, that he had lost the credit of being able to carry three or four good legislative measures in one Session. He also thought the Prime Minister was right in not relegating this question to a Committee. The conclusions of Committees had generally been impotent and their results inconsiderable; but he had fully expected that the right hon. Gentleman would have consulted the Leader of the Opposition before taking action, so as to have insured the carrying of the necessary proposals by a large majority. It was also to be regretted that, contrary to the assurances given by the Prime Minister during the Recess, this had been made a Party question. If it had not become a Party question, what was the meaning of those threats of a Dissolution which had been spread so largely about the House to terrify young and weak Members on the Liberal Benches? The Opposition were not terrified by those threats, because they knew that the result of a Dissolution would be to add to their numbers. Then there was a talk about resignation. In that he (Sir John Mowbray) did not believe; if he did, he candidly confessed he should deeply deplore it. Members were asked to consider this as a question of credit and of supporting the Government, and were not allowed to deal with it on its merits. ["No!"] Of that there could be no doubt after the speeches of the Secretary of State for India and the Secretary of State for the Home Department. The Head of the Government had admitted the loyal support which was given to the Government during several trying weeks of last year, and they were now ready to give similar support to any reasonable proposition submitted to them. But what they had mainly to complain of was that the Resolution, as presented them, looked very much as if it were brought forward by one Party in order to diminish the strength of the other. After what had occurred, he admitted that the House was bound to do something this Session; and he felt grateful to the Speaker for vindicating the credit of the Assembly on a recent unparalleled occasion, and recognized that it was its duty to do something to restore its order and dignity; but what was the way in which these Resolutions had been brought forward? Following the clôture Resolution, there were others which he was decidedly inclined to support; but Members were not allowed to consider one of those. The Prime Minister had put in the forefront of all these a single Resolution most obnoxious and repugnant to the feelings of old and experienced Members of the House, and so objectionable to some Members around him that they had to be coerced in order to obtain their votes. That Resolution was put forward as a thing which admitted of no modification, concession, or compromise—the Government must have the Resolution, the whole Resolution, and nothing but the Resolution. For his own part, although it would be the last step he should wish to see the House take, he was prepared, if the necessity should arise, to see adopted a proposal for closing debates in certain circumstances by a proportional majority. He was not prepared to oppose clôture under all circumstances; but clôture of a bare majority should have his irreconcilable resistance so long as he had a vote in the House. He did not admit the necessity for such a violent step as the passing of the 1st Resolution. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary had stated that the Resolution was necessary in order to vindicate the ancient fame of the House of Commons. For his own part, he not believe that that ancient fame would be vindicated by any such step as that proposed. It would best be vindicated by walking in the old paths. He recollected a memorable speech made by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister nine years ago. The Liberal Government had been defeated in 1873 on the Irish University Bill, and the right hon. Gentleman resigned Office. His resignation, however, was not accepted, and in announcing his return to Office the right hon. Gentleman could only find expression for his feelings by quoting the words of the Roman General in the noble ode of Horace—

Lana refert, medicata fuco:
Nec vera virtus, cum semel excidit,
Curat reponi deterioribus.”

Those words would now be a sufficient answer to the right hon. Gentleman. If the ancient tone and high character of the House of Commons had departed, they would not be brought back by any device imported from our Colonies, or from foreign countries, or by any electroplate wash of Birmingham manufacture. If the true virtue and ancient fame of the House had gone from it they would not be restored by the mechanical aid of a gagging clôture. Under the clôture a deteriorated House of Commons would cease to be the illustrious Assembly that for six centuries had enjoyed the confidence and esteem of the English people, commanded the respect of foreign countries, and built up the fabric of England's greatness.

MR. WODEHOUSE said, that he would not further pursue the controversy by whose fault the subject under discussion had become a Party question; rightly or wrongly, avoidably or unavoidably, it had become a Party question, and there was no hope now of its ceasing to be so; but nothing was more remote from his own desire than to approach it in the spirit of Party. It had been said that the proposal contained in the Resolution was the device of an imperious Minister, whose impatient spirit would brook no opposition; but it was notorious, and they had heard it from the Prime Minister's own lips, that he had been one of the slowest and most reluctant to be convinced of the necessity for such a change. It had also been said that the closure was wanted by the Government as an engine to enable them to fulfil a Party programme of Liberal legislation. But under a system of Party Government every Government would have a Party programme. It was no reproach to them to endeavour to fulfil it; indeed, if they acted otherwise they would culpably betray the hopes of those whose confidence placed them in power. It was contended by the Party opposite that the Government should abandon the 1st Resolution, and rely exclusively on the other proposed Rules respecting Procedure. The answer to that contention could best be given in the words of a high authority—the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote). In February, 1880, the right hon. Gentleman made a speech in which, while expressing a strong repugnance to restrictions on freedom of debate and the rights of minorities, he said—

"I do not know that we have arrived at a perfect set of Rules; and I have no doubt that there are matters upon which we may have new rules; and we may, from time to time, propose new Rules, and consider and discuss them. But we think that by such Rules we are to prevent Obstruction altogether, we are reckoning in the dark. There is only one alteration of our Rules which would be of a character that really could prevent Obstruction, and that is one for which we have no English name, but which is known to us all under the name of the closure."

There was a distinct admission from the right hon. Gentleman that the closure was the only thoroughly effective check upon Obstruction. Again, at Manchester, in June last, the right hon. Gentleman said—

"We have had, this Session, to deal with a state of things which I fully admit is unprecedented in the history of Parliament, and which I also admit, if it should be proved to be permanent, will be a great blow and a great injury to the House of Commons, and will render necessary the adoption of measures which, if we sensibly could, we would avoid introducing into our system."

That was just the question. Could they ever postpone the adoption of those measures? Every right-minded man must deeply lament the loss of that excellent closure which the House once possessed, given to it as a freewill offering by the spontaneous discipline and loyalty of all its Members. But that was gone; and what hope was there that it would ever return? Unless remedies were promptly applied, things would grow worse rather than better. There were innocent agents of Obstruction, and other agents the reverse of innocent. The pressure of both kinds would increase rather than diminish. The magnitude and growth of national affairs, and the general operation of democratic influences, would make increasing contributions to the block of Business. And there was a Party in the House avowedly ready, in the very words of their own Leader, utterly to disorganize and interfere with every Business. This policy was not a mere rejoinder to the Coercion Acts; it was proclaimed at a time when the Government were trying to govern Ireland without a Coercion Act; and the policy would survive if the Coercion Acts were repealed tomorrow. They were told that at the next Election the followers of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) would be largely reinforced. If that boast were well founded, it was the strongest argument for setting their House in order before the new comers arrived. Penal Rules directed against individual offenders were effective only against the coarser modes of Obstruction. To show how inoperative mere Penal Rules would be against subtle and scientific Obstruction, the following extract from The Nation would be instructive—

"The present legislative arrangements between England and Ireland cannot stand. They are unsuited to the requirements of the two countries; they are behind the age. If additional proof on that point is wanted, the Irish Members can supply it in any single Session. It is not putting the case too strongly to say the British Legislature is very much at their mercy. Against their will Business cannot go on. Without having recourse to open, gross, palpable Obstruction, they can so clog the wheels of the machine that it will do next to nothing; can bring great numbers of Irish Bills into the House of Commons—good, desirable, and useful Bills—and proceed to their discussion; they can interest themselves in English Bills of all sorts, Imperial and local, public and private, and debate them in the most painstaking and conscientious manner. A very proper course of action this, open to no Constitutional objection, quite legitimate, and perfectly in order: but the result of its adoption would be that little or nothing would be done."

No penal laws could touch this kind of

Obstruction. They had heard much about the degradation which would be inflicted on the House by the closure; but was there no degradation in the thought that the British Legislature could be truly said to lie at the mercy of its worst enemies? The hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was reported to have said last year that for every arrest under the Coercion Act the Irish Members would fine the Government a night of the time of the House of Commons; in other words, that because the Government exercised certain powers with which they had been armed by Parliament for the public good, the time of the House of Commons was to be deliberately wasted. Could any hon. Member opposite be insensible to the degradation of such a state of things as that? Looking at the question from a mere Party point of view, would not the closure operate in the long run more to the advantage of the Party opposite than to the Liberal Party? There was "another place," even in this world, which many Liberals believed to be paved for the most part with bad intentions; and would the permanent Conservative majority in that "other place" ever hesitate to throw its shield over a Conservative minority in the House of Commons, if they thought that time and reflection would bring the country round to their side? When the Liberals were in a minority they had no powerful auxiliaries elsewhere. They had been warned of "stonewalling," "filibustering," and other Foreign and Colonial practices which would be introduced if the closure were adopted; but no attempt had been made to trace the origin of those practices to the closure. He believed that they proceeded from other more general causes, and that, where they and the closure existed side by side, the closure was valued as a check upon them. They were also told that the closure would convert every Member of a gagged minority into an Obstructive, and even the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) had threatened to turn Obstructive under such provocation. He did not think that the hon. Member would ever fulfil that threat; he believed rather that the hon. Member would do what he always did at the critical moment—he would run into the nearest cave he could find. The objections of hon. Members opposite to the closure would soon vanish after they had once had an opportunity of applying it to a Liberal minority, and a few years hence neither Party would be willing to abandon it. For his own part, he should prefer a simpler form of closure to that now proposed—a closure, for instance, subject only to two limitations—first, that it should not be carried except in a House of a certain size; and, secondly, that the Chair should have the same discretion in putting the Question to the vote as was given to the Chair under the Rules of Urgency as to putting Motions for Adjournment to the vote. In his opinion, the growing sensitiveness of the House to the breath of public opinion was the best safeguard against the abuse of the closure. The abuse of the power of closing a debate would inevitably recoil on those who practised it. As far as right of speech in that House was concerned, a most complete gag had been put on one of the Members for Northampton; but was he silenced, and had they heard the last of him? or was he less conspicuous than when he sat and spoke there? Nothing of the kind. If Mr. Bradlaugh had spent an enormous sum annually in advertising his Atheistical publications and his treatises on domestic philosophy, he could not have done as much to extend their notoriety as the House had done, free of charge. Though the Opposition had renounced Mr. Bradlaugh and all his works, they had invested him with a European and Transatlantic fame, and he now filled a space in the public gaze second only to that other friend of the people so rudely expelled from their shores—second only to "Jumbo." The surest way in this country to swell the number of a man's adherents, or even of a beast's adherents, was to give him the chance of posing as a martyr; and any minority which had been unjustifiably gagged in that House, would have its ovations out-of-doors. Freedom of speech, it was said, was the ancient glory of the House of Commons. He did not deny it; but he would rather say that the true glory lay in the sober, temperate exercise of that freedom, and in the uses to which it was turned. Every Member was free to speak at any length on any question; but if they all exercised that glorious freedom not many weeks would elapse before a hurricane of national indignation would awake, and this famous old ship would go down with all hands on board in the wild waves of its glory. Let them be wise in time. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) justly observed the other night that this House was becoming more and more the practical Executive Government of the country. But, surely, the first duty of an Executive authority was not to talk, but to act. An Assembly like this House, arrogating to itself Executive functions, and extending its long arm to the farthest bounds of a world-wide Empire, could not live by freedom of speech alone. If such a Body surrendered itself to unlimited talk it would not only evoke the indignant scorn of mankind, but it would also become a fountain of confusion and calamity as wide as the range of its interference. It was whispered abroad that the House was no longer what it once was; that the tide of its renown had begun to ebb; and if that allegation were true its causes were not far to seek. They all knew where they lay. It was not yet too late to redeem the name and fame of the House of Commons; but the opportunity might soon pass away, never to return. The issue was whether this illustrious Assembly, where freedom and order should be worshipped with an equal devotion, should slowly but surely sink into a degraded arena of adventurers and demagogues, or whether it should now, by a strong effort, renew the vigour and the splendour of its prime? With such an issue before them could they hesitate—could they pause? And persuaded, as he was, that nothing less than the proposals of the Government would be adequate to the end in view, he earnestly asked the House to sanction those proposals by decisive votes.

MR. GRANTHAM said, he thought the hon. Member who had just sat down had spoken with great moderation; but, at the same time, he had not, in his opinion, contributed anything in favour of the Motion before the House, as his arguments had practically answered each other. The hon. Gentleman seemed to argue, when he referred to the hon. Member for Northampton (Mr. Bradlaugh), that that House ought to open its portals to any individual, however objectionable he might be, because otherwise his principles and writings would become more widely known than before. The hon. Member ridiculed the position which the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) had taken up, saying that whenever there was any fear of a storm that hon. Member ran into the first cave. In point of fact, however, the hon. Member for Berkshire was doing exactly that which the hon. Member for Bath had shown was the wisest thing for Liberal Members to do at the present time, for the hon. Member for Bath said that a hurricane was brewing in this country, and that unpopular Members ran a risk of going down in it. He thought there was a very strong feeling among the Liberal Party that this Rule was not necessary at the present time. The Prime Minister contended that both the overwork of the House and the Obstruction to which it was subject rendered the clôture necessary; while the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India avowed that he wished for it in order to put down certain hon. Members whom he regarded as bores; and the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary spoke of it as an efficient weapon against the existing powers of Obstruction hitherto lying dormant and unused, but which he unfolded with evident relish, as they reminded him of his days in Opposition, and in reference to which he would no doubt, soon find the Irish Members very apt pupils; so that there was, apparently, no complete agreement between these three Ministers, all of whom supported the Resolution for such very different reasons. The speech of the Prime Minister was, of course, interesting, not only for its own intrinsic merit, but as the work of a man whose great experience of the House added weight and value to his arguments. Their experience of the past 20 years had, however, shown them that the right hon. Gentleman constantly changed his views, and was from time to time led, by the pressure of circumstances, to discredit opinions that he had recently believed to be infallible. With regard to the question of overwork, it was to be noticed that the number of hours during which the House sat each Session was not a fair test of the amount of work to be done. It was true that in 1832 the House sat for 1,150 hours, and at a later period for 930 hours only, while last year the numbers went up to as many as 1,400; but that was no proof of the House rebelling against overwork. After the Reform Bill, as was natural and desirable, came a period of considerable energy, followed by a time during which the inaction of the House only reflected the lethargic manner in which the country regarded political questions; and even now, but for the Irish difficulty, the House would pursue the even tenour of its way. The country did not desire, as had been said, the passing of so many new measures. Obstruction of the kind adopted by certain of the Irish Members, and not overwork, was the only excuse for the Resolution. There could be no question, however, that the House might, if it chose, grapple with that difficulty without adopting the clôture, and that much might be done by such minor reforms of Procedure as were judiciously and successfully introduced by Melbourne and Peel, men who were as worthy of respect in their day as the present eminent Leader of the House. The excessive numbers of Questions asked might, for instance, be much reduced, and much time might be saved by merely printing the Ministerial answers; for the pleasure of questioning seemed to depend very much on the publicity of the Question and the reply. The Prime Minister had reminded the House that 58 nights of last Session were devoted to the Land Bill, and had argued from that fact that the clôture would have been found useful. Now, it was admitted that the Land Act was so imperfect as to be urgently in need of amendment; but how would it have been improved or rendered more durable by curtailing the time and attention that were actually spent upon it? The truth was that an act of such importance, an act which so altered the existing relations of the bulk of the population of a country, ought not to be passed in one Session. The effect of the various propositions contained in the many sections of such an Act could not be ascertained without being sifted through many minds and months of consideration. How was the Ballot Act of 1877 passed? It was practically passed by means of the clôture, for a meeting of the Liberal Party was held, and it was agreed that all Liberal Members should take their Amendments off the Paper and allow the other side to carry on the discussion alone, so as to get the Bill through the Commons. By that means the Bill was passed in time to be sent to the House of Lords, not a single Conservative Amendment having been accepted by the Government. It was, however, thrown out in "another place." The consequence of that was that the Government had time to consider the objections which had been raised to it, and to considerably modify their own opinions in regard to it; and thus they were enabled in the following Session to introduce a Bill essentially superior to it, and that passed into law. In the same way he thought it would have been better if the Irish Land Bill had been thrown out last year, so as to give the Government time and opportunity to prepare a measure more perfect and just. He would, however, ask this—Supposing the clôture had been in force last Session, and applied so as to put a stop to the objections of the Irish Members sitting below the Gangway, what would those Gentlemen have said of the measure? They would have had just ground for saying that they had not been treated with fair play; and no one would have been surprised if they had endeavoured not only to do all in their power to prevent its becoming law, but also in frustrating its working after it had become law. Then as to the operation of the Rule, if the Government succeeded in carrying it. Was it only to be applied to the second and third readings of Bills and great debates? In that case it would have little effect in saving the time of the House. But if it were to be a constant weapon in the hands of the Government, and was to be used in the manner indicated in the speech of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India, then there would at once be an end of that freedom of debate which had been their boast for so many years. If the evident sense of the House was only to be declared by the Chair, when it was clear that there was a great majority in favour of the debate being closed, then he wanted to know why the Government had wasted their time and insisted on forcing on an unwilling House a Resolution which would never be put in force, when a Resolution of sufficient power to effect such an object would have passed almost sub silentio. Was it likely that any Speaker would ever take upon himself to state that it was the evident sense of the House that debate should be closed without relying on the strict letter of the Resolution, as might turn out that he was wrong? He maintained that there must be some meaning in the words of the Resolution with reference to the evident sense of the House, and that its meaning was that the evident sense of the House was to be determined by a vote of, perhaps, 1 against 200. If the clôture were to be used in that manner, then, to use the language of the right hon. Gentleman, President of the Board of Trade, that which was a hateful incident, and would be a hateful incident, of the Gladstone-Lambert Administration, would become the daily life of the Radical Government of the future. The Prime Minister had founded the proposal, in a measure, on the number of pressing measures requiring to be dealt with. He had told the House that in 1878 he was in a certain periodical stating that there were 22 important measures requiring immediate attention. Then, in 1879, he says he discovered 31, and in his celebrated Mid Lothian campaign he had the number he found was something like 40. If so, why did the right hon. Gentleman not introduce those measures when he was last in Office? There was Obstruction then, for he had himself admitted that it did not show itself till 1878-9, when the Conservative Government was in power. But the country had asked for those measures, and, therefore, they had not been passed. The right hon. Gentleman had also made a strong argument with reference to the Select Committees that were appointed to consider this question. Those Committees were composed, not of partizans, but of men supposed to be eminent in their knowledge of the Rules and practice of the House, and of what changes it was desirable the House should make in its procedure. Yet the Government now attempted to do what none of those Committees thought desirable. It was strange that they should have gone on for so many centuries without requiring the change now proposed. The whole feeling which animated the House enabled the two great Parties to arrange when the debate should be closed; and, for his part, he did not believe that the old traditional feeling of respect for the House, which had existed in the House, had yet died away. It might be that there was a break in their traditions; but when the difficulty with regard to Ireland was settled, he believed they would find that the old feeling still existed, and that they would be able to go on for many years before any such Rule as this was necessary. Some reference had been made by a preceding speaker to Jumbo. In his opinion, the clôture much resembled Jumbo. They were afraid that, like Jumbo, it might become mischievous in the future, and they would rather not put such a power in the hands of the Government. The Prime Minister was very much in the position of a host who, having provided an ample supply for his guests, insisted when they had sat down to the entertainment that they should make their dinner entirely from the first article in the ménù, which he might call clôture de bouche à la radicale. He believed that in the Resolutions which were to follow the one under discussion they might obtain everything that was necessary for amending the Procedure of the House; and, therefore, he thought they ought not to rush headlong on that which was so objectionable as the Rule now proposed. He felt very strongly that they were not being dealt with fairly in having that Resolution forced upon them when, apparently, there was no difference between them as to the way in which they thought the Business of the House should be conducted. He therefore regretted that the Leader of the Opposition had not been consulted on that question; because he felt sure that that right hon. Gentleman would have done all he could to sink mere Party differences and to assist the Government in arriving at some common conclusion which would have been satisfactory to both Parties. The responsibility of making that a Party question really belonged to the Government; because in their autumn speeches it was announced by leading Members of the Ministry that they intended to have the clôture, or something like it. The Government might now obtain a small majority, and their victory, however slight, might be cheered by hon. Gentlemen opposite; but the echo of those cheers would be but as the clank of the chains that would enslave freedom of debate in that House. [A laugh.] The hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), who laughed, should remember that half the benefits of modern legislation had been conferred by minorities who had refused to be put down, and who persevered until they were ultimately successful. The men by whom Catholic Emancipation, the repeal of the Corn Laws, and many other great measures had been persistently advocated might have been treated as "bores" and Obstructives under a system of clôture enforced by a bare majority. The course of the present discussion showed that a different form of the clôture from that now proposed would be sufficient. The speeches of the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) and other hon. Gentlemen opposite indicated that they were favourable to a two-thirds majority, or some other more moderate mode of discovering the sense of the House than the vote of a bare majority. In conclusion, he hoped that, if not in the first division, at least in some of the divisions that would follow, they would still find that there was enough freedom among the Liberal Party to secure the passing of a Resolution which would carry with it the evident sense of the House.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, he would not have intruded on the debate had it not appeared to him that he might perhaps be able to say something that had not been said before, and so avoid those useless repetitions against which these Resolutions were aimed. It might be inferred from some of the Opposition speeches that the Resolution gave the Prime Minister power, for his own purposes, to interpose between the House and a debate, and summarily to close the latter; but on looking at the Resolution he was entirely re-assured, for all that it did was to make the Speaker or the Chairman the judge of the evident sense of the House, and neither could take the initiative without derogation to his high Office if he had failed to perceive or to find out what the evident sense of the House really was. He therefore concluded that it would be impossible for the action spoken about in the Resolution to be taken unless the evidence of the sense of the House was unmistakable and overwhelming. It had never been the practice of the House for a Speaker to take part with the majorities against the minorities. Throughout all the annals of the House of Commons, only one Speaker had failed in his duty to the House, and his consideration for those who spoke in it. The solitary exception occurred in 1629, when Speaker Finch refused to put a Question to the House, because he had received the King's commands, and he got impeached for his pains afterwards. The fact was that the opposition to this Rule was directed against the Chair, and the permanent traditions that had been attached to it. It had been assumed throughout that the Speaker and his successors would fail in their duty to the House; that they would forget the traditional fairness which had always been shown to minorities; that they would neglect the duties intrusted to them; and that the Speaker or his successors would lend themselves, for mere Party purposes, to the worst and most fatal Party purposes. For his own part, he did not believe that the Speakers of the future would be inferior to those of past times in impartially discharging their duties. The Speaker had the right to choose the speakers in a debate. He had never heard of that right being abused; and yet it was quite within the Speaker's power to decline to see those Members who might wish to rise and address the House. It had been assumed that what the Government proposed was a novelty. It was really a revival, in a limited form, of the power which the Speaker formerly possessed, for the Rules of 1610 laid down that the Speaker could put, without debate, the Question to the House, and ask the House whether they would hear the speaker further, or listen to further speeches. It was quite clear, from the works on Parliamentary Procedure, that this right or duty of the Speaker embodied in the ancient Rules was continued and well known until about a century ago. The Government were re-affirming that the Speaker possessed this power of asking the House to determine, without debate, whether, in their opinion, a subject had been sufficiently discussed. The work of Sir Erskine May was the first in which the Rule he had been referring to was left out. It was superseded by an understanding being entered into between the officials and past officials as to the time when a debate should terminate and who should be the speakers. They were told that the Rule now proposed was an invasion of the rights of minorities; but was there any rational person who believed that the Speaker would degrade the dignity of his Office by lending himself to the stifling of a fair debate on any subject, however small the minority might be? It was impossible to believe that the present Speaker or any of his successors would be guilty of such a gross dereliction of duty. The old Rule to which he had referred was still recognized in a lame and halting manner in the Rule passed in February, 1880, for the purpose of applying some remedy for an acknowledged evil. It was true that in the Legislature of the United States one-third of the House was required for the purpose of negating a Motion that the debate be closed, but the Speaker there was chosen on distinct partizan grounds; whereas the Speaker of the House of Commons was never chosen on such grounds. They were told that the country was alive to the serious hindrance which this Rule would be to the freedom of debate. The country was much more alive to the serious hindrance to the progress of Public Business, and they knew very well the source from which these hindrances proceeded. He did not believe that the opportunity for exercising the Rule would be very frequent. There must be manifestations of prodigious impatience before the Speaker would take any step; and he must be further convinced that the time of the House was trifled with—he must, in short, feel that nothing could warrant a continuance of the debate. Though they might not often draw the sword of Justice, it was very desirable that they should have it in their power to do so; and so, though this Rule might not be often used, it was of great importance that they should have such an instrument for maintaining the character of their debates. He himself would have supported the clôture even if it had been in a stronger and more emphatic form.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL said, hon. Members on his side were all anxious that Obstruction should be prevented, and that the Forms of the House should be improved for the facilitating of Business. It had been said that the office of the House was not to speak, but to act. It was, no doubt, important that they should do legislative work; but it was equally important that that should be done in such a way as to satisfy the country that it had been deliberately and well done. It appeared to him that there was a necessity for separating between the intention of this Resolution, and the probable—almost inevitable—effect of its operation. Sometimes it had been defended on the ground of the intention with which it had been brought forward. But at other times they had heard arguments for it which seemed to be based upon the effects which it was expected to produce, and which effects, he thought, were inconsistent with the intention with which it had been brought forward. One very important point was to know what was meant by “the evident sense of the House.” They had an explanation of that phrase from the Prime Minister himself, who, in introducing this subject, had used the expression “the unquestioned will of the House,” and this expression he had explained by adding—“not the will of one Party in the House, or of a mere majority, but what may be called, in the phrase of one of the Resolutions, ‘the evident sense of the House.’” It appeared, therefore, that this phrase—“the evident sense of the House”—meant something more than the will of one Party, or of a mere majority; and they must assume that the intention of the Government was to give effect to that general sense of the House, and to nothing less. But what they complained of was that the Resolution was not consistent with that intention. It was proposed in the Resolution that, in certain circumstances, effect might be given to the will of a mere majority. That, not to speak of other objections, was directly opposed to what they must assume to be the intention of the Government in bringing forward the Resolution. But then it was said that the case of carrying the clôture by a mere majority was not likely to happen. It was sufficient objection, however, if the Rule admitted of it happening. But let them see whether it was an impossible thing that it should happen. The Prime Minister spoke of an objection taken to the Rule in this respect as absurd, and as involving a moral impossibility. The Prime Minister thought it morally impossible that the Speaker, seeing 200 one way and 201 the other way, should take that for the evident sense of the House, and act accordingly. That would, indeed, be morally impossible, as they could not conceive of the Speaker, seeing the House so equally divided, saying that it was the evident sense of the House that the debate should close. But it was possible, and conceivable, that the Chair might make a mistake. He spoke with all respect for the Chair. The Chair might make a mistake in interpreting the impatience of the House. He presumed the desire to stop a debate would be intimated by a manifestation of impatience. But there was the difficulty to be overcome of deciding how much of that impatience was directed against the Member who was addressing, or endeavouring to address, the House, and how much against a continuance of the debate. These were two very different things. Then there was another difficulty in interpreting the preponderance of voices in the House. Sir Erskine May, in 1871, when asked by the Select Committee whether the Speaker or Chairman might be intrusted with a power of putting a Question if, in his opinion, "a decided expression of voices" was in favour of it, replied—"No; because the giving of the voices was so very uncertain and indistinct." If this Resolution were passed, a difficulty of an opposite kind would beset the Chair. Any manifestation of impatience at present was intended to have its effect merely on the Member who was addressing the House. Clamour had no direct influence on the decision of the House; but pass this Resolution, and would not clamour and counter clamour become directly influential? They would then be in danger of having what the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers) described as manifestations of prodigious impatience. They were told there was not now the same loyalty and deference to the general feeling of the House as formerly. He was afraid, if they passed this Resolution, there would be, at least, no improvement in that respect. Then, it was said, why should not a majority rule? and they had been told how many important measures had been carried by a mere majority. Well, the answer was obvious. The majority, certainly, might rule; but after debate. There was an implied condition in their proceedings that there must be full debate before there was a decision. If it was said that on this principle the House might never come to a decision at all—that a debate might be carried on ad infinitum—it might be replied that the one extreme was not more absurd than the other, and that on the principle of it being in the power of the majority to stop a debate when it pleased, why not dispense with debate altogether? Why not, after ascertaining that there was a majority, pass all the Bills introduced by the Government, without debate? It was said that, after all, the introduction of the clôture was not a formidable thing, for they virtually had it at present; but the clôture they had now was by consent of Parties—a very different thing from the Rule proposed by the Government. On every ground it was desirable, if there was to be clôture at all, that it should be by the act of the general body of the House, and nothing less—desirable for the influence of the Chair, desirable for the amenities of Parliamentary life, and desirable for the value of Parliamentary decisions. If a debate was brought to a close by a vote representing the general sense of the House, it would be accepted as an act of the House; but if it were closed by a vote representing less than that—a vote representing the will of one Party, or a mere majority—then it would be received as a Party move, and would be resented accordingly. Why, then, if clôture was to be introduced, was it not proposed on the lines of the Order of last Session, requiring a majority of 3 to 1? The Prime Minister objected to "an artificial majority constructed in ingenious ways." That, he said, did very well last year, the features of the occasion being peculiar; but was not the clôture intended now only for peculiar and extraordinary occasions? This, at least, might be said—that to adopt the principle of last Session's Order, and require a majority of 3 to 1, would be consistent with what they assumed was the intention of Government—with making the Rule applicable only to the occasion when there was in its favour the evident sense of the House. And yet, while the condition of requiring a certain proportionate majority [was set aside as inapplicable to present circumstances, this very Resolution contained in one part of it the condemned principle. The House was already familiar with the eccentricities of the arithmetical puzzle contained in the Resolution. He would not refer to that matter further than to call the attention of the House to the curious result that, according to this Resolution, while a minority, however small, might successfully resist a majority of 100, and while a minority of 40 would successfully resist a majority of 200, a minority of 200 would be helpless against any majority, even against a majority of only 201. The Home Secretary compared the clôture to the hydrants and hose which were had ready in case of fire; but the illustration was not altogether perfect. Hydrants and hose were not likely to be used except in case of fire; there was no temptation to use them—there was every inducement not to use them—until they were absolutely necessary. But it was different with the clôture. There might be a desire to put it in force before there was necessity for it. There might be a simulation of fire for the sake of bringing the hose into play. What was to be feared was that under the operation of this Resolution, if it were carried, Parliaments might come to forget the intention with which the clôture was introduced; and, being found a convenient mode of extinguishing debates, it might be put in use whenever it suited the convenience of the Party which had the majority. But was the clôture necessary? The principal evils which obstructed Business were to be remedied, as had been shown, by the other Resolutions, on which there would not be much difficulty in bringing the House to a general understanding, and which need not be, and were not likely to be, discussed in a Party spirit. Several experienced Members had expressed the opinion that if these other Resolutions were passed, it would not be necessary to introduce the clôture in any form whatever; and certainly it would appear reasonable not to make the clôture the first step, but a last resort, and, therefore, allow it to be one of those measures which the House might adopt in future years, if the other reforms which were about to be proposed, and on which the House was pretty well agreed, should unfortunately prove to be inadequate. For these reasons, he should vote for the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott).

MR. ANDERSON said, he was not going to answer the speech of the hon. Member who had just sat down, as he agreed with almost every word of it, although speaking from the opposite side of the House. A few hours ago he heard an eloquent speech from the hon. Member for Bath (Mr. Wodehouse), and he had the credit of introducing, while attempting to advocate clôture, the strongest argument against it that any Member had yet propounded from that side of the House. The hon. Member said that the repugnance to the clôture evidenced on the Conservative side of the House would end the moment that Party had power to inflict the clôture on a Liberal minority. That argument, he thought, used in favour of the clôture, ought to weigh very much with Members on the Liberal side of the House against it. It was because he remembered what power the Conservative majority had between 1874-80 that he was so adverse to giving that arbitrary power to any Government whatever. In that Parliament he was himself what he supposed advocates of the clôture would call an Obstructive. He recollected very well, in the first Session of 1880, spending a whole Wednesday in speaking himself, or getting other Scotch Members to speak, against the proposal of the Tory Government to force upon the country the legalizing of the use of cabs at elections. Well, if the Tory Government had had the power of clôture they could have shut up the debate immediately. His obstruction on that occasion was perfectly successful, for he succeeded in exempting Scotland and Ireland from the iniquity of having cabs thrust upon the boroughs at election times. Another occasion was the Cattle Diseases Bill, in which he had assisted the President of the Board of Trade and the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland in a very considerable amount of obstruction against that measure. They believed that the measure would have the effect of raising the price of the food of the people; and they were successful in modifying it. But if there had been the power of clôture they would not have been able to do any of those things. He admitted the position he held was an extremely painful one. He did not like to speak against the Party with whom he generally acted. The other day a youthful Member, the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. George Russell), had the audacity to say that such Members were deserters of their Party. Deserters were those who changed their opinions; not those who clung to them. Every leading Member on the Front Bench was committed in opposition to the clôture. The Prime Minister, by his

Nineteenth Century article, was committed. [Mr. GLADSTONE: No, no!] He would withdraw that statement, as the Prime Minister was best entitled to interpret what he really meant. He could only say many understood it to be a condemnation of the clôture. Well, other Members on the Front Bench were committed against the clôture by the Committee of 1878. He himself sat on that Committee, and remembered perfectly well, when the clôture was proposed, the Gentleman who proposed it (Mr. Knatchbull-Hugessen) was almost alone in its support. What did they see now? That Gentleman now wrote to The Times to say that if he had been permitted to express his full views on that occasion it would have been shown that the clôture he proposed was of a very much milder character than the one now under consideration. The unanimity of that Committee, drawn from all parts of the House, showed that there would have been unanimity of the House against it, if the clôture on that occasion had been proposed in the House. He thought, therefore, he was entitled to say he was not changing his opinions or deserting his Party. It was the Leaders who were deserting their old opinions, and who were forcing the Party at the point of the bayonet to do a thing distasteful to them—a thing that was not truly Liberal in principle. ["No, no!"] Hon. Members said he was wrong in that. Well, hon. Members of the Liberal Party, who thought coercion and clôture were Liberal principles, were welcome to their opinion. Well, there had been a great many fallacies imported into the debate. On the last night of the debate they had the Home Secretary, whose argument was most fallacious. The Home Secretary insisted there was nothing before the House but the original Resolution of the Prime Minister and the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott). He said some hon. Members wanted a two-thirds or a three-fourths majority; but it was no use to discuss that, as it was not before the House and could not be brought forward, because the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton was a mere negation; and if they rejected the Resolution they could do nothing else than accept the negation. That he could show was a complete fallacy, although the Prime Minister seemed to approve of the sentiments of the Home Secretary. The Speaker had ruled that when the Question was about to be put, he would put it in such a way that, even if accepted, it would still be in the power of the House to introduce a two-thirds or three-fourths Amendment afterwards. Supposing, however, even the Resolution was negatived, then the Amendment would become the substantive Resolution, and might be amended by putting in a two-thirds or three-fourths provision, or in any way they pleased. Therefore, whether the first Question put to the House was affirmed or rejected, the House could still amend the proposal, and was not shut up to the negation. He quoted the Rule from Sir Erskine May, page 301, to prove the fallacy used by the Home Secretary. He had said that he felt himself in a painful position. He had listened with much attention to the speech of the Prime Minister, earnestly hoping that he would be able to provide him with some argument to his conscience that would enable him to vote for this Resolution. But he had been unfortunate. He failed to find any. He recognized, as the Prime Minister did, the difficulty in which the House was placed, partly from having too much to do, and partly from Obstruction. There was a necessity, he recognized, for great changes in the Rules, and he recognized that many of the Rules proposed were exceedingly good, and would, directly and indirectly, deal both with Obstruction and with the difficulty of having too much to do. But what he failed to recognize was that the clôture was in any sense necessary. The clôture seemed to him to deal not so much with Obstruction as with that wholesome opposition which was the life and soul of government by Party. By that means the minority of this year became the majority of future years, and expressed itself at last as the will of the nation. It was not desirable that that should be done away with. The Prime Minister's arguments were unanswerable as regarded the necessity for some change in the Rules. But not only he, but most of those who had followed in the same direction since, had supported the clôture simply because some change was necessary. Hon. and right hon. Members on both sides of the House agreed that great changes were necessary; but that did not at all prove that the clôture was the right remedy. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) said that the question before the House was whether the existing limitations of debate were sufficient for the purposes in view. Well, that was not, he maintained, the question before the House at present. The question that was before the House was whether the clôture was the right remedy. That, and that alone, was the point they ought to keep to in arguing this matter. He had been at a loss to know what the strong desire for the clôture really meant. Did it mean that as soon as they got the 1st Rule it was to be used to rush through the House all the rest of the Rules? Or did it mean that when they got the 1st Rule all the other Rules were to be dropped as useless? The Prime Minister had failed even to show any good reason for placing this clôture Rule first. He had not justified that. He had failed to show that, even if he had had the clôture from the beginning of the Session, he would have saved one hour from the many that had been wasted. If he could show that he would have saved time he would regard that as the strongest argument that could be used against the clôture, because it would prove that they were disposed to use it improperly. At no time during this Session could it have been used without hardship and oppression. If, however, some of the other Rules of the Prime Minister had been passed at the beginning of the Session, particularly Rules 2 and 12, which could have been done with comparative ease, the House would have been relieved of a great deal of that Obstruction and loss of time from which it had since suffered. That would have enabled them immediately to enter upon a position of comparative relief. They would have removed a good deal of Obstruction, and that loss of time from which the House had suffered so much. He saw no other ground the Government could have in asking the clôture than to pass a new Coercion Act for Ireland. Unless that was their object he failed to see any other. It would have been well for them to have tried some beneficent legislation before confessing that they could do nothing without the clôture. They did very well without it in 1880 and in 1881, and with the assistance of the Prime Minister's other Rules, leaving out the clôture, they would have sufficient control of the time of the House. They were told that the clôture worked well in other Parliaments, and a number of hon. Members had cited America, for instance; but even if it did well in other Parliaments, he did not think it was any proof to take an isolated Rule and bring it away from all its surroundings, and say that because it worked well under certain conditions elsewhere it would work well here. The curse of their Procedure was not the number of speeches, but the length of the speeches. It was what the President of the Local Government Board called that night "unrestricted loquacity," the loquacity of such Members say, as the Attorney General for Ireland, who spoke for three hours, and would not consent that a single sentence of his speech should be delivered during the dinner hour. He did not wish to say a single disrespectful word of the Attorney General for Ireland. His speeches had a great deal in them, and they sparkled with "bulls;" but no amount of brilliancy would redeem a speech of three hours from the charge of taking up too much time. He should like to see that checked in some way. He should like to see restriction that was not suppression. The clôture that was now proposed was a suppression. The constituencies were constantly sending up to the House a great number of Members who were not only capable of addressing the House intelligently, but whom their constituents desired to do that; and as they could not add to the time at their disposal they were bound to apportion it with some kind of equality, so that a greater number of speakers might have some small slice of it. He had mentioned America. Hon. Members were not aware, probably, that there were means in America for reducing this unrestricted loquacity. In America a speaker was allowed to read a few words of a large manuscript speech, and thereupon to move that the speech be held as spoken. Thus time was saved. The next day in the Public Record the speech appeared as if spoken at full length. When hon. Members advocated the clôture here they had better take this accompaniment of it and see how they would like it then. No doubt this cutting down of long speeches saved so much time that it was not necessary so often to apply the clôture, and so it was said to work well in America. It seemed to him, if they were to give an arrogant majority this power of clôture, they would need to have shorter Parliaments than they had now—[Opposition cheers—]—to make sure that the arrogant majority was really interpreting the will of the people. He saw that the Leader of the Opposition cheered that sentiment; but when he was Leader of the House during the Tory Government, from 1874 to 1880, those on the Liberal side of the House thought that during that term of six years the right hon. Gentleman and his Party did not represent the feelings of the people. It was because that happened then, and might happen again, that he thought that if the majority was to have this power of clôture, they ought to have along with it shorter Parliaments, in order that the will of the people should be better known. They might also be obliged to ballot for who was to have the honour of addressing the House, because the natural tendency of the clôture would be not to shorten speeches, but to lengthen them. As a smaller number of speeches were to be heard, the result would be that the chance of catching the Speaker's eye would be rarer than ever, and those who were lucky enough to catch it would trespass more upon the time. There was another objection he had to the clôture, and that was that it would tend more to the practice of arranged debates—mere tournaments between the two Front Benches—in which private Members would be absolutely nowhere. The other night the hon. Member for Aylesbury (Mr. George Russell), in a clever and eloquent speech, but sadly wanting in knowledge of the ways of the House, drew a beautiful but illusive picture of what the clôture would do for private Members. He said he had been writhing under the dark chain of silence that had been inflicted upon private Members, and that the clôture would relieve them from this. He (Mr. Anderson) should like to know what it was to do for private Members except obliterate them altogether. It was never intended to do anything for private Members. Even without the knowledge of the ways of the House, which longer experience of it would have given him, the hon. Member might have learned sufficient from the speech of the Secretary of State for India, who not only told them what he wanted to do for private Members, but even gave them a proscribed list. To be sure, the name of the hon. Member for Aylesbury did not appear in that list; but he could assure the hon. Member that if at any future time he should venture to have sufficient courage to act an independent part, and not go always slavishly with his Party, he might very soon find his name on the proscribed list. The clôture never was intended to do anything for private Members, and it never would do anything for them. Another thing he had to complain of was that they were not allowed to consider the Rule upon its own merits. He thought he had shown what the feeling of the House was in old time against it. If they were allowed now to vote for it on its own merits it would be sent almost unanimously out of the House. They were told they must consider it on something totally alien to its own merits—namely, the merits of the Ministry that supported it. That was the point of view from which he was bound now to consider it. He admitted that he considered it from that point of view with very great pain. He saw the Government which he had always admired more than any other, and which he believed could more than any other do good service to the country. He saw them deserting old principles, and aiming at arbitrary power, and must vote, he was told, with them on pain of losing his seat, of having a Dissolution, or of what was of infinitely more consequence, the country losing the services of a great and wise Government. That put him in a great difficulty indeed, and it put a great many other Members in a great difficulty. He was told the other day that not less than 100 Members of the Liberal Party disliked this clôture very much, and that if only it was to be decided on its own merits they would vote against it; but what they had to consider was this—that they saw the Tory Party, whom they did not usually look upon as defenders of popular right of any kind, posing on this occasion as champions of freedom of speech. He might think they were quite right in doing so, and yet have some little suspicion of their motives. He might fancy, indeed, that their zeal was quickened into this action by the belief that they had found a weak place in the armour of the Government, and that they thought it right to press the weapon home. They had, indeed, found a weak place; but he did not feel able to assist them in pressing the weapon home, and join in a vote which was to turn out the Government. At the same time, he could not but say he thought it was insane folly on the part of the Government to have staked their existence on a question of mere Procedure, and especially on such a question as this. He had no doubt they would win; they would equally have won had he voted against them—but he did not, on the other hand, think he could vote for a usurpation of power which no Government ought to have. They had placed him, therefore, in the very uncomfortable and unusual position of going out of the House on the division. The Government would gain the division; but when they gained it they would have nothing to rejoice over, for they would know they had gained it by putting an unfair restriction upon their followers. These things did not do much good for the Party. He believed that if the Government got the clôture by these means it would not do them much good.

MR. H. S. NORTHCOTE regretted that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Anderson) had not the manliness to record his vote according to his convictions. He (Mr. Northcote) had no intention of expressing an opinion whether the clôture should be applied to the House or not. But he should like to point out two facts which had struck him as being important. The first was that the Resolution, if carried, would not affect small minorities, and possibly the factious minorities of the House, but rather the regular bulk of the Opposition, against whom no serious charge was brought by the Government. The second was that the Resolution would take away from the Leader of the Opposition the only effectual means of control he possessed over his supporters, which was that, hitherto, from his position in the House, he had been able to hold over them the ægis of protection against tyrannical majorities. He would no longer have that power if this Resolution was passed, and the effect of it would be to reduce the Front Opposition Bench to very much the same position as that occupied by individual Members sitting in any portion of the House. Another and an even more serious objection to the adoption of the Resolution in its present form was that it disregarded the fact that the Business of the House was still conducted with considerable regard for the old Forms; that there was a desire that opposition should not be carried beyond certain limits, which, although not well defined, were well understood. But if the New Rules were accepted, everything that was not forbidden by that Code would be admissible. He thought that the Government had so far departed from the old custom of the House as to inflict on Gentlemen sitting on the Opposition side the unmerited humiliation of entirely disregarding not only the loyal attitude they had assumed during the whole time since they had been in Opposition, but of their respect for the unwritten Rules for the conduct of Parliamentary Business. With respect to the course of public opinion, it was contended by the supporters of the Resolution that it was brought forward and would be adopted in deference to public opinion out-of-doors. He contended that the Opposition for the time being were, or rather should be, more directly influenced by public opinion than the Government of the day; and for the very natural and obvious reason that the minority of the day was seeking by all means to convert itself into a majority, and he did not see how that could be done except by following and adapting itself to the course of public feeling. He hoped they should hear no more of the suggestion made by the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India about closing the mouths of individual Members; otherwise it was quite conceivable that should a change of circumstances place the Conservatives on the Treasury Bench a similar Rule might be applied, he would not say to the noble Marquess, but to some Members of his Party. At all events, that was a dangerous doctrine for a Minister of the Crown to give utterance to—that private Members were to be silenced, because they annoyed the Government of the day. As regarded the power of the Speaker, he felt perfectly satisfied that there would be nothing to complain of while the present right hon. Gentleman occupied the Chair. But if, say, the noble Lord the Member for Flintshire (Lord Richard Grosvenor), who now held the same Office which the present Speaker formerly held, were elected to the Chair, many Members of the Opposition would seriously object to arm him with the great powers which this Resolution would place in his hands. Under these circumstances, while fully recognizing the necessity for materially reforming the Procedure in Public Business, he (Mr. H. S. Northcote) had no hesitation in giving his support to the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott).

MR. WHITBREAD said, as to the suggestion that the debate had taken a Party turn, those who had much experience in the House found that questions did, sooner or later, become Party questions. He had no complaint to make of the manner in which the Opposition had met the proposal of the Government. He had expected the Opposition to contest such a proposal. What he did think was, that the fears which they entertained, and which they had expressed, were exaggerated, and that the estimate which they had formed of the real evil with which the House had to contend was totally inadequate. They had been told that the Prime Minister ought to have consulted the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote), and that some mutual agreement ought to have been arrived at by means of a Committee upon the alteration in the Forms of Procedure. But what had they been doing for the last 20 years but to attempt by this means to arrive at an understanding between the two sides of the House; and how far had they got? Anyone who had been a student of the Reports of the Committees on this subject would have seen that there had been one continual effort to try and arrive at some compromise; and then the weak, and almost miserable, outcome of the Committees' deliberations was further watered down before any Government ventured to propose measures to the House. He was very much struck with some of the speeches which had fallen from hon. Members opposite. What drafts on the imagination had been made, and what a total disregard there had been of the real safeguards which surrounded the Resolution! Had not the proceedings of that House become a reproach to it? Of late years all-night Sittings had become a necessity if the majority desired to carry into effect those measures for the advocacy of which they had been returned to Parliament.

Mr. H. S. Northcote

But could anybody conceive the amount of disgust with which reasonable and intelligent men outside those walls looked upon the methods employed in that House for carrying on the Business of the nation? Did anybody deny that the most severe blow was struck at Parliamentary institutions when that which should be a contest of reason was brought down to be a contest of bare physical endurance? They had had abundant experience within the last two or three years that those who were friendly to a measure were absolutely compelled to restrain themselves, and not criticize any of its details; because the only way by which they could hope to see a measure, in the main principles of which they agreed, pass into law was by keeping an unbroken silence. If they had been able freely to criticize the great Irish Act of last year, there were many blots which had been found since which might have been avoided; but that they were compelled, if they wished to see that great Act pass into law at all, to keep silence, and let those minor points go by. If a debate was to be brought to a conclusion by some power, he failed to see that there could be any process more favourable to a minority for bringing it to a close than that now before it. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) talked about the power being in the hands of the Government; but where did he find in the Resolution that the power was placed in the hands of the Government? On the other hand, many hon. Members had seen danger in placing the initiative in the hands of the Speaker or the Chairman. Those Gentlemen thought it would have been better to place it in some other Member of the House, so that when he interposed the interposition should be on behalf of the minority. But the form of the Resolution had been chosen advisedly. If some other person were chosen for that purpose, in a doubtful case the Speaker might refer the matter to the decision of the House. But when the Speaker undertook the full responsibility of taking the initiative, when he had no Motion behind which to shelter himself, he would feel bound to act with caution. The Resolution was a permissive one. The Speaker was not bound to put the Question. The hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) had said that the word "may" in the Resolution was the same as "must." But no Speaker or Chairman would so interpret it. Having that responsibility, the Speaker would decline to act unless he were satisfied that the question had really been sufficiently debated, and would not proceed merely on the "evident sense of the House." Another safeguard lay in the position and duties of the Leader of the House. Before the Rule could be abused to Party or improper ends, the Leader of the House would have to combine with the Speaker to abuse it. The hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) had said that in the discussion of Party questions fair play vanished. He thought, on the contrary, that the spirit of fair play was, above all things, eminently characteristic of the proceedings of that House. Any Ministry who ventured to misuse such an instrument as the first of these Resolutions would soon find its followers deserting it. The immediate result would be that the Government adopting such a course would find all its own measures blocked. The Opposition would place Amendment after Amendment on the Paper, so that if the clôture were applied to one debate, debates would be indefinitely raised on numerous Amendments, so as to put the Government so misusing its power in a worse position than if it had never applied the Rule. But, it was asked, why place the power in the hands of a simple majority; why not require a two-thirds or three-fourths majority? The first reason against this proposition was that it was opposed to the invariable rule and practice of Parliament in all other matters. There was danger in departing from a long-established and Constitutional usage. His second reason was that in such a case the minority might find itself hopelessly crushed. He had much greater dislike to the suppression of small minorities than to the silencing of a powerful and numerous minority. It might very conceivably be the wish of 19-20ths of the House that the debate should close when the question had by no means been sufficiently discussed. His third reason was that such an arrangement would really put the power in the hands of the Opposition. It would be for the Opposition to allow or refuse the clôture, and the inevitable result would be a system of bargaining between the Opposition and the Ministry. He did not mean that the right hon.

Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) would openly across the Table make propositions to the Leader of the House, or that he would employ such opportunities improperly. But unquestionably bargains, or tacit arrangements of a mischievous character, would, from time to time, be entered into. He would state frankly that he did not expect too much from that Rule. The Rule must be considered as a part of their Procedure, and not as an isolated Rule. They purposed to take away from the Obstructives some of the weapons with which their hands were most familiar, and to prevent the House from drifting into aimless discussions accidentally, which were usually a mere waste of time. It was proposed that when the House, after much long-suffering, pronounced its censure upon some offending Member, that censure should be felt. Oppressive Rules were part of the necessity of the case, though they must not look to such Rules for the despatch of Business. For the more speedy and the better despatch of Business they must look to two things—one the spirit of industry in the House, and the other the expansion of the powers of the House. For his part, he looked to the two Rules which stood at the end of all with the most hope, if the Government would consent to share the work among the whole of the House, and not to give it to a section. If Obstruction were to be really put down, it must be as much by the general co-operation of the House as by any Rule. There was some danger of a feeling springing up of a friendly neutrality to Obstruction; there was some danger of hon. Members thinking that if they did not openly connive at Obstruction, and did not openly engage in it, they could remain in a merely passive state. In his opinion, no neutrality was possible in this matter. No one really anxious for the economy of public time could be neutral with regard to the waste of it. They might fairly say in this case that those who were not with them in the saving of public time were against them. What remedies were proposed by the other side? The right hon. Baronet the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), in a very temperate speech, had admitted that some power must be found for closing debates which were unduly prolonged; and the remedy he suggested was contained in the Rules which followed this. No doubt there were, to some extent, remedies against Obstruction; but they were mainly remedies against the offender. The speech of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India had been somewhat misinterpreted. The hon. Member for Exeter (Mr. Northcote) imagined that the noble Marquess had advocated closing the mouths of hon. Members for the purpose of putting an end to a debate. That was what the noble Marquess expressed himself as anxious to avoid. He said he thought it better for them to put an end to a long debate by the adoption of this Rule rather than by closing the lips of hon. Members. It should be remembered that Obstruction had a tendency to spread. It was perfectly possible for 20 or 30 hon. Members to prolong a debate unduly without personally offending against the Rules of the House. If 20 or 30 hon. Members agreed to prolong the debate simply by repeating the same idea, so long as the speeches were in accordance with the Rules of the House it would be impossible for them individually to be stopped by the Chair. There had been no attempt on the other side to grapple with the real difficulty. Much had been said as to the suspension of liberty of debate; but no real attempt had been made to meet the difficulty of an unduly prolonged debate. He would remind the House of what took place last year, when, after an excessively long discussion, the Speaker interposed on his own authority, and took the very grave responsibility of closing the debate. Then the Speaker appealed to the House for directions, and that appeal was now responded to on the other side by the refusal to give him directions for his guidance in the future. Hon. Members on the other side simply asked the House to shrink from taking upon itself the responsibility, and to leave it upon its officers. He would ask whether it was a generous way of dealing with the appeal of the Chair? Had hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite reflected upon the advice they were giving the House when they proposed to leave the Speaker and the Chairman of Ways and Means in the same position in which they were placed last year when they appealed to the House for Rules for their guidance? He did not find in the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire any proposal on this point.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that his argument was that the adoption of the Rule for adjournment would have entirely put an end to unduly protracted Sittings.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that it was perfectly possible for 20 hon. Members to be engaged in Obstruction, and to keep the House sitting for 24 hours by repeating the same arguments, without being guilty of any transgression of the Rules.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS observed, that he had also contended that that would be met by the other Rule, by which repetition was not to be allowed.

MR. WHITBREAD said, that that was idle repetition. That Rule would not meet the case, because it could not be said that it was repetition for one hon. Member to use the same argument as had been used by another hon. Member. Was the course recommended by hon. Gentlemen opposite a proper answer to the appeal by the Chair for directions for future guidance? All that was proposed was, practically, to leave the Speaker in the same position as before, and to permit him again to take the responsibility of acting when the occasion should arise. It was with the utmost pain that he had come to the conclusion that their Rules were no longer sufficient to meet the case; but it was the sincerity of their convictions on that side of the House as to the necessity for change which induced them to support this proposal. He had clung almost desperately to the hope that they might be able to get on without change; but the events of the last two or three years had driven him slowly and reluctantly to the conclusion that the time had come when an alteration was absolutely necessary. After the 41 hours' Sitting, he was convinced of the necessity of some such change as was now proposed. The Rules under which the House was governed were good, no doubt, but were not perfect. They were the outcome of the experience and the wisdom of those who preceded them in that House; and, in his opinion, they should be sorry successors of those men if, in their day, when the necessity for change had been proved, they set up those Rules as idols to be blindly worshipped, and refused to change them. He should support these Resolutions in the hope that more, perhaps, by their insertion amongst the Standing Orders than by their frequent application, they might gradually bring back to the House some measure of that self-restraint which, if it had not lost, it was in danger of losing; in the hope that they might give them some of their old aptitude for the discharge of Business; and in the hope that they might enable them once again to take a firm grasp of the affairs of this great nation.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY remarked, that the hon. Member for Bedford, who had just addressed the House, was always regarded as an authority on such a subject; and he (Mr. M'Carthy), in common with many others, listened to his speech with attention and respect. But that speech lost much of its value as a contribution to the present debate, inasmuch as it was given up wholly to the consideration of the general necessity for some change in the Rules of Procedure, or in the system of conducting the Business of the House. The hon. Member did not apply himself to prove a necessity for this Rule of clôture. The hon. Member had said that on the Opposition side of the House Members had no adequate idea of the difficulty of getting through the Business, while they had a very extravagant notion of the danger of this Rule of clôture. He (Mr. M'Carthy) replied that he had an adequate idea of the difficulty of getting through their Business. He would even go further, and admit that it was impossible adequately to discharge the Business which that House ought to do under the present system of arrangement. If the time were fitting, he could state his idea of the proper and the only means by which the House might relieve itself of its present great burden. What he did not hear from the hon. Member for Bedford was any suggestion as to how this Rule of clôture would enable the House to get through the Business better. He gave an illustration in support of his arguments which certainly seemed unlucky. He spoke of the Irish Land Bill of last Session, and remarked that many Members who might have made important contributions to the debates upon it, and might even have re-moulded much of the Bill, could not speak, because they knew that if they did someone else must be prevented from speaking, or possibly be induced to reply. If ever there was a debate of great and varied interest, in which there was no Obstruction, it was the debate on the Land Bill; and for the Party to which he belonged he said—though he supposed they were considered responsible for every delay of Business—that they kept silent during that debate except when it was absolutely necessary to speak. They purposely left the speaking to two or three Members who fully understood the measure; while he and many others took little or no part in the debate. How could the clôture, suppose it then existed, have assisted that Bill or the House of Commons? On that point the hon. Gentleman who last spoke failed to give them any information whatever. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board addressed himself almost altogether to the task of re-assuring hon. Members on the Conservative side of the House against the dread that they might be suppressed or put down by this clôture Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman was considering the case of a minority approaching near in numerical strength to the Government majority; and, while he evidently considered he was bound to re-assure that strong minority, he did not seem to care how sharply or how suddenly the ruling power might deal with a small minority. That small uninfluential minority, he (Mr. M'Carthy) thought, was the Party which it was the business of the great and powerful Party to protect. The men who came into Office when the present occupants went out, the Party which carried on a regular oscillation from Opposition to Ministerial Benches, needed no protection, for under no circumstances could they be effectually silenced; but a small and weak minority, consisting of men who were without influence or power in the House, and which could be crushed by a bare majority as well as by a union of the strength of both Parties, did not seem to be at all considered by the right hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Bedford had complained that no hon. Members from that side of the House had offered any suggestion for an improvement in the conduct of debate. It did not seem that much encouragement was extended to them for such a purpose by the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, in the boldest, plainest, bluntest style, and in that imperious way which was his peculiarity and so well became him, informed the House that the Government had made up their minds to put their foot down, and would listen to no suggestion. If the Government wanted to make progress with Business, putting their feet down was not the way to do so, unless they took their feet up again very quickly and got into movement. His words were—

“The Government have put forward a plan. They have given considerable attention to that plan, and, having done so, we do not intend to produce any other.”

Such was the Government's announcement to the House. The Government on this question had said their last word. In vain might other Members talk and argue. Their arguments would be useless. The Government had made up their minds, and the House must have their proposal or nothing. So far, therefore, as the Government was concerned hon. Members might avoid all this waste of time and save themselves the trouble of hearing or making speeches, and go at once to a division on this question. If that were so, it illustrated forcibly the spirit and temper in which the Government might be induced to use this clôture if they got it. As their minds were made up and unchangeable regarding the form and substance of this Rule, so their minds might be made up as to the peremptory manner in which it would be convenient to crush a small minority. He was inclined to compare the attitude of the Government with that of the hero of Marryatt's Pasha of Many Tales. The Pasha, who was the hero of that story, had a great deal of eloquence himself, but was impatient of unrestricted loquacity in others—perhaps there were great personages with similar qualities in other places as well as in Turkey. When a suitor came to this Pasha and began to plead his cause, behind him stood an executioner, and the moment the Pasha had heard enough, or the suitor went into any needless repetition, the Pasha gave a signal, down came the executioner's axe, and the unhappy suitor was cut off in the flower of his youth and the middle of his sentence. It seemed to him that the minority in that House was invited to occupy the position of the suitor. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary, towards the close of his speech, devoted some attention to the Irish Party—the Party which was supposed to stand with the executioner behind it—and criticized, among other things connected with that Party, the manifesto it recently issued. He found fault with its form and its substance, and said he never before saw any document like it. He was not going to follow the right hon. and learned Gentleman's criticism of that manifesto. The right hon. and learned Gentleman understood better than he (Mr. M'Carthy) the etiquette of political documents; but he was very much mistaken when he endeavoured to point out that the Irish Party stated, in that manifesto, they were opposing this Closure Rule because they believed that if they turned out the present Government they would never again be subjected to interference with their speech in that House. Those who drew up the Circular condemned by the right hon. and learned Gentleman never thought of making any statement so absurd. The right hon. and learned Gentleman said the Whip had not been sent to him, and that, therefore, he could not be supposed to know all about it. True, the Whip was not sent to the right hon. and learned Gentleman; but when Gentlemen undertook to speak in that House of any document, they were supposed to have first read it carefully, and to be able to speak accurately of its contents. The right hon. and learned Gentleman thought that in that Whip he had discovered a great conspiracy. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was always discovering great conspiracies. He had a sort of divining power, which enabled him to perceive conspiracies not visible to anyone else. In the middle of the 17th century there was a remarkable character named Matthew Hopkins, who was notorious as a witch-finder. He could discover witchcraft when everyone else failed to detect it; he could detect a witch under the most subtle disguises. Well, as regarded political conspiracies and combinations, he thought the right hon. and learned Gentleman was a modern Matthew Hopkins. But as Matthew Hopkins was not always right in his instinct, and sometimes mistook a chance and harmless gathering of persons for an assembly of witches, so the right hon.

and learned Gentleman was not always right in his detection of political conspiracies. He could relieve the right hon. and learned Gentleman's mind by informing him that there was no conspiracy, coalition, or even arrangement between the Conservatives and the Irish Party on this question. The Irish Members had their own reasons for opposing this measure, and the Conservatives had theirs, and both were endeavouring to accomplish the same end. If the result of this division should be to turn out the Government, and if the Tory Party came into power, they would be under no obligation whatever to the Irish Party; and if within a fortnight of their accession to Office they should propose a Coercion Bill twice as severe as the one at present in force, they could say to the Members from Ireland that they had not given the slightest pledge that they would take any other course. So much, therefore, for the grand discovery of a conspiracy between the two Opposition Parties. He would turn now to the most important speech in the debate, that of the Prime Minister. The Prime Minister had divided his remarks into two parts—those which dealt with Procedure, and those which referred to the “devolution or delegation” of the powers of the House. In the first part of his speech he dealt specially with Obstruction. How was the plan he proposed to the House justified by that part of his speech? In the first place, it justified some change in the Rules by referring to the great growth of Public Business in recent years. He admitted that in that respect the right hon. Gentleman thoroughly established his case. Nothing could be clearer than the fact that Public Business had grown enormously during the past few years; and, under existing circumstances, it must continue to grow, until it choked up the entire avenue of Procedure, and made some alteration inevitable. But the right hon. Gentleman went on to deal with Obstruction, and upon that he rested his main argument in favour of the peculiar change proposed in the Resolution. He (Mr. M'Carthy) was anxious to deal with the subject of Obstruction in the fairest spirit. He did not admit that Obstruction in this Parliament had been worse than Obstruction in the last. He even thought the late Government had Obstruction of a more difficult and perplexing kind to deal with than that which had come before the present Parliament. One reason which made it more difficult and more complicated was that those who were supposed to be obstructing then had the valuable assistance of some of the ablest and most eminent Members of the English Liberal Party. In some of the most protracted efforts against certain obnoxious measures which were then before the House, those who were now charged with Obstruction had the wise counsel, the close sympathy, and the constant support of two or three Members of Her Majesty's present Administration. He did not find fault with those Gentlemen for having acted in that manner. They acted on high principles, and with a perfect sense of justice, in opposing measures, some of which had since been proved to be dangerous to the country, and some of which had been abandoned. But while they were perfectly justified in the course they took then, he thought they were hardly justified in the course they were taking now. In considering Obstruction in the last Parliament, it should be remembered, too, that no measure was ever introduced with reference to Ireland so arbitrary, so obnoxious in its character, as the present Coercion Act, nor was the local administration of Ireland anything like so bad as it was under the present Government. Under the circumstances he could well understand how, to the official mind, there might appear to be less excuse for Obstruction in the last Parliament than in the present. But the Prime Minister distinctly narrowed his case, as far as Obstruction was concerned, to the proceedings of the present Parliament. He said that until that Parliament came into existence his mind was not made up. The right hon. Gentleman, referring to the obstruction of the South African Bill and the Army Discipline Bill in the last Parliament, said that—

“The two great subjects on which Obstruction was experienced in that Parliament were the subjects of the South African Bill and Army Flogging. But in both of them the great length of the debates which occurred was mixed with circumstances which make it not easy to form a perfectly accurate and impartial estimate of the obstructive forces that were put in action (ironical cheers and counter cheers), because—I believe I am right in regard to the South African Bill, and I know I am right in regard to the Army Discipline Bill, in saying that very important changes were introduced into these measures, and were the fruit and progress of long debates, and where that is so, it is not fair to drive home without a great deal of hesitation the charge of Obstruction."

The present Parliament, therefore, was the one to which the Prime Minister's remarks about Obstruction were particularly addressed. And here he would say a word about the manner in which the Urgency Rules were obtained. The Prime Minister declared that they were passed by the help of an extraordinary error in tactics on the part of a certain number of Members of the House. He said—

"They contrived to place themselves in such a position that we were able to deal with them in a single division; otherwise we might have been occupied with divisions throughout the night, and at the close of them would have been totally out of condition for dealing with the question of Urgency."—[3 Hansard, cclxvi. 1144.]

The occasion to which the right hon. Gentleman referred was that upon which a number of Irish Members were suspended in a cluster, and not one after another. He might tell the right hon. Gentleman, as a matter of some little historical interest, that they committed no error in tactics at all. They were perfectly well aware that they could have occupied the whole night if they chose to take a division upon every suspension; but they were not concerned in occupying any more time in that demonstration than was occupied in the actual act of their expulsion. They desired to make a protest in the most dignified way possible against an intolerable and arbitrary Act, and they thought that could be done with more emphasis, with more dignity, and in a manner more worthy of a national cause by adopting the course they did than if they went through a number of tedious and unmeaning divisions. What was the cause of the exceptional Obstruction to which the Prime Minister referred in the present Parliament? There was one cause, and one only, and that was the introduction of the Coercion Bill. It would have been impossible for Irish Members who cared for their country, or who had any of the spirit of an Irishman in them, not to resist the introduction of that Bill by every means at their disposal. But that was an exceptional case—it was a crisis which did not often occur in the history of the country, and against which it would be absurd to provide by exceptional legislation in the shape of a proposal like that now before the House. He supposed English statesmen did not propose always to govern Ireland by coercion. The hour would some time come when the Prime Minister of England would have to acknowledge that he could not govern Ireland by coercion, and that some other means should be tried. When that time came, whether by a separation of Parliaments or by the reconciliation of the Irish people, if that were possible, to the English Parliament, they would need no clôture to put down Obstruction. But at present the Government said in so many words that they wanted this power of clôture in order that they might more effectively pass a Coercion Bill for Ireland. They wanted to gag the Irish Members in order that they might have less trouble in fettering them. That reminded him of the case of the highwayman told of by Sydney Smith, who not merely knocked down and began to rifle the pockets of his victims, but complained of their pestering him with their groans and obstructing him by their struggles. By maladministration they produced discontent and disaffection in Ireland; that disaffection was met by coercion; the coercion in turn provoked what was called Obstruction; and thus they were ever tracing a vicious circle. Until they tried some better system there was no satisfactory way out of their difficulty that he could discover. He trusted that they would some time or other enter upon a better path; but, in the meantime, why should they destroy their own Parliamentary system because of an exceptional and, he hoped, a transient condition of things? Again, Obstruction of some kind had been a not uncommon phenomenon in Parliamentary annals. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) spoke the other night of the happy days when the Business of the House was over in a few hours. He (Mr. M'Carthy) did not remember of having read of those happy days. He failed to find any account of the halcyon time when the Business of the House was disposed of in such an expeditious manner. He did not remember reading of those happy days in the biographies of Chatham and Pitt and Canning. There might have been a few such halcyon days a short time before the Reform Bill; although before the Reform Bill they had their bouts of Obstruction as vigorous as ever they had had since. Let him take the debates on the Reform Bill itself in 1831. Mr. Molesworth, in his History, said that—

“In order to to promote delay the Leaders of the Opposition stood up again and again every night repeating the same stale statements and arguments, and often in almost the same words.”

Among those Leaders were Mr. Wilson Croker and Sir Robert Peel. In one short fortnight—eight Government days—Sir Robert Peel made 48 speeches—not hasty remarks on clauses in Committee, but 48 speeches; and he was not the worst. Mr. Wilson Croker favoured the House with 57 speeches; Sir Charles Wetherell made 58. The hon. Member quoted the following extract from the Records of the House concerning the debate of July 13, 1831:—

“Debate on the Question, ‘That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.’

“Motion made and Question put, ‘That the Debate be now adjourned till this day;’ Ayes 102, Noes 328.

“Question again proposed, ‘That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.’

“Motion made and Question put, “That the House do now adjourn;’ Ayes 90, Noes 286.

“Question again proposed; Motion made, ‘That the Debate be adjourned till Thursday;’ Ayes 63, Noes 235.

“Question again proposed; Motion made, ‘That the House do now adjourn;’ long Debate, and Motion withdrawn.

“Question again put; Motion made, ‘That the Debate be adjourned to this day;’ Ayes 44, Noes 214.

“Question again put; Motion made, ‘That the House do now adjourn;’ Ayes 37, Noes 203.

“Question again put; Motion made, ‘That the Debate be adjourned to Friday;’ Ayes 25, Noes 187.

“Question again put; Motion made, ‘That the House do now adjourn;’ Ayes 24, Noes 187.

“At last it was agreed to go into Committee pro forma, and the House adjourned at half-past Seven o’clock in the morning to meet at Three next day. Sir C. Wetherell said, with an oath, if he had known it was raining they should have had a few more divisions.”

He said there were several such instances on record long before the present Irish Party was in existence, and long before any such thing as Irish Obstruction was known. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) himself had distinguished himself as the most brilliant and pertinacious Obstructionist in the history of Parliament. He (Mr. M’Carthy) did not find fault with him for what he did at the time when he was resisting the Divorce Bill, but for what he proposed to do now. It was said that the Government did not object to liberty of speech, but to licence. He was afraid that what was called liberty of speech by a man out of Office was apt to be called licence by the same man when he got into Office. They had the examples of other States given them. They were told that England was the only country that had not yet grasped the great idea that the true way to be free was to have a clôture Resolution. They were told to look to the Imperial Parliament of Germany; but he did not think that was a very happy example. They were told of Imperial France under the Second Empire, and they had their attention pointed to France under M. Guizot. Now, M. Guizot was a great writer and a great statesman; but as a political Leader he was a mere pedant. He mismanaged France. He mismanaged her Parliamentary institutions, and brought France to the level of a catastrophe. He was just the kind of man to rejoice in such a device as this clôture, which put as much power as possible in the hands of the official classes; while a kind of sham Parliament was maintained to delude the people. It was by these means that he brought about the Revolution of 1848. When the news of that Revolution was conveyed to Sir Robert Peel, that statesman said—“That is the result of trying to govern a country with too narrow a representation.” The case of America had also been quoted; but the right hon. Gentleman admitted that it did not exist there in the Senate. If, therefore, the clôture was, as stated by the right hon. Gentleman, confined to Representative Chambers, he supposed the Senate was not considered by the right hon. Gentleman to be representative. But the American Senate was a Representative Institution. It was an elected Body, chosen by the State Legislatures, and elected only for short periods; and if its Members did not please their constituents they would be as certain to be dismissed by those who had chosen them as some hon. Members of that House were sure to be at the next General Election. The Senate often sat long, and had even all-night sittings. They sat sometimes in private. They had vastly more power than the House of Commons; they could overrule the Government in its foreign policy and its Treaties; and yet they had no clôture. He would now advert to that very unlucky part of the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India, in which he stated what he would do if he only had the power which it was proposed to confer upon the majority by this Resolution—that part of his speech in which he singled out four Members of that House of whose tiresome eloquence he would relieve the House. He (Mr. M'Carthy) was connected by Party with only one of those hon. Members; and he would say of that hon. Member that he was a man—however he might, at times, take a course unwelcome to the House—of remarkable ability, remarkable knowledge, of wide resource; a man of that force of character that he must always be heard in any assembly of reasonable men, despite of any clôture. The noble Lord had been very metaphysical, and had drawn a supersubtle distinction between the House and the Members of the House. The time taken in the proceedings of the House was the property of the House, and was not, the noble Lord said, the property of any Members of the House, the House being something essentially different from its Members. He thought the noble Lord would have been more straightforward if he had said the majority of the House instead of the House; if he had said that the time was the time of the majority—that was the Government. But it was not a question of the right of individual Members to take up the time of the House by speaking; it was a question of the right of constituents. The constituents of Members had an absolute right to have their opinions publicly expressed by those whom they had sent to Parliament, whether the Government wished it or not. He asked whether this plan would really prevent Obstruction if there were a body of men in the House who were determined, for the mere sake of Obstruction, to oppose the Business? Suppose there were 40 of them—which was not an impossible number—and each of those Members exercised his right to speak for a quarter of an hour every night, to speak strictly relevantly and straight to the point, they would consume 10 hours. And what was the House to do? They could not say that such an hon. Member was sure to be tedious, and sure to speak irrelevantly. They could not pass a Resolution stating that a certain body of hon. Members were always tedious and should not be heard. They could not do that. But what were they to do? The Speaker might fail to see some of those hon. Members, and might take other Members instead. Yes; but the time would be gone all the same; and in the end, when no English Member rose to address the House, then one of these malignant creatures was sure to rise, and they would have to listen to his speech. Then another illustration struck him as he stood that day behind the Speaker's Chair. Several Private Bills had been before them that afternoon. Suppose a number of Members chose to speak on those Private Bills. They might have taken special pains to make themselves acquainted with the questions involved, and be able to speak with authority on those questions. How could the Rule be applied if those Members spoke pertinently on each point? Yet the time of the House might in that way be very effectually wasted. If Local Business were taken out of the hands of Parliament altogether, Parliament would be left to deal with Imperial affairs, and the temptation to Obstruction would be destroyed. If they were to vote by ballot on the question of closure, in all probability it would not be carried. Certainly, if it was carried, it would only be by the dark shadow of a Dissolution which was kept floating over the heads of hon. Members on the other side. He did not think himself, at any time, that there was much fear of a Dissolution just now. He should say that with his Party it was not a question of fear, but a question of hope. He confessed that he, for one, had always admired the English Parliament as an English Representative Body; and he once had hoped that if they came in Ireland to have an Irish National Chamber, it would be modelled on the English Parliament. Now, he should not say "if," but "when" they had an Irish National Parliament, he trusted it would be modelled on what that Parliament had hitherto been, and not on what the right hon. Gentleman proposed to make it in the future. He trusted they would always avoid in an Irish Parliament that sham system—that quack system—which dealt with symptoms and thought it was dealing with disease; which paltered with consequences and thought it was removing causes; and which, if it might sometimes, on some odd occasions, be strong enough to strike down and silence some individual Member, would be found much more strong in impairing the value and lowering the dignity of the Parliamentary institution itself.

SIR WILLIAM HART DYKE said, that, in common with many other Members, he found it very difficult to give an altogether silent vote upon the Resolution now before the House; and also, in common with many Members of the House, he felt inclined to join in the general chorus of regret that the two sides of the House should find themselves engaged, one against the other, in opposing phalanxes on such a question as this. But he thought that the Conservative Members might say with some justice, as far as they were concerned, that they were in no wise responsible for such a state of things. He thought, also, that the irony of the situation had reached its very extreme limit when the Conservative Party found themselves there in a minority, pleading, as it were, to a Liberal Government, backed by a large Liberal majority, to treat the minority according to the true principles of liberality, and according to the instincts of freedom. And even now he might almost hazard a hope that it was not too late for Her Majesty's Government to be satisfied to take this scheme as a whole; and certainly it was not too late for the Conservative Party to ask this very pertinent question—How and why it was that this 1st Resolution was to be dragged out from among its fellows to be put in the forefront of the battle, and that at the very commencement of the discussion they were to be told that on this 1st Resolution, at all events, if any disaster were to happen to it, and if it were not carried, the Government would resign, and a terrible crisis would follow? He thought that was very hard upon the Opposition, and equally hard upon the Supporters of the Ministry, and doubly hard, if he might say so, upon the whole Assembly at large, because he believed that nearly all of them, in spite of the Party feeling which the question must engender, were equally anxious that it should be brought to a fair and just settlement. He asked why it was that they were threatened with this Party crisis? And he wished to ask, further, one or two questions in reference to the actual position of Public Business in that House. It would seem to him, looking at the present state of Business, that Her Majesty's Government were anxious to seize that as a fresh argument for pressing forward this harsh Resolution. They had been reminded that they were now within one week of the Easter Recess, and that little or no Business had yet been done. That was true; but he maintained that if the Resolution had been in force at the commencement of the Session, not one single additional hour would have been saved, and many hon. Members were desirous of knowing what all this meant. They wished to know why it was that the Resolution was to be made of such first-rate importance as to decide the fate or fall of the Government? Upon this point it was desirable that he should comment upon one or two facts in connection with the speeches which had been made in support of the Resolution. It was a curious fact, which had come under his notice, that most of the Members opposite who had supported the Resolution were now serving in Parliament for the first time. It was also a curious fact, that from the opposite Benches, out of four hon. Members who had spoken—the hon. Members for Berkshire (Mr. Walter), Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian), Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), all of whom possessed considerable experience of Parliamentary life—two of them, the hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) and the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), had condemned the Resolution very decisively. His hon. Friend the Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian) made a statement which was somewhat of a curious character. His hon. Friend said that the Resolution as it now stood had the support of the majority of the people of this country. His (Sir William Hart Dyke's) reply to that was a very simple one. It was only necessary to read certain letters which had been distributed among various political organizations throughout the country during the past few weeks to show that the support of the Resolution came solely from the borough of Birmingham. He had happened to be in the House during the speech of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir William Harcourt), and, listening attentively to the arguments adduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he was struck by the fact that if that speech indicated anything, it was that in the belief of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Resolution was the chief and the only cure that could be applied to the unfortunate state of things which now existed in the House. The speech of the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread), however, contained a complete reply to that argument, because the hon. Member pointed out that the Resolution could never be used harshly or offensively against the minority, or it would recoil upon the majority and create a state of Obstruction far worse than that which now existed. That was a complete answer to the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Well, then, what did the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) do? He had been much struck with the discrepancy between the opening and the concluding portions of the speech of the noble Marquess. The noble Marquess, at the commencement of his speech, implored the House, and especially the Opposition, whatever happened, not to allow themselves to become frightened. He said that he was surprised at the exaggerated alarm with which the Resolution was regarded by hon. Members opposite. The noble Marquess went on to say—

And he proceeded to urge that it was in itself a proposal of a far milder character than one which was passed in 1842, whereby Members were restricted in their right of speaking on presenting Petitions to the House. He (Sir William Hart Dyke) found that that proposal, as far as any record of it was to be found in their Parliamentary Proceedings, only occupied a few pages of Hansard, and there was very little difficulty in inducing the House to accede to it. But if they would compare the commencement of the speech of the noble Marquess with the closing part of it, it would be found that the two were in direct opposition to each other. In the last part, the noble Marquess went into interesting details as to what the minority would have to go through if the Resolution was passed. What surprised him (Sir William Hart Dyke) more than all at this proposal was that it should be looked upon as so much milder a proposition than that which was carried in 1842, when the noble Marquess concluded his speech by informing the House that on the acceptance of the Rule would depend the fate of Her Majesty's Government. At the risk of detaining the House he wished to discuss the merits of the Resolution itself as submitted to the House. He knew that he might be accused of going over ground which had been occupied before; but he must confess that with regard to any accusation of that kind he was perfectly reckless, because he had an important object in view—namely, to show that out-of-doors a wrong impression was fast gaining ground in reference to the Resolution; and also as to how matters stood in regard to the Public Business of the House. It was said that it was high time that something should be done, because Easter was arriving, and as yet no Public Business had been transacted. He merely quoted that assertion to show how erroneous the impression was which was gaining ground in the country in regard to the effect which the Resolution would produce; because, as he had already pointed out, if the Resolution had been in existence throughout the whole of the Session, not a single half-hour of the Session would have been saved by its application. It had been his lot for 12 years of his life—from 1868 until 1880—to be closely connected with the Business of the House. Six of those years were passed in Opposition, and the six later years in a more responsible position. He therefore wished for a moment to argue the question by the light of the experience he had gained in both positions. Looking at the Resolution in that way, he would endeavour to argue it as if he were arguing with one of his own Leaders in some of the troublous days they went through when in Office. He would rather consider the question in that way, than form any narrow-minded or partizan argument on a question affecting the future proceedings of the House. The chief complaint he had to make against the Resolution was that it would not prove effectual for the purpose for which it had been brought forward. He had

watched very closely the various causes which had created the difficulties which the House had now to contend with, and he acknowledged as fully as any hon. Member sitting opposite—as fully, indeed, as the Prime Minister himself—the difficulties of the position in which Her Majesty's Government were placed. But there were many circumstances which had caused the present state of things, and the great increase in the time-consuming power of the House. In the first place, there was a difficulty which was met by one of the subsequent Resolutions—namely, the power enjoyed by hon. Members, and constantly exercised, of moving the adjournment before the Business of the day commenced. That was a difficulty which constantly met the late Government at every turn. He remembered on four nights in succession the late Government coming down to the House, and yet Motions for Adjournment were interposed, and therefore, practically, there was no Agenda Paper, and it was found impossible to commence the Business of the day until 7 or 8 o'clock. That was a very grave difficulty, but it was one which was struck at by one of the subsequent Resolutions, which Resolution should certainly receive his hearty support. Another and a very grievous change had occurred in the time-consuming power of that Assembly—namely, the number of Questions which were put to Ministers. He did not for a moment wish to give a hint to any hon. Member how to obstruct the Business of the House—he would not be so disloyal—but he wished to point out that the Resolution did not strike at that difficulty; and when the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) spoke about an irritated minority, and pointed out how dangerous it would be to put the Rule in force for fear of irritating the minority, it was impossible to overlook the fact that in regard to this particular difficulty it was possible to have such a multiplicity of Questions put to Ministers that the Public Business would never commence until 7 or 8 o'clock at night. Surely there ought to be some means of curing this evil, and why did not the Government attempt it, for it was an evil which stared them in the face every day the House met? He would venture to urge another difficulty, which added far too much to the time-consuming power, and that was the unfortunate state of affairs in Ireland. He should be the last person, on an occasion of that kind, to wish to enter into an Irish debate. He thought the House had had enough of them, and that was no time for discussing the condition of Ireland; but they must all admit that the consideration of Irish affairs was to a great extent absorbing the time of the House which ought to be devoted to general legislation. It was a state of things which they must all very much regret, and he fervently hoped that the cause of it might soon cease; but in the meantime there it was, and when hon. Members got up and asked questions in reference to the treatment of their friends in prison in Ireland, no one could justly or reasonably complain of the course they took. It was part of the penalty they had to suffer for the state to which Ireland had been brought. It was, however, a condition of affairs which they all trusted would not last long. But what he wished to ask, with due respect, of Her Majesty's Government was, whether the fact that one portion of the United Kingdom was in such an unfortunate condition was any solid reason why the House of Commons should part with its liberty of speech? He contended that it was nothing of the kind. There were other matters he might allude to, but he remembered that the hour was late. There was, however, one point which had been brought very much under his notice—namely, the number of Amendments which were now moved in Bills in comparison with the number of Amendments which used to be moved some eight or ten years ago, when only those Members who were actually cognizant of the questions dealt with by a particular Bill took part in the discussion of them, and very few Amendments were moved. If any hon. Member would take the trouble to search through the Journals of the House, he would be perfectly astonished at the number of Amendments that were now moved in Bills of every description compared with a very few years ago. The other day he was engaged in making a comparison, and he took occasion to compare the interest taken in the Land Bill of 1870 with that taken in the Land Bill of 1881. The subject was a cognate one, and he believed that on each occasion the Bill excited an equal amount of interest in Ireland. But he found that the number of Amendments presented upon the Land Bill of 1870 in one evening was contained in 15 pages of the Notice Paper of the House; whereas the Amendments put down on one night on the Land Bill of 1881 reached 36 pages—or considerably more than double. The number of Amendments now moved was the cause of the consumption of a great deal of the time of the House; but, in reference to these Amendments, he wished to ask Her Majesty's Government how the application of this Rule would put a stop to the difficulty? They were told that if it was in the opinion of the Chairman of Committees the evident sense of the Committee that a discussion should be stopped, then the Chairman could interfere and put the Question; but he wanted to know how this could apply to Amendments proposed in a Bill? If it did not, the "irritating minority" already spoken of would be left perfectly free to obstruct the progress of Business by continuing to move needless and endless Amendments. What would be the effect of the Resolution if the House consented to pass it? The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, in moving it, told the House to be cautious how they adopted any measure that would tend to aggravate the evil. He (Sir William Hart Dyke) thought he had shown that this proposal, if it were passed, would be ineffective, and that it would tend largely to aggravate the evil; and, in regard to the future, he believed that if it were adopted it would do more to demoralize the inner life of that Assembly than anything that had been attempted in regard to its Procedure before. Of course, they were bound to consider the future in regard to this proposal. It was all very well for hon. Members to say that what they wished to cure was what was happening in the present day. It was due to those who were asked to make so large a change in their Procedure that it was nothing more nor less than a revolution, and especially for the younger Members of the House, to consider what would be the future effect of the Resolution if it were once adopted by the House. They were told that no Speaker dare make use of it in the future, unless it was very certain that it was the evident wish of the House. It had been frequently said by hon. Gentlemen opposite that they did not like it, but, at the same time, that it was perfectly safe to support it, because it would seldom, if ever, be put into operation. If that were really so, why should the House be called upon to pass an obnoxious Resolution that would seldom, or never, be used? He admitted the difficult position in which the House was placed in reference to the progress of Public Business; but why, in the name of common sense, were they to make so vast a revolution in their Procedure for so miserable an object? Then, with regard to the application of the Rule, he thought the present Session offered a case in point. Supposing, in the future, that a Government should be as unfortunate in the management and control of its Business as the present Government had been, would they tell him that the Leader of the Government would not be tempted to make use of this Rule, in order to enable him to make up for lost time? Any assertion to the contrary was rather too much for any person who had any knowledge whatever of human nature to believe. There was this further question he wished to ask in reference to the application of the Rule in regard to the Chairman of Committees. He thought the Rule as regarded the Chairman of Committees would be most unfair and unjust to the occupant of that Office. The Chairman of Committees in these days was never considered, when in the Chair, in the light of a partizan; but this Rule would, undoubtedly, make him one. Of course, the Chairman of Committees would belong to the political Party coming into power, and would be appointed by the Government of the day. He would, therefore, in the future, be placed in a most unfair and undignified position. Look at the relationship between a Minister in charge of a Bill and the Chairman of Committees. His experience of a Minister in charge of a Bill was that there was no more dangerous a creature to meet towards the end of July. Each Minister, of course, believed in this effort of his creation—perhaps it was the embodiment of some crotchet of his earlier years, or some dream of his early life. Accordingly, he believed that nothing could save him, that nothing could save his Department, and that nothing could save his Party, or the country, except that his Bill should become law. On that one point he became dangerous to approach. Well, what would happen under the New Rule? Towards the end of July the Bill would get into Committee, and some clause of it would get into one of those difficult tangles from which it was so difficult to extricate it, and which only too often happened to a Bill in Committee. Time would be waning, and the last days of the Session rapidly approaching. What an enormous temptation there would be, in such a state of circumstances, for the Minister to go to the Chairman of Committees and say—"To-night is the last chance for the passing of my Bill. If this clause is not passed to-night, the pressure the Government Business is such that of I shall be compelled to drop it, and, therefore, I insist upon your making an endeavour to close the debate to-night." This was not only possible, but the House would very probably find that it would happen in case of the clôture being adopted. He said this with some knowledge of the pressure put on by Conservative Ministers, and it was very easy for the House to judge what might happen if such a Rule existed, and right hon. Gentlemen opposite ceased their present method of conducting the Business of the House, and really endeavoured to press their measures through. It was said that the Conservative Party did not care for this Resolution, because they were all in favour of Obstruction, and did not wish to advance legislation. He wished to enter an emphatic protest against such an assertion. What he and his hon. Friends objected to was, that out of a scheme which the Government put forward, containing 12 proposals, this particular one should be singled out in this prominent manner; that they should be told not to consider the scheme as a whole, but only one proposal, and then that the Government would resign if they failed to obtain the support of the House in carrying it. In point of fact, the House was told that if it did not support Her Majesty's Government upon one-twelfth of their proposal, Ministers were prepared to resign Office. He, for one, was prepared to give his support to the remaining Resolutions, and he would do so because they struck a blow at obvious blots in the Procedure and conduct of the Business of the House. Therefore, he asked that, in common fairness and justice, the House should be asked to discuss these remedies first, and that the proposals which did meet acknowledged difficulties should be considered, before they were asked to make the revolutionary change in their Procedure which was involved in the 1st Resolution. In regard to the practice of foreign countries, he did not think it was quite fair for hon. Gentlemen opposite to be continually quoting the use of the clôture in Legislative Assemblies abroad, and in ignoring the language used, and the scenes produced, in such foreign Assemblies on account of the introduction of the system. Then, in reply to the taunt that those who opposed the Resolution had no practical remedy of their own to suggest, he would point out that there were very good practical remedies to be found in the Resolutions which followed. He would not detain the House longer. He should not have risen at all at so late an hour if the subject had not been one on which he naturally felt very strongly. He also felt most strongly that Her Majesty's Government were asking too much from the House in calling upon them to accept this proposal. He believed that it was one which involved great danger to the future of the House of Commons; and that it, further, called upon the House to make enormous sacrifices without any corresponding advantage or gain to the country. He believed that it would not strike at the root of the difficulties from which the House was suffering; he believed, also, that it was a proposal which could never be popular in the House or the country. It was a proposal which involved grave difficulties in the future, because it would always insure in the House the existence of an irritated minority. It was only those who had been connected with the inner working of that Assembly who knew how difficult it was to guide its delicate and intricate machinery; how dangerous it was to disturb it; and how easy it was by too heavy a pressure to break it up altogether. They had heard many speeches in reference to the proposal, most of which treated it from a different point of view; but he believed that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India very much indicated the policy they were likely to expect if the proposal were adopted. In regard to the future of the debate—as to what was to happen to this Resolution—he knew nothing. They had been told that great pressure was being put upon hon. Gentlemen opposite to carry the Resolution. They had had the old bogey of a Dissolution trotted out to frighten hon. Members opposite; but he himself believed in nothing of the kind. He was quite certain of this, that if the Resolution were carried it would not be carried by a mechanical majority—that was, if a mechanical majority meant something that moved smoothly and easily and without undue pressure. Nor did he believe that the Resolution, if carried, would be of much assistance to hon. Gentlemen opposite, either as regarded the present conduct of Public Business or as to the future. He believed honestly that it would place the House in very serious difficulties. It might be that Her Majesty's Government would press the Resolution to the bitter end; and, if they did, he was sure of this—that if, against the wishes of a considerable minority, they brought it into operation, if there was one shred of meaning in the name, never again could the Party opposite be called the "Liberal Party." Wishing as well of the future of that Assembly as any hon. Member opposite, as fond of the Assembly and of its good guidance as any of them, yet he still thought their pathway lay clear and distinct before them, and that it was to resist to the very utmost the dangers of the Resolution, in spite of this false and conjured-up crisis. He was one of those who believed that if Her Majesty's Government carried the Resolution, the only effect would be to inflict a grievous injury upon the Liberal Party, and entail something like disaster upon the best and freest Institution of the country.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Debate be now adjourned."—
(Mr. John Bright.)

MR. SEXTON wished to say a few words on the Question of the Adjournment of the Debate. It appeared that an announcement had been made to the effect that an understanding had been arrived at by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition that the division on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott) to the Resolution of the Government should be taken on Thursday next. Now, he had just received a telegram which, with the permission of the House, he would read. It was addressed to him by the imprisoned Members for Cork, Tipperary, and Roscommon, and was as follows:—

"Parnell, Dillon, and O'Kelly to Sexton. Kilmainham.—We have written to the Chief Secretary asking to be permitted to take part in the division on Mr. Marriott's Amendment, and undertaking to refrain from any action in any other political matter during our absence from prison, and after the division to return to Ireland and surrender ourselves to the Lord Lieutenant."

MR. SPEAKER: The question raised by the hon. Member has no relevancy whatever to the Question before the House.

MR. SEXTON said, he was not proceeding with the debate, but only wished to point out that, in his opinion, it was undesirable that the Motion for the adjournment should be carried until it was known whether those Members of the House who were now in prison would be present at the division on Thursday next.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that it is not competent to him to bring a matter of that kind before the House on a Question of Adjournment.

MR. CALLAN asked if it would not be within the right of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) to inquire of Her Majesty's Government whether they, in conjunction with the occupants of the Front Opposition Bench, intended to force on the division on the 1st Resolution next Thursday night? If that were the case, Irish Members might be drawn into the agreement, provided the "suspects" who were Members of Parliament were permitted to attend.

MR. SPEAKER: I have already informed the hon. Member for Sligo that the question is one which cannot now be discussed.

MR. CALLAN said, he wished, in that case, to know what question could be discussed? If he remembered rightly, Mr. Speaker had, in reply to a Question on a previous occasion, informed the House that he was wholly at a loss to say what might not be discussed upon a Motion for Adjournment.

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now referring to a substantive Motion for Adjournment. This is a Motion for the adjournment of a debate upon a Question before the House, and any discussion upon that Motion should be relevant to the Main Question before the House.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, in the course of the few remarks he had to make, he should confine himself entirely to the Question of the Adjournment of the Debate. It occurred to him, first, to inquire of what use it was to adjourn the debate? As far as he could judge, there was no possible object to be gained by continuing the discussion after the present Sitting. It was well known that the clôture was already practically in force, and that many measures which might have been brought forward had been obstructed by the Government themselves. Moreover, they had behind them a mechanical majority which would enable them to carry their Resolution on division next Thursday. But the character of that division was, at the present moment, a matter of interesting speculation. It might depend upon a small number of votes, and he and his hon. Friends believed it would depend very much on the presence of the three Members of that House who were under detention at Kilmainham.

MR. SPEAKER: I have already informed an hon. Member that that question is not relevant to the Main Question before the House.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had no intention of discussing the detention of the hon. Members in Kilmainham. He was pointing out that the division on Thursday next was likely to be a very close one, and that the absence of the three Members might have a material effect upon it. He thought he should be in Order in making the observation that at present the House was not complete, and, as matters now stood, was not likely to be complete on Thursday night.

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member disregards my ruling I shall be obliged to take notice.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR said, he had not the least intention of disregarding the ruling of the Chair. He said if the House was not to be more complete on Thursday next than it was at present, he saw no reason whatever why the debate should be adjourned. On the contrary, it seemed to him that it would be just as well to continue the discussion now, however long the House might have to sit, in order to allow all those Members to do so who wished to lay their views upon the question of the clôture before the House. The views of a large number of hon. Members having been already propounded, it occurred to him that there was not much more remaining to be said on the subject, and why they should be asked to adjourn the debate at an hour which, compared with the time until which they were accustomed to sit was comparatively early, he could not understand. If the debate could be finished on Thursday, it could, with equal ease, be brought to an end on the present occasion, without the House having to sit any longer than they were obliged to do last Friday, when the Government were desirous of obtaining a Vote in Supply. If, therefore, by sitting until 4 o'clock that morning, the discussion could be finished, he could see no reasonable ground on which the Motion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster could be acceded to. Again, although the advantages to be gained by adjourning the debate were not patent, the disadvantages were very clear. They were approaching the Easter Recess, and the arrears of work were accumulating. Therefore, he said, if the discussion could be brought to an end on the present occasion, Thursday night could be devoted to some useful purpose. For instance, there were some very important Estimates to be dealt with; and if his suggestion were adopted, an opportunity might be afforded of discussing some of the many Votes which, in consequence of the action of the Government during the present Session, the House had already been asked to pass as a matter of course and without any discussion whatever. The Prime Minister himself had over and over again expressed his sense of the inadequate amount of criticism to which the Estimates had of late years been subjected. Under the circumstances, he thought the debate should be continued, and that Thursday night should be devoted to some of the immense arrears of work which had accumulated in consequence of the action of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. O'DONNELL said, if the Irish Party were not to be treated with fair play by Her Majesty's Government, he certainly thought it would be just as well to take the division on the clôture question that night as at any other time. It did not seem to be part of the policy of the Government to allow the views of the whole House to be consulted; but if there was to be a continuation of the debate, he thought they were entitled to an assurance that more space than a single Sitting should be devoted to it. It was quite patent to all the Members of the Irish Party that the whole of the discussion upon the present Motion, from the speech of the Prime Minister down to the last speech that had been delivered, had turned upon the alleged misconduct of the Irish Party, who had been made targets for every kind of observation proceeding from both sides of the House. Notwithstanding this, the best hours of the day, and, indeed, every moment which could be regarded as a fair opportunity for explaining the Irish case, had been most ungenerously occupied by English Members. There did not appear to have been the slightest disposition on the part of the House to give the Irish Party fair play in this matter. He repeated, that every hour of the debate most suitable for the exposition of the Irish case had been monopolized by the Leaders of the English Parties. And now the debate next Thursday, the closing day, as they were told it would be, of the discussion was to be opened with all the force and power which they were entitled to expect from the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, and who would, doubtless, regale the House with a further brilliant exposition of the defects of the Irish Party. He did not know what other great guns of Liberalism would follow the Chancellor of the Duchy; but it was evident that an agreement had been entered into between the two political Parties to deny a fair hearing to those who were bearing the brunt of this matter, and that the House was about to be hurried into a vote with reference to the alleged transgressions of the Irish Party without their being afforded any fair opportunity of replying to the monstrous misconceptions of their conduct and policy which had been ventilated in the course of this discussion. If this treatment was an earnest of what was in store for the Irish Members it would certainly be resisted, although, in the end, they might be over-borne by numbers. But it seemed to him that the parties in this confederacy would not gain by the manner in which they were dealing with the Irish nation; and unless Irish Members received an assurance that a fair opportunity would be given to the Irish Party, before this most important discussion came to an end, of meeting the extraordinary misrepresentations and misconceptions which had been floated with regard to them, they would feel it their duty not only to divide the House on the present Motion, but when the subject next came forward they would make use of all the Forms of the House in order to obtain an opportunity for fair discussion. In conclusion, he begged to assure Members sitting on both sides of the House that the Irish Party could afford to regard the clôture with vastly more indifference than any other Party.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he thought that some of the observations of his hon. Friend the Member for Dungan (Mr. O'Donnell) were not quite warranted. He believed that the Party really interested in this case was the Conservative, and not the Irish Party. He would endeavour to make this clear without going into the subject at any great length. He ventured to say that his hon. Friend, if he would consider the matter dispassionately, would find that this question was not one in which the Irish Party were interested, except in the abstract, and it was only because they were not immediately interested in it, that he addressed the House at all on the Question of Adjournment. If the Rule were intended—as it purported to be—for putting an end to the Obstruction which had obtained in that House, nothing could be more imbecile and inefficient for that purpose. Because, whilst it would be utterly ineffectual unless there were 200 Members to put down 40 Members, 201 Members could put down 200 Members. He challenged the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, when he rose on Thursday next to continue this debate, to produce a single parallel for such legislation as was contemplated by the 1st Resolution. Again, the insincerity of the Rule was apparent from the fact that, while Mr. Speaker was to decide that the sense of the House was against the continuance of debate, he would be sustained in that if 201 Members voted for the Motion against 200 Members. It was impossible, therefore, to reconcile the Rule with any intention of applying it to the Irish Party; and its obvious intention was to stop the mouths of the Tory Party when some great measures were being carried through the House.

MR. HEALY said, he considered the debate ought now to be adjourned. It was desirable that the Government should now be told that it was very unlikely that they would be able to come to a decision on Thursday. The Government could not expect that they would be allowed to go to a division on a matter which so vitally interested Members from Ireland, until a reasonable proportion of those Members had had an opportunity of speaking. He did not think there was any desire on the part of the Irish Members to prolong the debate unduly; but he would suggest to Her Majesty's Government that it would be unreasonable in them to bring down their Supporters on Thursday night for the division, unless it was seen that there was such an absence of desire to speak on the part of other Members as to give the Irish Members a fair share in the matter. It had been said, in the course of the debate, that it would be a good thing if the discussion went on until the Government had considered the arguments in favour of releasing the imprisoned Irish Members—in fact, until the Irish Members were let out.

MR. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. Member that the Question before the House is "That the Debate be now adjourned."

MR. HEALY said, he was not in the House when the observations to which he had referred were made, and when some decision was given upon them. He only understood from hearsay what had taken place. As he was not in Order, he regretted that he had been betrayed into mentioning the subject. All he would say was, that until the Irish Party were able to bring before Her Majesty's Government the arguments they desired to offer on the very important subjects which had engaged the attention of the House, it would be undesirable to attempt to come to a decision.

MR. GLADSTONE: I assent to the adjournment, in the full expectation that we shall come to a decision on Thursday. I do not say I expect the division to be taken on Thursday because of any compact between the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) and myself, for we have no actual power to arrange for the closing of the debate; but I say it for the reason that, as far as we can gather, it appears to be the general impression on all sides that the discussion should terminate on that day.

Motion agreed to.

(Mr. Hibbert, Secretary Sir William Harcourt.)

[BILL 61.] COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

MR. HIBBERT said, that, although there was a blocking Notice against going into Committee on this Bill, he thought he should be in Order in moving that Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair, in order to commit the measure pro forma, and have Amendments printed in it. He wished to have the Bill reprinted, and so save time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Hibbert.)

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee.)

MR. CALLAN: Is this Committee on the Municipal Corporations Bill?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is.

MR. CALLAN: I beg to call your attention to the front page of the Notice Paper. There is a blocking Motion against this Committee.

MR. HIBBERT: Perhaps the hon. Member will allow me to explain. I said I wished the Bill committed pro forma for the purpose of having it reprinted. The blocking Notice will hold good when the Bill stands for Committee.

MR. CALLAN said, he should be sorry to stand in the way of the courteous Secretary to the Local Government Board. He only wished the hon. Member's example of courtesy was followed by all other occupants of the Front Benches. He (Mr. Callan) only rose as a matter of Order to ask whether it was competent for such a Motion as this to be made with a blocking Notice on the Paper?

THE CHAIRMAN: It is strictly in accordance with the ordinary practice of the House where the intention is simply to print Amendments. The block will stand good against the next Committee stage.

MR. HEALY said, the Irish Members had raised this question the other night. An hon. Member had a Registration Bill down, and he took off his hat when the Order was called on moving "That it be now considered." The Motion was objected to, and Mr. Speaker ruled that, as there was a blocking Notice against the measure, it could not be proceeded with. He (Mr. Healy) would ask of what use was this blocking Rule, if Members of the Government were to be allowed to play fast and loose with it?

THE CHAIRMAN: If there was any question to be raised, the hon. Member should have raised it when Mr. Speaker was leaving the Chair. But there was no question to be raised, because it is the rule to go into Committee on a Bill pro forma, notwithstanding that there is a blocking Notice down.

MR. HEALY said, as a point of Order, he would point out that no one could possibly have known what was the intention of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Oldham (Mr. Hibbert).

MR. HIBBERT: I stated openly that I wished the House to go into Committee on the Bill, in order merely to have certain Amendments printed in the measure. The arrangement proposed was for the convenience of the House, and the block will still hold good. I should explain that before I made the Motion I was told both by the Speaker and the Clerks at the Table that I should be perfectly in Order.

Bill reported; to be printed, as amended [Bill 113]; re-committed for Monday next.

House resumed.

MR. HEALY said, he wished to call Mr. Speaker's attention to a point of Order. The hon. Member for Oldham had moved to go into Committee on a Bill against which there was a blocking Notice on the Paper; and he (Mr. Healy) wished to ask whether it was competent for the hon. Member, under such circumstances, to persevere with his Motion. The block was to prevent Mr. Speaker from leaving the Chair, and he should like to ask where hon. Members could find directions on this point in previous Rulings or in any work on the Practice of the House?

MR. CALLAN said, the Chairman of Committees had stated, as his excuse for allowing the Committee to go on, that the proper time for objecting to the stage being taken was not in Committee, but when the Motion was made to get Mr. Speaker out of the Chair. The hon. Member for Oldham had said that before he made the Motion he had consulted him (Mr. Speaker) and the Chairman of Committees. He (Mr. Callan) wished, therefore, to know how the Chairman of Committees could explain his statement that the proper time to object was when the Motion was made for Mr. Speaker to leave the Chair? If the hon. Member had consulted Mr. Speaker and the Chairman of Committees—

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR: The hon. Member said, "Mr. Speaker and the Clerks at the Table."

MR. CALLAN said, he wished, then, to know who was right? Was the Chairman of Committees right in his opinion that the proper time to object was when the Motion was made "That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair?" The Chairman of Committees had expressed that opinion in such a manner as to lead to the inference that if objection had been made at the proper time, it would have been fatal to the Motion to commit the Bill.

MR. SPEAKER: The point raised by the hon. Member has been repeatedly ruled upon on former occasions. When a Member in charge of a Bill has desired to commit that Bill pro forma, to have it reprinted, it has been decided that there is no objection to that Motion by reason of the Rule with regard to Opposed Business, because the Bill is again placed for Committee, and the block stands against that stage. I am bound to say that the proper time to raise this question would have been on the Motion "That Mr. Speaker do leave the Chair." If it had been raised then, I should have ruled as I do now, and as I have done on other occasions, that the objection cannot be maintained.

Mr. Callan

BILL.—[BILL 108.]

(Mr. Monk, Mr. Serjeant Simon.)

CONSIDERATION.

Bill, as amended, considered.

MR. WHITLEY said, he had to move an Amendment which was a very important one, and one to which he hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General would agree. The Bill proposed that where a bill of sale was registered and the owner of the property was not bankrupt within 12 months of that registration the bill of sale should hold good. He wished to amend Clause 17, which destroyed a great part of the usefulness of the measure and would lead to a great deal of litigation, putting commercial bodies to great expense. What was really the way in which it would act? Large sums of money were advanced on machinery. Bills of sale were a security. They were registered, the creditors having notice of them. To his knowledge, very large amounts were lent by persons in Liverpool to spinners and manufacturers on the security of these bills; but if this clause passed in the way proposed by the Attorney General, all such bills of sale might be absolutely void. Yet, at the same time, it appeared, on the face of the Bill, that all bills of sale registered 12 months before bankruptcy would be valid. He thought he was right in saying that if the Bill passed as it was proposed by the Attorney General, bills of sale executed by non-traders would be legal, but those executed by a spinner or other manufacturer would be bad. That would be undesirable. It would be better to at once abolish all bills of sale, and say that no security should be allowed for personal property, than to pass an Act which professed, on the face of it, only to legalize those bills of sale which affected non-traders, who were a decimal portion of the community, and make those affecting traders illegal. That was a very serious difficulty indeed. In regard to the objection that his proposal would involve that which was formerly the mode by which creditors were deceived, he contended that legalizing these bills of sale and giving notice to the creditors was the legitimate mode of making a good security. He earnestly hoped the House would understand the objection he had brought forward. He knew that the matter was a technical and difficult one; but, at the same time, what he had stated would be the effect of the Bill, and he therefore hoped his Amendment would be accepted.

Amendment proposed, in page 4, to leave out Clause 17, and insert the following Clause:—

(Repeal of sections eight and twenty of principal Act.)

“The eighth section of the principal Act is hereby repealed, and the twentieth section of the principal Act, and all other enactments contained in that Act, so far as the same are inconsistent with this Act, are hereby repealed, but this section shall not affect the validity of anything done or suffered under the principal Act before the commencement of this Act.”—
(Mr. Whitley.)

Clause brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the said Clause be now read a second time.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he was sure it was his own fault entirely, but he did not understand what the hon. Member had endeavoured to convey to the House. The clause in the Bill proposed to modify the Act of 1878. Before that Act was passed, if any property was found, without the consent of the true owner, in the possession of a person who was a trader, and who became a bankrupt, the property would pass to the trustee in bankruptcy under the Order and Disposition Clause. In 1878, all bills of sale were taken out of that Order and Disposition Clause, and the result was the multiplication of bills of sale. It was thought desirable not to go back to the old law, but, by the 13th clause, to take a middle course, and to say that if a bill of sale should be made within 12 months—that might be in anticipation of bankruptcy—the Order and Disposition Clause should apply, and the creditors should obtain the benefit of the goods, as against the bill of sale. The matter was discussed by a Select Committee, and it was thought this was taking a moderate and middle course, and therefore a safe course; and, he must say, he did not understand what the hon. Member's objection to it was. An objection might arise, not upon the construction of the Bill, but in this way—that if they passed the Bill in this shape, money-lenders would endeavour to defeat its operation, and, instead of taking bills of sale at all, would make agreements of absolute sale from the borrowers to them, and then let the property back again to the borrowers. This would not be a bill of sale, but a purchase of the property. They would have to consider, when the question of Bankruptcy came before them, whether they ought not to strike out “non-trader.” To make the Order and Disposition Clause apply to non-traders, as well as to traders, was a matter for consideration. In the meantime, it was now proposed that there should be no bill of sale under £50, and the result, in 99 out of 100 cases, would be that the person giving the bill of sale would probably be a trader, and then the Order and Disposition Clause would apply, and thus everyone who was a trader would be safe by this Section 13. He hoped the House would adhere to the proposition, for it had been fully considered.

MR. MONK said, he hoped that, after what the Attorney General had said, the hon. Member for Liverpool (Mr. Whitley) would withdraw his proposed clause, more especially as the Attorney General had said that in the Bankruptcy Bill which would shortly come before the House, he would endeavour to deal with the difficulty. He himself must oppose the clause.

MR. MELDON said, he thought this was a point of great importance. He did not admit that this Bill had been promoted by traders or commercial communities; he believed it was promoted by Chambers of Commerce; but nothing could be more mischievous. The matter was raised in 1878, and the difficulty surrounding the question of bills of sale was then fully considered. It was then pointed out that bills of sale, in the interest of commercial communities, ought to be real securities, or be abolished altogether. If the latter were done, well and good; but if bills of sale were allowed and tolerated and legalized, they ought to be surrounded with such conditions that persons advancing money should know how they stood. Bills of sale could be nothing but traps for the mercantile community unless this was done. He could well understand that the Government were not willing to consent to the entire abolition of bills of sale; but they should say that any person giving a bill of sale should show such indications of solvency that a bill should not be followed against him. If it was for a period during which an act of bankruptcy would run, then it should be void; and if there was a provision that any bill of sale given between acts of bankruptcy could be taken advantage of in six months, people would know where they were. But by this Bill there was the consequence of what was known among lawyers in bankruptcy as the Repudiated Ownership Clause. That left things in a state of glorious uncertainty. To enable a liability to be set aside under that clause, a number of different facts must be proved. People who advanced money liked to know whether the security was good or not; but now they would be in a state of uncertainty for 12 months, and then not know whether they might be involved in expensive litigation. The matter had not now been as fully discussed in Committee as it was in 1878; and he thought that before a Bill of this gigantic importance to the commercial community was disposed of, some further opportunity ought to be given for its consideration; and he should move that the debate be now adjourned, in order to have that opportunity of looking more fully into the matter, and of proposing other Amendments. He knew that the views he had expressed were largely shared in the commercial community.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
—(Mr. Meldon.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) expressed his regret that the House had not had the assistance of the hon. Member before, and said, the matter was very much discussed in 1878; but the Act, having been working for three years, had revealed a state of things that was perfectly intolerable. The present Bill was introduced last year, and was then referred to a Select Committee, and by that Committee fully considered. A Bill substantially the same as the present Bill was printed and circulated, and had been in the hands of Members for six months, and fully discussed during this Session. If the hon. Member had asked for further consideration on the second reading, or in Committee, he was sure the House would have listened to all the hon. Member had to say; but he thought it was a little late now to make this proposal after the Bill had been so long before the House, and he trusted that the Motion would be withdrawn.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he hoped the hon. Member would not persist in his opposition. He knew a great deal about the state of things under the present law; and, while he did not think this Bill went as far as it should, yet as a Bankruptcy Bill was to be introduced, which would be a complement to this measure, the whole subject could be treated then. The abolition of bills of sale, under the Order and Disposition Clause, got rid of three-fourths of the number of bills which were now a means of great extortion and injustice; and therefore he hoped that, under the circumstances, the hon. Member would withdraw his Motion.

Original Question again proposed.

MR. WHITLEY said, that, after what the Attorney General had said, he should not press his Motion, although he feared this clause would lead to a great deal of litigation.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. WARTON moved, in Clause 6, page 2, line 10, at end, add—

“Or any hay, straw, corn, produce, live or dead stock, in or upon, or brought in or upon, any land or farm in substitution for any hay, straw, corn, produce, live or dead stock, enumerated in the schedule to such bill of sale, and which have been actually paid for by the grantor of such bill of sale.”

The hon. and learned Member said, it would be in the recollection of the Attorney General, in the discussion—which he could not call a full discussion—in Committee upon this Bill, a hurried discussion took place, and, with the usual rapidity, the first four clauses, and nearly the fifth, were carried in about a minute. When the fifth was reached, he ventured to call attention to an Amendment in his name in the present form, but without the last words—“have been actually paid for by the grantor of such bill of sale.” The Attorney General then said he would consider the matter upon Report, and the hon. Member for Gloucester (Mr. Monk) accepted the proposition. This proposition was forced upon him by the fact that farmers throughout the country were becoming alive to the great danger they were exposed to in doing what they had a perfect right to do—namely, borrowing money upon their stock. Farmers fed and fattened their own cattle, and could not always keep the same cattle from year to year while the bill of sale might last. They must substitute one animal for another, and they could not always have the same truss of hay, or the same corn; and it was only reasonable that they should have this power he now proposed. It was no pleasure to him to bring the matter before the House; but many agriculturists required this power. It might be asked why he did not put the same thing into the 4th section with regard to persons who were not farmers? He should have been very glad to do so; but the rate at which the Bill had proceeded gave him no opportunity. But there was another answer. Farmers stood in a different position from ordinary traders. A farmer might for a long number of years, and after several good harvests, find himself solvent; but he had to take his chance of good and bad seasons, and through bad harvests he might be temporarily pressed for money, and it would be hard to deprive him of the opportunity of raising money on his present stock or on animals, which must be substituted. He believed he had the support of one of the most distinguished agricultural Members of the House—the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot)—and he hoped the Attorney General would redeem his pledge to consider this matter.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 10, after the word “executed,” to add the words “or any hay, straw, corn, produce, live or dead stock, in or upon, or brought in or upon, any land or farm in substitution for any hay, straw, corn, produce, live or dead stock, enumerated in the schedule to such bill of sale, and which have been actually paid for by the grantor of such bill of sale.”—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, “That those words be there inserted.”

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he wished to acknowledge the courtesy shown by the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) and by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton) when he brought forward this same proposition. He had undertaken to consider the point, and he could assure the hon. Members that it had been fully considered. An endeavour was made to give way to the desire expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport, and to accept the Amendment; but, after full consideration, those in charge of the Bill found they could not accept it. The House was aware that a practice had grown up in regard to bills of sale among money-lenders of not only taking assignments of all the goods possessed by the borrowers, but of all the goods afterwards to be acquired. That system applied very widely, and it was thought advisable to provide, as Clause 5 proposed to provide, that bills of sale should include only the goods enumerated in the schedule. In that way a borrower would assign all he had, but not what he would have in the future. With that object Clause 5 was inserted; but there were certain exceptions it was thought right to make. If a farmer wished to assign his crops, which were growing or which might grow, there was no reason why he should be prevented from assigning those crops. And if a portion of fixed machinery was taken down and replaced, the substituted machinery might be the subject of the bill of sale. But the hon. and learned Member now proposed, as he said, in favour of, but it seemed to him (the Attorney General) against, the farmer, that the farmer should be the only person permitted to assign property he had not got. There were two objections to this proposal. In the first place, the farmer was the very man who wanted protection; and it had been shown by evidence that the money-lenders were making their way through the agricultural districts in consequence of the depression there existing; and that borrowers, ignorant in regard to such transactions, gave bills of sale which were perfectly destructive to them. They were unaccustomed to such transactions, and yielded to the specious representations of the money-lenders, and district after district had been overrun by these money-lenders. Again, if this contention were admitted in regard to farmers, it must be admitted with respect to manufacturers, for there was no reason why a farmer should be excepted,

and not a manufacturer or tradesman. The effect of the Amendment would be to strike out of the clause the protection desired. The framers of the Bill had to consider whether they should extend the exception to other persons or leave the Bill as it was, and the balance was so strongly in favour of the principle contained in the Bill that they came to the conclusion to adhere to the Bill as it stood.

MR. WHITLEY said, that he regretted that the Attorney General had not seen his way to accept the proposed Amendment, for he thought the decision would have a most disastrous effect on the commercial world. He did not think anyone could have the slightest sympathy with the money-lenders; but in attempting to deal with them the Government were doing what would have a dangerous effect upon commercial communities. They were upsetting the legislation of 1878, which was arrived at on the representations of the commercial world, and in a way which they did not understand. They believed that the Bill dealt with Jew money-lenders; but instead of that it would prevent tradesmen from borrowing upon stock they had actually paid for. There was a great distinction between persons who assigned goods they had paid for and people who assigned what they had not paid for. He thought that if the House considered the question from the grave effect it would have upon large commercial operations, they would hesitate before they passed the clause as suggested in the Bill. Many communications had been made to him upon this point both by farmers and commercial men, and he thought that, it was very probable that, in the endeavour to deal a blow at the users, they would injuriously affect the commercial classes.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT said, he had listened most attentively to the statement of the Attorney General, and he was bound to say he did not think the hon. and learned Gentleman had given the consideration he might have done to a statement made on this point the other evening. Goods bought and paid for were in quite a different category to goods bought on credit, and the Attorney General might even now see his way to introduce words which might have the effect of keeping the Bill within the limits he had laid down in the 5th clause. No one wished to encourage money-lenders; but he feared that unless something were done to comply with the wishes of his hon. and learned Friend, an injustice might be done to many tenant farmers.

MR. MONK said, the promoters of the Bill had an anxious desire to accept any Amendment in the interests of the farmers that was feasible. They found it impossible, however, to accept an Amendment of this sort, which would allow certain privileges to farmers which were not to be allowed to other traders. If they passed this Amendment in the shape in which it appeared on the Paper, it would be necessary to allow, for instance, shopkeepers to give bills of sale on their floating stock. It was all very well to say that this was live stock which had been actually paid for. It would be just the same if it was paid for by bill due six or 12 months hence. The subject was very fully discussed last year by a Select Committee consisting of 15 Members of that House, and after long and anxious consideration they extended to farmers the right to give a bill of sale on their growing crops, so there was an advantage given to them which did not apply to ordinary traders. He must agree with the Attorney General in opposing the present Amendment.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he thought it would be a great mistake to accept the Amendment, though he was certain the hon. and learned Member introduced it with the best intentions towards the farming class. The phrase, "stock bond fide paid for," would be deceptive in its operation, and he had no doubt that injustice would often be done, although the terms of the clause might be complied with. He had had a good deal of experience in this sort of thing, and he should certainly say that, in the interest of mercantile, farming, and trading communities, the less people had to do with bills of sale the better.

Mr. WILLIS said, he should support the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member, because he objected strongly to Clause 5 of the Bill. The effect of Clause 5 would really be to put an end to most important commercial transactions.

MR. SPEAKER: The House is now engaged in considering Clause 6. The hon. and learned Member cannot go back to Clause 5.

MR. WILLIS said, he would content himself by stating that he would support the proposal of the hon. and learned Member, because it would, to a certain extent, modify the pernicious effects of Clause 5.

MR. H. H. FOWLER said, it would be seen, if the Amendment were adopted, that a trader might buy on credit stock to the amount of, say, £100, but for which he did not pay 1*d.*; he might give a four months' bill. He might immediately raise money upon that stock by means of a bill of sale. It very often happened that the money-lender got his money, and that the legitimate creditor got nothing at all for his goods. It had been proved in thousands of cases that the dealing with future property was a source of the greatest fraud and robbery.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. MONK moved, in Clause 7, page 2, to leave out lines 18 and 19, and insert—

"Personal chattels assigned under a bill of sale shall not be liable to seizure by the grantee for any other than the following causes."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. H. G. ALLEN moved, in Clause 7, page 2, line 36, after "given," to insert—

"And if such consideration shall be wholly or in part the payment of money, then the amount of such money thereupon or theretofore, actually received by the grantor, without deduction."

He thought it was of great importance that there should not be deductions for bonuses and interest, and so on, from the sum actually received by the grantor. It very often happened that very large sums were deducted by the money-lenders, and that the unfortunate and, in frequent instances, ignorant borrower, received a sum which was not the amount represented on the face of the bill. He thought there was a great concurrence of opinion on this point. Over and over again it had been stated by County Court Judges, before whom these cases were now constantly coming, that in almost all cases the borrower was misled by the sum stated on the face of the bill, and that he received only a small proportion of the sum stated in the bill, deductions being made for all kinds of things.

Amendment proposed,

In page 2, line 36, after the word "given," to insert the words "and if such consideration shall be wholly or in part the payment of money, then the amount of such money thereupon or theretofore, actually received by the grantor, without deduction."—(Mr. Henry Allen.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, he thought that, on the whole, it would be better to let the clause stand as at present framed.

Question put, and negatived.

MR. WARTON moved, in page 3, line 5, after the word "grantor," to insert the words "for this purpose." It was only necessary the solicitor should be solicitor to the grantor for this purpose, and those were the words which were suggested in the Paper circulated by the Council of the Incorporated Law Society. If the Attorney General would look into the matter, he would find the insertion of the words would make the clause read more effectively.

Amendment proposed, in page 3, line 5, after the word "grantor," to insert the words "for this purpose."—(Mr. Warton.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, the proposition, although it would do no good, would do no harm. He could not, however, insert the words where the hon. and learned Member proposed to place them, but at the end of the clause. With that modification he would accept the words—

"And is the solicitor of the grantor and not the solicitor of the grantee for this purpose."

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Amendment, to strike out the word "is" after the word "and," in line 5, put, and agreed to.

Further Amendment, to add, at the end of the Clause, "for this purpose," put, and agreed to.

MR. MONK proposed, in Clause 10, line 7, to leave out the word "eight," and insert "nine."

Amendment agreed to.

MR. H. G. ALLEN moved the omission of the end of Clause 11 after the word "registrar," in line 16, for the purpose of inserting words to provide that the registrars of the County Courts should be the registrars for the purposes of the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878 and 1882, and should file a copy of the bill of sale, and of the affidavit, and a copy of all the particulars required by the principal Act, in accordance with the provisions contained in the principal Act, and within three clear days after such filing and registration should transmit, in the prescribed form, an abstract of the contents of the bill of sale to the registrar acting under the provisions of the principal Act. The only object of this Amendment was to provide that in country districts the registrar of the County Court should be the registrar under the Act instead of the registrar in London. He believed that the adoption of that regulation would bring about a great saving of expense, and, in the end, no harm would be done, because an abstract would still be sent to London. It would be of great advantage in the country districts, where many of these transactions took place, that a bill of sale should be registered, in the first instance, in the County Court of the district. In the Committee a strong opinion was expressed that bills of sale in country districts should be registered in the County Court of the district.

MR. MONK begged his hon. and learned Friend's pardon. The Committee were unanimous the other way.

MR. H. G. ALLEN said, he had been perusing the answers and responses made to the Lord Chancellor upon certain queries as to the working of the Bills of Sale Acts, and he found that there was a great concurrence of opinion, if not among Members of the Committee, yet among the most experienced witnesses examined, that these bills of sale should be registered in the County Courts. Mr. Falconer, a Judge of one of those Courts, of very great experience, said that all bills of sale should be registered in the district where the assignor resided, and it was only necessary to send to the London office a duly examined abstract. A similar response had been received from the County Court Judge of Bedford, who said that the registration of bills of sale in the district County Courts would very much diminish the expense of registration, and such was also the opinion of many other witnesses of the greatest ability and experience. The alteration which he proposed was calculated to give facilities to those who lived in the country to discover what incumbrances there were on the property, and to diminish the expense now incurred; and also the delay in searching for these bills, which at present involved a considerable expenditure of money and time to persons living in remote country districts. They were now required to come up to London in order to conduct their inquiries; and the unnecessary cost thus entailed would be altogether obviated if they were registered, in the first instance, in the district County Courts. No inconvenience would be entailed in London, because the abstract would be sent there within three days of its being filed. Under these circumstances, he proposed to amend the clause in the way suggested by the Amendment.

Amendment proposed,

In page 3, line 16, to leave out from the word "registrar" to the end of the Clause, in order to insert the words "of the county court in whose district such places are situate, and if such places are in the districts of different registrars, then each such registrar shall be the registrar or registrars for the purposes of the Bills of Sale Acts, 1878, and 1882, and shall file the copy and affidavit, and enter, keep, and index in a register to be kept by him in the office of the said county court, the particulars required by the principal Act in the manner and in accordance with the provisions and regulations contained in the said principal Act with regard to the filing, entry, and registration thereby required, and shall also within three clear days after such filing and registration, transmit an abstract in the prescribed form of the contents of such bill of sale to the registrar acting under the provisions of the principal Act, who shall file, keep, and index every such abstract in the prescribed manner, and shall not be required to file, keep, or index the copy, bill of sale, affidavit, or other particulars relating thereto, except as aforesaid."—(Mr Henry Allen.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

MR. MONK said, the Committee were quite unanimous in agreeing to the provision of the Bill as it stood at present—namely, that all bills of sale, which, by the way, must all be sent up to Somerset House to be stamped, should be registered in London. The central Registry was easy of access to everyone. It was a very simple thing for agents in London to take a note of the bills of sale registered here and transmit notices to the country, when an abstract of them could be sent down to the registrars of the County Court where the bills of sale originated. The information would be obtained in that way much earlier by the world in general than if bills of sale were required to be registered in the County Courts of the district in which they were given.

MR. H. G. ALLEN pointed out that the clause contained a provision requiring an abstract to be sent to London.

MR. MONK said, that in that case the information would come to London later than it did at present. At present it was transmitted immediately; but under the amended clause there would be a delay. He hoped the House would be unanimous in rejecting the proposal.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA also expressed a hope that the Attorney General would not accept the Amendment.

Question put, and agreed to.

MR. MELDON said, they had now arrived at a most important clause of the Bill; and he felt so strongly that legislation in this direction was quite wrong that after having first called attention to the serious omission in the clause—Clause 13—he intended to move the rejection of the clause altogether. Clause 13 sought to apply what was known as the "Disputed Ownership" doctrine in a modified form to the Bill. In 1878, the principal objection made to the passing of this clause was that so long as the "Disputed Ownership" Clause was in operation no bill of sale could be looked upon as a bond fide or valuable security at all. He wished to point out that the validity of a bill of sale did not depend upon the grantor being in possession of the goods at the time of the bankruptcy, but whether or not the grantee under a bill of sale was able to come into possession sooner than a wholesale trader who had advanced money on the security of a bill of sale. Wholesale traders might live some distance away from the place where the person who gave the bill of sale was residing; but the usurer would probably live on the spot, and would possess much better means of knowledge and be able to find out more rapidly whether the trader was about to become bankrupt or not. In the case of such bankruptcy, within 24 hours he would be able to obtain possession of the goods, and thereby make valid the bill of sale which was his security; whereas the wholesale dealer, who resided at a distance and had no means of knowing the moment at which a trader became bankrupt, would lose his money in consequence of the "Disputed Ownership" Clause being put in force. The Act of 1878 gave a further protection to the bond fide holder of a bill of sale, because it was not sufficient to show that the goods were in the actual possession of the grantor; but it was also necessary to show that the possession or apparent possession was with the consent of the person to whom the goods really belonged. This clause was said to be a compromise between the two; but it changed the law materially against the bond fide holder of a bill of sale, because now, no matter what efforts the bond fide wholesale dealer made to obtain possession of the goods, even by violence, the money-lender could keep him out, and this new clause actually prevented him from obtaining the value of his goods. This was a departure from the law never known in the Bankruptcy Law before. The most material provision of the Bankruptcy Law was that such a transaction should be with the consent of the person who was the owner of the goods; and he did not think the Attorney General would agree for one moment to accept the clause in its present shape. Having pointed out this omission in the clause, he wished to say, further, that the matter was one upon which he felt strongly, regarding it, as he did, as backward legislation; and he should, therefore, have to put the House to the trouble of dividing upon the subject. He wished the House to understand clearly the position of the question. This Bill was brought in, owing to the action of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, in order to prevent usurers from lending money at exorbitant interest; but it was very well known that in the way of ordinary trade there were many persons who supplied goods on bills of sale, and that a large number of bills of sale were held by wholesale dealers. It was not wise, he thought, to make a material alteration in the law to the prejudice of these wholesale dealers, simply because there was a moment of panic, owing to the fact that usurers were in the habit of lending money on bills of sale. He thought this attempt at legislation had not been very carefully considered. What was the position of affairs? He quite admitted that bills of sale ought to be swept away altogether; but, at the same time, they had no right to allow bills of sale to be a legal and valid security, and then surround them with such provisions that they only became traps and pitfalls to induce persons to invest money in unreal security. Instead of applying the ordinary doctrine of bankruptcy and disputed ownership, it was suggested that it should not apply in a case where the ownership had occurred within a year. The question of validity would not, therefore, apply to goods that had been taken into the possession of the grantee in 12 months; but the bill of sale was made to turn upon the fact whether the goods had been seized within 24 hours or not. Twenty-four hours after the bankruptcy had occurred possession could be taken by the grantee; and this clause, in that case, did not apply, and the Bill, if passed, would, in his opinion, afford no protection at all. The clause simply gave an opportunity to those who lived on the spot, at the last moment, having allowed the trader to obtain all the benefit of having a reasonable possession of the goods, and having, perhaps, by an act of collusion, received early information to take steps for obtaining possession of the goods; whereas a bond fide holder of a good bill of sale, who did not possess the same means of information, could not do so. The simple effect of this clause was to enable the bankrupt, just before his bankruptcy, to give notice to some favoured creditor who held a bill of sale, and that favoured creditor immediately stepped in and obtained possession of the goods—his bill of sale being valid, while the bond fide creditor was absolutely shut out. The whole matter was fully considered in 1878, and subsequently, in reference to the Bill which dealt with Ireland. He believed that most people would be willing to abolish bills of sale altogether; but if they were to be valid securities, it was highly improper to surround them with pitfalls and traps such as had been introduced into this Bill. The Attorney General had stated that this was only a compromise, and that it was going back, to some extent, in the direction of the old Act. The old law was not satisfactory;

but he thought he had shown the House that this clause, as it stood, was very much worse than the old law as it was in 1878. He begged to move the rejection of the clause.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 13.—(Mr. Meldon.)

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) said, that the clause, as affecting the commercial community, was one that had met with the approval of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, who, as he believed, were perfectly well able to protect the interest of those concerned. The hon. Member had, however, pointed out a defect which was quite unintentional; and if he would withdraw his objection to the clause as a whole, he should be perfectly willing to agree to the insertion of the words "by consent and permission of the true owner."

MR. MELDON said, he should have no objection to withdraw his Motion for the purpose of amending the clause, if he could afterwards move its rejection.

MR. SPEAKER: I must point out to the hon. Member that, if the clause is amended, he cannot propose the rejection of the clause at this stage of the Bill.

MR. MELDON said, in that case he would adhere to his Motion for the rejection of the clause.

Question put, "That Clause 13 stand part of the Bill."

The House divided:—Ayes 66; Noes 7: Majority 59.—(Div. List, No. 61.)

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 15, page 4, line 7, to leave out from "Company," to end of Clause, and insert "or other body is wound up under 'The Companies Act, 1862,' and the Acts amending the same, any bill of sale given by such Company or body within twelve months next preceding the commencement of the winding-up, shall, as against the liquidators of the Company or body, be void, in respect of any personal chattels which, at or after the commencement of the winding-up are in the possession or apparent possession, or the order and disposition of the said Company or body."—(Mr. Monk.)

MR. MELDON said, there were some words in this Amendment to which he objected, inasmuch as they would make the clause really unintelligible, and create, moreover, great difficulty. They were "or other body" wound up under the Companies Act of 1862. The expression "or other body" was one that did not occur in any of the Companies Acts, the wording of which, he thought, ought to be followed in the Amendment. He suggested the omission of the words.

MR. MONK said, he saw no reason for retaining the words objected to, and was willing to agree to their omission throughout the Amendment.

The words "or other body" in line 1, and "or body" in lines 3, 4, and 5 of the Amendment struck out.

Amendment proposed to the proposed Amendment,

After the word "are," in line 7, to add "by consent and permission of the true owner."—(Mr. Attorney General.)

Amendment, as amended, agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 18, page 4, line 29, leave out the first "and," and insert "on payment of a fee of one shilling, or such other fee as may be prescribed, and subject to such regulations as may be prescribed, and shall be entitled at all reasonable times."—(Mr. Monk.)

Amendment agreed to.

Amendment proposed,

In Clause 18, page 4, line 33, after "stamp," insert "Provided, That the said extracts shall be limited to the dates of execution, registration, renewal of registration, and satisfaction, to the names, addresses, and occupations of the parties, to the amount of the consideration, and to any further prescribed particulars."—(Mr. Monk.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. O'SHEA said, with the object of making the Bill apply to Ireland, he should move the omission of Clause 19.

Amendment proposed, to leave out Clause 19.—(Mr. O'Shea.)

Question proposed, "That Clause 19 stand part of the Bill."

MR. MONK pointed out that the original Bill did not apply to Ireland, which was under a separate Act. He trusted the Amendment would not be pressed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES) objected to the Amendment, the effect of which would be to make the present Bill applicable to Ireland, where there was a distinct system of legislation in respect of bills of sale. The result of engrafting the provisions of this measure upon the system now in force could only be productive of mischief.

MR. MONK said, he thought it was right that there should be one system of legislation in respect of bills of sale. The want of it had, no doubt, given rise to a great deal of confusion in Ireland. It had given the greatest possible power of extorting enormous sums from unfortunate individuals in Ireland. The mode by which it was proposed to remedy the evil was not a good one; it should be done by the hon. Member, or someone else, this Session introducing a Bill to deal with the law of Ireland. If the hon. Member would do that, the measure would have the support of those who had been Members of the Bills of Sale Act Committee.

MR. O'SHEA said, that, after the recommendation of his hon. Friend, he should withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."—(Mr. Summers.)

MR. WHITLEY said, he hoped the hon. Member would not proceed with the Committee stage of the Bill at that hour of the morning (2.40). It would deal, he saw, with the lands of Corporations. There were many provisions in it which would have to be carefully considered.

MR. SUMMERS said, that it would, perhaps, be better to postpone the Committee until Thursday.

House in Committee (according to order); amendments made: The Report thereof to be received on Tuesday the 25th of April next; and Bill to be printed as amended. (No. 52.)

EARL CAIRNS suggested that the third reading of the Bill should be postponed till after the Easter Recess, in order that the Profession might have time to consider the Amendments.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR assented to the suggestion as entirely reasonable. The Amendments referred to by his noble and learned Friend were, for the most part, designed to embody in the new Bill certain provisions in the existing law which it was thought desirable to re-enact.

ARMY (DESSERTERS).

MOTION FOR A RETURN.

LORD TRURO, in rising to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether the number of recruits shown in the General Annual Returns is that of exclusively new men recruited to the Army, or whether it includes the numerous oft-repeated re-enlistments of deserters; and to move for a Return showing the number of re-enlistments respectively by deserters, said, that he had recently asked the Government to furnish the Annual Army Returns earlier in the Session. Some objection was taken to his request; but he was glad to hear that the Government had taken an opportunity of considering whether they could grant it. But, while it was extremely desirable that the Returns should be furnished earlier, it was still more important that they should be fuller and more accurate, with more uniformity in classification and headings. He had been informed that, even in the Army, considerable trouble and difficulty had occasionally arisen from the headings of the Returns not being uniformly the same. With respect to the accuracy of the Returns, he wished to call their Lordships' attention to a few points in which considerable divergence existed between the Annual Returns presented to Parliament in April, 1880, and the Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting for the same year. In the Annual Returns for 1880 the number of desertions was stated to be 3,276, while the Inspector General placed them at 2,384. Then the Inspector General stated the number of recruits to be 22,022, whereas, in the Annual Returns, the number of recruits was shown as 25,535. In speaking of recruits he wished to ask, as it did not appear from the Returns, whether the men who joined the Army from the Militia were below the age at which they could properly be enlisted? Nor was there any allusion whatever in the Inspector General's Report to the recruits who did not come up to be attested. The Annual Returns showed that 6,589 men in 1880 were recruited, but did not attend to be attested. There was also an absence in the Inspector General's Report of a proper classification of men discharged for misconduct. A large number of men had been discharged for illness and misconduct; but some of the Returns were classified so indifferently, that it was difficult to understand what number should come under the different heads. The large number of 8,462 deserters from the Militia was given in the last Return, and this was a serious matter. But what he particularly wished to draw attention to was the number of re-enlistments, because unless they ascertained this it was impossible to understand what the strength of the Army was. If a man deserted and re-enlisted in various parts of the country and was returned each time as a new recruit, the nation was miserably deceived as to the strength of the Army. His sole object in calling attention to the facts and figures was that in future better Returns should be furnished, and at a period of the Session when Parliament would be able to consider them. The noble Lord concluded by moving for the Return of which he had given Notice.

Moved, "That there be laid before this House, Return showing the number of re-enlistments respectively by deserters."—(The Lord Truro.)

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he could assure his noble Friend that this subject, upon which he had asked a Question on a former evening, was occupying the attention of the military authorities of the War Office, and that they were quite as desirous as he himself and their Lordships were to get as early as possible the Returns in question. It was of great importance that they should be obtained as accurately as possible. The noble Lord had criticized the Returns, and said they should be more accurate. He (the Earl of Morley) quite agreed that they should be accurate; but the inaccuracies pointed out were very small, and not of a serious character, being in one case only eight men in 8,000, and in another instance 28 men in 25,000. He could not say exactly how these slight inaccuracies occurred; but he had no doubt they could be explained. The question of fraudulent enlistment was one which caused uneasiness, and they were as anxious as the noble Lord to check them as far as possible. Of course, if a deserter were known, he would not be enlisted at all; but, if he were enlisted, he would come under the head of recruits until discovered, when he would be liable to punishment. A paragraph in the Inspector General's Return showed what it was proposed to do in order to check, as far as possible, those practices. It was proposed that the medical officer should record in the attestation whether he thought the recruit had served before. An order would be issued almost immediately with the view of preventing fraudulent enlistment. Under that order a man offering to enlist would not be accepted unless he should satisfy the officer that his answers as to previous enlistment were to be relied upon. Last year 667 men were convicted of fraudulent enlistment. He regretted that there were so many, and the authorities were very anxious that the crime—for it was nothing less than a crime—should be checked as far as possible. He trusted that with greater care on the part of the medical officers and recruiting sergeants that would be done. The Return for which his noble Friend asked he was afraid it was impossible to give. It would not add much to the information he (the Earl of Morley) had already given to the House.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn.

STEAMSHIP "VICTORIA."

MOTION FOR A PAPER.

THE EARL OF DUNMORE, in rising to call the attention of the House to the accident that occurred to the South-Eastern Railway Company's Steamship "Victoria" on Tuesday last, the 21st March, off Boulogne, and to move for a copy of the certificate granted to that vessel by the Board of Trade, said, that on Tuesday last he was a passenger by the Victoria, which left Folkestone at 11.39 a.m. There was a strong westerly wind, with rough sea, and, the machinery breaking down, the vessel drifted for some time up Channel, but eventually reached Calais harbour in the afternoon. The ship could carry over 300 passengers, and yet there were only two small boats on board, which would not hold more than eight people each, and he should be very sorry to be one of them. It was a great sin to send such a ship to sea with only two small boats to fall back upon in an emergency. The travelling public deserved more care and attention. They relied upon Parliament to make laws for their protection, and they looked to the Railway and Shipping Companies to carry out those laws in their integrity. Either the Companies had failed to carry out the regulations of the Board of Trade, or those regulations were insufficient. All he now asked was that some inquiry should be made into the matter, and he would move that a copy of the certificate granted to the vessel by the Board of Trade should be laid before the House.

Moved for, "Passenger certificate granted to the South-Eastern Railway Company's steamship 'Victoria' by the Board of Trade."—(The Earl of Dunmore.)

LORD SUDELEY: My Lords, in reply to the noble Earl, I have to state that the steamer Victoria holds a certificate from the Board of Trade, authorizing her to carry 356 passengers between Folkestone and Boulogne. The boats she carries are two in number—one of them is a lifeboat and the other a jolly boat, capable of carrying 40 statute adults—namely, 25 and 15 persons respectively. She likewise carries two lifebuoys fit and ready for use. These boats are carried in accordance with a hard-and-fast scale contained in the Merchant Shipping Act, 1854, under which ships are required to be provided with boats, not at all in accordance with the number of passengers they may carry, but in accordance with the net registered tonnage of the ships; and as the size of ships is increasing, and owing to the operation of the tonnage laws, the register tonnage is decreasing, it follows that more passengers may be carried in a steamer provided with fewer boats than at the time of the passing of the Act. The Board of Trade have power to approve of liferafts in substitution for the boats required by statute, but not, as is often erroneously supposed, in addition to those boats. As regards the accident, it appears to have been very much as stated by the noble Earl. The Victoria left Folkestone for Boulogne at 11.30 on the 21st of March, with a crew of 21 men and 112 passengers. She encountered a strong breeze, with rough sea; and at 1.10 p.m., while going at the rate of 13 knots an hour, she was struck by a heavy sea. The crank pin of her port engine broke, and it took two hours to disconnect the engines, during which time, being in a disabled state, she drifted for about two hours, going about six miles up Channel. It certainly appeared that the number of boats was in accordance with the number prescribed by the Act of 1854. As soon as the engines were disconnected, she proceeded with her starboard engine, and arrived at Calais at 5 minutes to 4 o'clock. There will be no objection to lay the certificate of the Board of Trade on the Table, together with a Copy of the sections of the Acts of Parliament bearing upon the subject of boats and of the Board's instructions.

In answer to Lord ELPHINSTONE,

LORD SUDELEY said, that the ship, according to Act of Parliament, was bound to carry one lifeboat capable of carrying 25 passengers and one boat capable of carrying 15 passengers. He could not say at that moment whether she carried those boats or not; but he had no reason for supposing that she did not.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

STREET TRAFFIC (METROPOLIS)—
HYDE PARK CORNER.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether his attention has been drawn to the congested state of the traffic at Hyde Park Corner; and, if he has any objection to state to the House any plans he may have for facilitating its passage at that spot?

MR. SHAW LEFEVRE: Sir, I have been for some time past considering the best mode of providing a remedy for the difficulty at Hyde Park Corner, where the gravest complaints have been made of the danger and inconvenience to the public. With this object I have carefully considered all the many schemes which during the last 10 years have been devised at the Office of Works, or proposed to it from other quarters. The plan which I have selected, and which I propose to carry out, is one which was suggested some years ago by the Secretary to the Office of Works. A line will be drawn from Hamilton Place to Halkin Street, and this, it is proposed, shall be the future boundary of the Green Park; the land between this and the entrance to Hyde Park, and bounded by Piccadilly and Grosvenor Place, will be laid out as an open platz, intersected by such roads as may be necessary, and having in its centre ornamental gardens. This plan will involve the removal of the Wellington Arch from its present position to the point where Constitution Hill will end in the future, and where it will form the entrance gate to the Green Park. There will be broad roads from Hamilton Place to Halkin Street and to Grosvenor Crescent, and Piccadilly and Grosvenor Place may be widened to whatever extent may be necessary. The cost of this scheme is estimated at from £28,000 to £29,000. As the improvement is a Metropolitan one, the Government has thought that the burden of it should not fall upon the general taxpayers. I have, therefore, been in communication with the Metropolitan Board on the subject; and, although the matter has not yet been before the full Board, I have every reason to believe that the Board will contribute £20,000 to the scheme. The Duke of Westminster, who always takes a generous view of his position as a great landowner in London, has also offered £3,000 towards the scheme. The Commissioners of Woods and Forests, as owners of property in Hamilton Place and Piccadilly, will also contribute to the scheme, and I shall submit a Vote to the House for the remainder. I have not yet communicated with the Vestry upon whom the charge of the roads will fall; but I apprehend there will be no objection in this quarter. I have only to add that I will place to-morrow morning in the Library of the House a model showing the alterations intended; and I have great hopes it will be recognized not merely as a complete remedy for the evils complained of, but as forming a new and a fine feature in that part of the Metropolis.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—
ADMISSION OF SOLICITORS.

MR. HEALY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether he is aware that the Incorporated Law Society in Ireland require a solicitor's apprentice, before being admitted as a solicitor, to obtain a certificate of character signed by two members of the Dublin Law Club, and to give the members of that Club notice of his application to be admitted a solicitor; whether this Club is recognized for this purpose by Statute, or is entirely a private body formed for social purposes only; whether he is aware that its membership is as a rule confined to Dublin solicitors, so that country apprentices are often compelled to obtain the necessary certificates of character from gentlemen with whom they are wholly unacquainted; whether a certificate of character signed by the apprentice's master and his town agent, or any other two solicitors, and a notice posted in the hall of the Four Courts, would satisfy the requirements of the Law Society; whether the Incorporated Law Society, in prescribing the conditions referred to, are acting under the provisions of the Statute, or the Judges Rules regulating the procedure in such cases; whether it is in accordance with the Statute for a private body, not recognized by Law, to exercise a censorship over the solicitors' profession; and, whether, considering the onerous conditions and the heavy expenses imposed on apprentices prior to their admission as solicitors, the Rules in question can be modified or abolished?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, the Incorporated Law Society does not require a solicitor's apprentice to obtain the certificate of character referred to in the Question, nor to give any notice to the members of the Dublin Law Club. Before the recent Judicature Act such certificate and notice were required by the Law Courts for admission as an attorney; but under that Act admission as a solicitor by the Lord Chancellor is sufficient for every Division of the Supreme Court. New forms have been accordingly prepared, but not by the Incorporated Society, and the affidavit of an apprentice now states that notice of his application to be admitted a solicitor has been posted in the Law Club six days before swearing his affidavit. I am informed that the Law Club was founded in 1791 for the advancement of the interests of the solicitors' profession, and is not confined to Dublin solicitors; it is quite distinct from the Incorporated Society.

MR. HEALY wished to know when these rules referred to came into operation, because, as far as he understood, it must have been very recently?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): I think in 1878, and the rule is that the affidavit of the apprentice shall state that the notice of his application for admission was posted six days previously.

THE ROYAL IRISH CONSTABULARY—SUB-INSPECTOR ROGERS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland,

Mr. Healy

Whether it is true that Sub-Inspector Rogers, of the Royal Irish Constabulary, stationed in the month of October last in the city of Limerick, was returned by the local bench of magistrates to stand his trial on a charge of assault, the decision of the bench being come to by a vote of seven to one; whether the clerk of petty sessions, by order of the magistrates, wrote to the county inspector of the Royal Irish Constabulary for facilities towards the identification of constables who had been guilty, on the occasion above referred to, of violent attacks upon unoffending persons; whether the magistrates subsequently ordered an application for the same purpose to be made to the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant; whether the Town Council of Limerick, also by public resolution, applied for the names of the offending constables; whether all these applications on the part of the local authorities have hitherto failed to elicit any satisfactory response from either the local officers of constabulary or the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant; whether it is true that Sub-Inspector Rogers has never been placed upon his trial; whether he will be placed upon his trial as directed by the local magistrates; and, whether any explanation will be given of the refusal to facilitate the course of justice in regard to the constables who assaulted the citizens of Limerick?

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, last October, an aggravated assault was committed upon Mr. Henry O'Brien, of Limerick, by Sub-Inspector Henry C. Rogers, and a number of policemen; that, a summons for assault having been heard before the city of Limerick magistrates, when it was given in evidence that Sub-Inspector Rogers struck Mr. O'Brien with his sword, and that the policemen beat him with their rifles, the case was sent for trial to the Munster Winter Assizes; whether it is a fact that the case was subsequently postponed to the Limerick Spring Assizes, that these assizes are now over, and that the case had again been postponed; whether he will inquire into the cause of such repeated postponements; and, whether, in view of the grave charge against him, Sub-Inspector Rogers has been suspended from his duties, pending the decision of a jury on the facts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, as this Question and that of the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond) are matters for the Attorney General for Ireland, my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant has requested me to answer both Questions. Sub-Inspector Rogers was committed for trial on a charge of assault while quelling a violent riot in the City of Limerick during the conveyance to prison of a person arrested under the Protection Act. The informations were laid before me as Attorney General for Ireland by the Crown Solicitor, according to the practice of criminal procedure, for my direction, and having read and considered them I directed him not to prosecute. The Sub-Inspector, therefore, has not been put on trial, and I do not intend to prosecute. As to the other matters in these Questions, the clerk of petty sessions, by direction of the magistrates, sent copies of the informations to the County Inspector, with a request that he would make all necessary inquiries for the guidance of the magistrates and report the result for their information. Subsequently the copy informations were sent by the magistrates through their chairman to the Government, with a request that they should be directed as to what steps should be taken on an application by the complainants that an opportunity might be afforded them to identify the person mentioned in the informations. His Excellency, for the reason stated in his reply, declined to accede to the application. I am not aware whether any application was made by resolution of the Town Council.

MR. SEXTON asked the right hon. and learned Gentleman if he would state the reason for not prosecuting?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, the reason is the same as that upon which every Attorney General proceeds—that of using his own judgment in the matter, and exercising the discretion with which he is invested, and for the exercise of which he is responsible in such cases. In my opinion it was not a case which ought to be submitted to a petty jury, and my direction was given in reference to it along with many other cases in which I gave similar directions for the present Assizes. I formed my opinion upon the informations which were laid before me.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. MARTIN HUBON.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Mr. Martin Hubon, now imprisoned under the Coercion Act in Enniskillen Gaol, is being treated by the prison doctor for an affection of the eyes, which puts his sight in danger; whether the Enniskillen Gaol is an old building, and the cell occupied by Mr. Hubon narrow and dark, with a high and very small window, causing a dimness injurious to a person suffering in the manner described; and, whether the Government will order the removal of Mr. Hubon to Kilmainham, where he will have facility for consulting an oculist competent to deal with his case?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he was informed that Mr. Martin Hubon had suffered from an affection of the eyes all his life; the cell in Enniskillen Gaol which he occupied was not narrow or dark, the windows being high and affording ample light; neither was it likely to be injurious to a person suffering from such an affection. He would take care that Mr. Hubon, in compliance with his request, should be removed to Kilmainham, where he would be able to consult a competent oculist.

LAW AND POLICE—PERSONS FOUND DROWNED IN THE THAMES.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, Whether the attention of the Board has been directed to the large number of persons found drowned in the Thames, between Vauxhall Bridge and Blackfriars Bridge, in front of the Embankments; and, whether he will bring before the Board the question of the advisability of affixing life chains to the Embankment walls, throughout their whole length, in order to afford some assistance to drowning persons who may succeed in reaching the walls?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG: Sir I have observed in the newspapers with regret frequent mention of bodies having been found in the Thames between Vauxhall and Blackfriars Bridges; but

I am not aware that this is attributable in any way to the absence of chains on the Embankment walls. Suggestions that chains should be so placed have been made; but the Metropolitan Board have considered that, inasmuch as they would not be available at all times of the tide, they would be of no practical use.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE said, that the chains he had alluded to would be available at all times, because they would have to be so placed as to be so.

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG said, he thought that hon. Members ought not to make speeches when asking Questions.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. PATRICK GIBBONS.

MR. SEXTON (for Mr. BIGGAR) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Patrick Gibbons has been in prison as a suspect since May last; whether he has been under medical treatment in Galway Gaol for the past six months; and, whether, under the circumstances, there is any reason why he should be further detained in prison?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that Mr. Patrick Gibbons' name appeared on the doctor's books on the 18th October, and then his name did not appear until the 18th of March. He had been under medical treatment, as suffering from constipation, but was now in perfectly good health. His case was under the consideration of the Lord Lieutenant.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. FITZGERALD AND BEGLEY.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that Mr. Michael Fitzgerald, of Cappoquin, County Waterford, has been released from prison, while Mr. Begley, of the same place, who was arrested at the same time, and on suspicion of the same offence, is still in custody; and, if he will state why Mr. Begley has not been released?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that it was true that these persons were arrested at the same time and on the same warrant; but it did not follow that there were the same grounds for arrest. It was under consideration whether Mr. Begley could be released, as Mr. Fitzgerald had been; but upon that point he could not as yet give any answer.

POST OFFICE—CONVENTION OF PARIS—SEIZURE OF THE "IRISH WORLD" NEWSPAPER.

MR. HEALY asked the Postmaster General, in reference to the seizure of the "Irish World" in the post, Upon what authority the Government translate the word "perte" in the phrase "En cas de perte d'un envoi recommandé," in Article 6 of the Postal Convention of Paris, to mean "a thing lost which cannot be found;" and, if he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House the authorized translation of Article 6 which has been made from the French for the other countries included in the Postal Union?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General has asked the Irish Office to answer this Question. The authority on which the Government translate the French word perte in this sentence as "a loss of a thing which cannot be found" is that that phrase is the accurate equivalent in English for the word here used in French. The Convention is in the French language; but there is no authorized translation. Each country party to the Convention translates it for itself.

MR. HEALY asked if the right hon. and learned Gentleman could refer him to any authority for this translation, literary or otherwise?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): I think the hon. Gentleman can hardly require any such authority. I apprehend the origin of the word in the modern classic French is the Latin word perdo. It has its equivalent in the Greek word apoballo, meaning "to cast away from you and absolutely destroy."

STATE OF IRELAND—THE DROGHEDA TOWN COUNCIL—INTRUSION OF THE POLICE.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that a number of witnesses are prepared to prove that the words used by the sub-inspector of police at the Drogheda Town Council meeting on the occasion of the late election for mayor, are those which were reported in the press, and not those alleged by the official himself; if he will grant an inquiry into the matter; by whose instructions the police attended the meeting of the Corporation on the day in question; by whose instructions the constabulary attend meetings of the Drogheda Independent Club; and, whether, seeing that the members of the Club object to their presence, he will give orders that their attendance shall be discontinued?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that, having again inquired into the subject, he was quite satisfied of the accuracy of the answers he made to previous Questions as to the conduct of the Sub-Inspector of police at the Drogheda Town Council meeting on the occasion of the election of Mayor. The police attended the meeting by order of a superior officer, who acted on information received. He had no doubt that the Constabulary had also acted rightly in attending the meetings of the Drogheda Independent Club; but he would make further inquiries if the hon. Member liked to repeat his Question on Thursday or Friday.

MR. HEALY: I will not repeat the Question. I think the best course for the Drogheda Independent Club is to put the police out.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ALLEGED PROSELYTISM AMONG PERSONS IMPRISONED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that religious tracts have been placed in the cells of Catholic suspects in Limerick Prison; and if this has been done with the sanction of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he found that one paper of a religious character—not a tract—was found in the cell of one of the Roman Catholic prisoners in December last. The Inspector of the Prisons Board inquired into the matter at the time, but failed to discover how the paper had got into the cell. On the 26th December the Board issued strict orders to prevent the introduction of any unauthorized publications into the prison. That was the only instance of the kind which had been brought to his notice by the Prisons Board.

INLAND REVENUE—BEER LICENCES (IRELAND).

MR. R. POWER asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he is aware that persons in Ireland who sell beer merely by retail, for which they pay a Licence Duty of £1 5s., have, in addition, to pay the sum of £3 6s. 1½d. for a wholesale dealer's licence, which does not authorize the sale of less than four and a-half gallons, while retailers of beer in England are not required to take out this second licence; and, whether, in the next Revenue Bill, he will relieve Irish traders from paying for this extra licence in cases where it is not required?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GLADSTONE), in reply, said, that the Question was answered by him last year, and he probably could not do better than refer the hon. Member to the reply which was then given as to the details; and the real difficulty was this—that he did not think the hon. Member had quite accurately apprehended the difference of the law between England and Ireland, as to which the apparent inequality arose. It was not owing to any difference in the charge made by the Inland Revenue authorities; but to the fact that in England separate beer licences could be taken under the authority of the magistrates, whereas in Ireland they could not. The question of equalizing the law might be a proper subject for consideration, and in regard to that he should defer very much to the opinion of those connected with Ireland; but it was not a matter to be dealt with in a Revenue Bill, as the licences were not issued by the Revenue Department, but were under the control of the magistrates, and involved matters of police, &c., which it would not be suitable for the Revenue Department to deal with.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE LADIES' LAND LEAGUE—JUDGE BARRY AND MISS M'CORMACK.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the following extract from the "Daily Express" of last week:—

"A deputation of the citizens waited on Judge Barry, at his lodgings, Barrington Street, Limerick, this morning, for the purpose of requesting his Lordship to use his influence with the Government to have Miss McCormack, a member of the Dublin Ladies' Land League, released from the County Prison, where she is detained on a warrant issued by Mr. Clifford Lloyd, special resident magistrate, in default of finding sureties of 'good behaviour.' Judge Barry, in reply, said that, as a judge, he could not interfere in any way whatever with the matter, and could not receive the deputation in his judicial capacity; but, as Charles Barry and a citizen of Limerick, he was always glad to see his fellow-townsmen, and in that capacity alone he would use any private influence he had in forwarding the object of the deputation, and would write a private note to-day to the Chief Secretary, requesting, if it were possible to do so, that Miss McCormack should be released. The deputation thanked his Lordship for the courteous manner in which they were received, and withdrew;"

whether he had yet received the private note from the learned judge; and, if so, what answer has been returned?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I have seen the statement in The Daily Express, and I have also received a letter marked private from Judge Barry, to which I have given a reply. As the documents are of a private nature, I do not think I should be asked to answer the Question.

MR. J. R. YORKE asked the right hon. Gentleman whether he was prepared to draw a distinction between the learned Judge's action in his public and private capacity?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I do not think I am called upon to define that.

MINERAL LEASES — INSECURITY OF TENANTS' CAPITAL.

MR. ROLLS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, If he has any objection to lay upon the Table Copies of any letters and memorials, which he and the Secretary of State for the Home Department have received from Mr. Colborne, on the subject of insecurity of tenants' capital under mineral leases?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that inquiry had been made about the matter, and the only cognizance he had of it was that a letter was addressed to him by the gentleman referred to in the Question, which he (Mr. Gladstone) sent on to the Home Office in case his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department should find it would be a matter for his jurisdiction. Some conversation took place between his right hon. and learned Friend and this gentleman. It did not appear that it was a matter which could properly be laid in the form of a public document before the House, inasmuch as it seemed to concern simply miscarriage and inequality of private arrangements, which was really a matter for the discretion of the parties. Even if it related to the law on mineral leases, he did not know if it would be a matter for the Government to deal with; but they could not produce a private paper.

YOUNG IRELAND LITERARY SOCIETY, DUBLIN—ALLEGED INTRUSION OF THE POLICE.

MR. REDMOND said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland a Question which, probably, as he had so recently come from the seat of war, he might be able to answer now. The Question was with reference to the interference by the police in Dublin with a meeting held two nights ago of the Young Ireland Literary and Debating Society. He (Mr. Redmond) had previously got an answer which led him to suppose that the interference of the police would be deprecated in the future. He wished now to know from the right hon. Gentleman, Whether the police were authorized in any way in insisting upon getting the names of the chairman, secretary, and persons attending the meeting; whether the interference of the police on that occasion was authorized by the right hon. Gentleman; and, whether the police had general authority to enter any private house for the purpose of seeing what was going on?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I must ask the hon. Member to give Notice of his Question.

MR. HEALY asked whether any owner of a private house, which was entered without warrant, could eject the intruder?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON), in reply, said, it depended entirely on what was going on inside.

ORDER OF THE DAY.

SUPPLY.—REPORT.

Resolution [24th March] reported.

Said Resolution read a second time.

Mr. J. R. Yorke

MR. MAC IVER, who had a Notice of Motion on the Paper to reduce the sum asked for by £1,500, said, one reason, amongst others, for putting this Notice upon the Paper was that he felt he had received some provocation from the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke). But the House had nothing to do with anything that might be regarded as a personal question between the hon. Baronet and himself; and it devolved upon him, upon public grounds, to show some reasons of dissatisfaction with the general proceedings of the Foreign Office sufficient to justify him in putting the Motion on the Paper. There were abundance of such reasons. The hon. Baronet had published letters which appeared in the newspapers; and there was, no doubt, a very general feeling throughout the country that the Government had received certain valuable concessions relating to shipping and goods from the French Government. He should like to know whether the sum asked for by the Foreign Office in this Report of Supply included any payment in respect of recent or present negotiations in regard to French commercial matters?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No, Sir; none. ["Order!"] I understand the hon. Member to ask a definite question. My answer is in the negative. That sum was voted some weeks ago.

MR. MAC IVER went on to say that he thought he was justified in assuming that there were no negotiations going on at the present moment, or, if there were, that the cost of those negotiations was not included in the present Estimate. [SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: There are no negotiations.] He should like to ask whether the sum which the Foreign Office asked for included payment for Blue Books which had recently been issued by them; and, if so, he should like to ask, and he thought it but reasonable to do so, whose duty it was to prepare those Blue Books and to revise their contents? He also thought he was entitled to ask, in view of the letters which had appeared in the newspapers and the statements which had appeared in the Press, why it was that that duty should have been neglected, and how it was that the contents of the Blue Books, as a matter of fact, did not correspond with that which Members of the Government led the public, whether intentionally or otherwise, to believe? If it was a fact that the Government did obtain concessions with regard to bounties upon shipbuilding and on navigation, he asked why were those concessions not shown in the Blue Books, and why did not the Blue Books correspond with that which had been stated? He (Mr. Mac Iver) had examined the Blue Books, and had employed others to do so; and he did not find in them any confirmation whatever of the view that the Government received any concessions whatever from the French Commissioners in regard to bounties on shipping, or any that were worth having in relation to cargo. Under these circumstances, he thought he was perfectly justified in asking these questions. The amount by which he proposed that the Vote should be reduced was precisely equivalent to the salary of the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs; but he was sure that the hon. Baronet himself would believe that there was no one in that House more unwilling than he (Mr. Mac Iver) that any actual reduction should be made in that payment, which he was sure the hon. Baronet very hardly earned. The duties of the hon. Baronet's position were such that, if the Forms of the House permitted him, instead of moving that the salary should be reduced, he would have preferred to move that more money should be paid, and that the hon. Baronet should be properly assisted in the Department in which he held such an important place. He had not the slightest doubt the hon. Baronet did all he could; but he (Mr. Mac Iver) wished he was less overworked and that he was more accurate. And he thought he was not out of Order in calling attention to the general fact that the duties of the Foreign Office were not well performed. He had but a few more words to say, and that was in reference to what he conceived to be the proper duties of private Members in that House in relation to the Foreign Office. He thought that a Member who represented, as he (Mr. Mac Iver) represented, an important commercial constituency—a shipbuilding and a ship-owning constituency—a constituency of a port which, if not the largest, was certainly the second port in the Kingdom, had a right to ask reasonable questions of the Government in regard to commercial negotiations which were under the control of the Foreign Office. He admitted to the fullest extent that the justification of any question which he might have asked, or which he might yet ask, depended altogether upon the reasonableness of such questions. He thought he was justified in asking questions in regard to matters upon which he individually was perfectly well informed, and respecting which he knew beforehand what the reply of the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs ought to be if he wished to give information to the House of Commons on the subject. When he asked in the future for information, as he had asked for it in the past, it might be upon matters upon which he was perfectly well informed himself, for the purpose of pinning the Government to some statement by which information should be given to hon. Members in the House who were not concerned in shipowning constituencies, and to hon. Members who really lacked information on such subjects. He thought that the Ministerial replies to questions so asked ought to be of a nature to give bond fide information to the House and to the public on any subject on which the Government might reasonably and properly be interrogated. The proceedings of the Foreign Office, and especially of the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, if the latter would permit the comparison, reminded him of what Mark Twain, the American humorist, once said. He undertook to deliver a course of lectures, and said he could lecture best upon those subjects which he least understood, because then he should feel less trammelled in anything he might have to say. That was a truthful description of the replies of the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. He (Mr. Mac Iver) moved the reduction of the Vote, not in any serious desire to press that reduction to a division, but simply in order that he might express the hope that the Foreign Office would in the future make a more reasonable use than they had done in the past of the money voted to them, and would take a proper view of the duty, which he ventured to think devolved upon them, of giving accurate information to the House.

Mr. Mac Iver

Question proposed, "That '£3,631,600' stand part of the said Resolution."

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he only wished to say one or two words, not so much with reference to the protest which had just been made, but to ask the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government, and also his hon. Friend opposite (Sir Charles W. Dilke), whether any steps had been taken to secure the execution of the reforms in Turkey stipulated by the Treaty of Berlin? A long time had elapsed without any steps having been taken to carry out these stipulations as far as the Government was concerned. His hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs had told the House more than once that the Government were not able to act alone in this matter, and that they were obliged to invoke the Concert of Europe. But he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) thought that, as all were agreed upon the necessity of these reforms being carried out, Her Majesty's Government could not entirely get rid of their responsibility of taking the initiative simply because there had been a change of Government. The late Government had taken a leading part in the Berlin negotiations, and the Government could not now refuse to take a prominent place in seeing that the terms of that Treaty were fulfilled. His hon. Friend had told him on one or two occasions that there had been no apprehensions of any difficulty arising between Germany and Russia, and he would fully admit that the Government must know best what was going on in official circles; but, judging from what was appearing in the newspapers, he could not but say that there were evidences of the spirit of the people in the two countries which were far more significant than the assurances of Governments, and which seemed to him to give reasons for apprehending a movement of a Pan-Slavonic character which might seriously endanger the peace of Europe. He could not help thinking that if we were to resist this Panslavic inroad, and if we were to maintain the peace of Europe in the East, no course could be better calculated to attain that object than the establishment of autonomies in the East of Europe, and it would be perfectly in accordance with the Treaty of Berlin. On more than one occasion the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had expressed his views in favour of the speedy establishment of autonomies in the Turkish Empire; and he quite agreed with the right hon. Gentleman that without such changes the confusion in that part of the world was likely to be intensified. He should therefore be glad of some assurance on the point. He was sorry not to see the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies in his place, but he presumed he was agreeably engaged in East Cornwall in electioneering; but if he had been in the House he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) would have liked to have asked him whether he was prepared to lay upon the Table of the House the recent Constitution granted to Cyprus? and to have put a question as to the late census of the inhabitants of the Island. It was perfectly plain to his mind that the Constitution that had been established ought to have been founded upon fair distribution of power amongst the different nationalities of Cyprus; and he hoped that the Government would, before long, lay upon the Table of the House a statement of the principles on which the institutions had been given, as well as the basis upon which such principles had been arrived at. In the present state of Europe, and with the somewhat alarming accounts given in the newspapers as to the excitement in Germany and Russia, it would be satisfactory to learn the steps adopted by the Government for the maintenance of order in Eastern Europe.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, he would not be in Order in making any reference to what had just fallen from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) with regard to Cyprus. With regard to the observations of the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver), that hon. Gentleman appeared to have moved the reduction of the Vote by the amount of his (Sir Charles W. Dilke's) salary for one year; but he could not understand upon what principle he had done so, as it was rather hard that the hon. Member should move the reduction of his salary for a whole year upon a Vote which was only for two months on account. The hon. Member ought to have divided the sum by six and taken the Income Tax off. The references that the hon. Member had made to his geniality had taken away the sting of his remarks; but that geniality could not be expected to continue if, while his official duties remained the same, his income was altogether taken away. Now, he did not think that the details of the negotiations as to the French Commercial Treaty could be very conveniently discussed on the present occasion. As the hon. Member had said, the subject was one in which his constituency and the shipping interest in general were nearly concerned; but the House had never shown any great disposition to follow the remarks of the hon. Member, and he hoped he might suggest, without any disrespect, that some of the hon. Member's observations were more suitable to his constituency than to the House of Commons. The hon. Member apparently had attacked the Foreign Office on the singular ground of his belief in what had been written and published in the newspapers by certain hon. Members below the Gangway on that side of the House. He (Sir Charles W. Dilke) was unacquainted with those articles, or with their authors, and did not know to what the hon. Member was referring. The hon. Member had asked whether the money that the Blue Books cost was included in this Vote. It was not, although the responsibility for the preparation of these particular Blue Books rested upon him (Sir Charles W. Dilke), and he was perfectly prepared to accept the responsibility. The hon. Gentleman had also stated, inter alia, that the Blue Books did not confirm the replies given in the House as to the negotiations for the Commercial Treaty, with reference, in particular, to the French shipping bounties and the surtaxe d'entrepôt. The question of the bounties on shipping he thought they had settled together the other day. The hon. Member complained that the Government had made no further representations as to the bounties; but that was not the case. Representations had, as a matter of fact, been made, but without result, as no Tariff Treaty or Treaty dealing with that subject had yet been concluded. With regard to the surtaxe d'entrepôt, the hon. Gentleman was mistaken in supposing that we did not reap any benefit in connection with it, because reductions had been made under the Belgian Treaty, and we enjoyed these reductions under the "Most Favoured Nation" Clause. With regard to the other portion of the surtaxe d'entrepôt case—namely, that which affected the Canadian trade through England, as contrasted with the Canadian trade through the United States, he had already twice told the hon. Member that we had obtained concessions from the French negotiators; and in the event of a Treaty having been made with France, those concessions would have been carried out. The hon. Gentleman had taken all the sting away from his observations by remarking that the Foreign Office Vote ought rather to be increased than diminished; and, therefore, he thought he could safely leave that question with the House. Passing to the observations of his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth respecting the necessity of reforms in the Turkish Empire, he could only say that he concurred with him when he asked the Government not to repudiate the initiative in these matters. They did not repudiate the initiative; they had always taken the initiative as regarded the Provinces of European Turkey, and they continued to lead the concerted action of the European Powers at the present. He regretted as much as the hon. Gentleman could regret the slowness with which these matters were progressing; but it was useless to conceal the fact that other Powers did not feel so acutely upon the subject as we did ourselves. With regard to the reforms in the European Provinces, the Government had pressed the Armenian reforms. They had applied greater pressure with regard to these reforms, and they had received very strong assurances from the Turkish Government that the reforms would very shortly be carried out in Armenia. The only step, however, that had been taken up to the present time had been the removal of a few Provincial Governors, whose characters had been reported upon unfavourably, and the appointment of various Sub-Governors. He agreed with his hon. Friend in thinking that the reforms, of course, were greatly to be desired in the interests of Turkey herself, especially at a time when there were feelings abroad such as those to which the hon. Member had alluded; but the Government had no reason at the present time to apprehend any danger of a European war.

MR. O'SHEA said, he hoped the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver) would not press his Amendment, although, in his (Mr. O'Shea's) opinion, he and other private Members had reason to complain of some of the answers as to foreign affairs given by the hon. Baronet, who had never given the House any real information as to our commercial negotiations with France and Spain. As a rule, the hon. Baronet's replies were terse, and conveyed no meaning whatever. He (Mr. O'Shea) had asked yesterday whether it was true that the Spanish Government had asked our Government to enter into serious commercial negotiations, and had suggested that they should take place at Madrid. The only answer given by the hon. Baronet was that the Spanish Government had asked that negotiations should take place at Madrid, and not a word had been said as to the reply of our Government or the appointment of Commissioners to negotiate. And on many other occasions the very minimum of information had been given by the hon. Baronet, and something always seemed to be kept back, with the air, perhaps, less of a Machiavelli than of a Talleyrand. He wished to know whether the Government intended to enter upon negotiations with the Spanish Government at Madrid; and, if so, whether they would appoint Commissioners?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE, in reply, said, that he had accurately and completely answered the Question as it appeared on the Paper yesterday, but had not entered into matters as to which no inquiry had been made. His hon. Friend did not ask that which he now asked, and he did not know whether his hon. Friend wished him to go further and to say what answer had been given by Her Majesty's Government. However, he might add that instructions on the subject were being drawn up for communication to Her Majesty's Minister in Madrid; but they had not yet been sent.

MR. O'SHEA: Are negotiators to be sent?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: We do not think it necessary to send special

Sir Charles W. Dilke

Commissioners, having full confidence in Her Majesty's Minister at Madrid.

Mr. GEORGE RUSSELL said, that he was anxious to dissociate himself from the sentiments of the hon. Members opposite and below him (Mr. Mac Iver and Mr. O'Shea). He desired to say that, in his opinion, during the last two years no Department of the Government was administered with more conspicuous skill and courtesy than that administered by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Mac Iver) at one time would move to reduce the Vote and at another to increase it, on the ground that the pressure of work was so great that the Under Secretary of State had no leisure to acquaint himself with the subjects brought to his notice, and was thereby driven to give inaccurate and untrustworthy information. So far from that being the case, nothing had been more remarkable than the accuracy and conciseness of the answers of the hon. Baronet, except the courtesy which he had always maintained in the face of very strong provocation. The answers of the hon. Baronet were such that any Member of the Government might be proud to imitate. The information given had been trustworthy, and it had been given with a point and decision, and with an extreme urbanity of manner, which had never been more conspicuous than when to-day he replied to those questions which the hon. Member for Birkenhead thought reasonable, but to which many Members would apply a very different term.

Mr. MAC IVER asked to withdraw his Motion. [Cries of "No, no!"] He would only add that if the tone of the hon. Baronet had always been what it had been that day he should never have brought the matter forward.

Question put, and agreed to.

Mr. SEXTON said, the Members of the Irish Party entertained a profound objection to the method of dealing with public money contemplated by the present Vote. The taking of public money by Votes on Account seemed to be growing into a practice and hardening down into a system; and he could conceive of no system better calculated to make the Government irresponsible, and to withdraw from the House of Commons its chief Constitutional function of criticizing the expenditure of the State. In the course of the summer they might ask for another Vote on Account, and then, as now, they might ask to postpone discussion; and finally, when the Vote for the balance was taken, and when by common consent the occasion had arrived for Constitutional criticism, the Dog-days would also have arrived, and the House of Commons would not be in a position to give the Vote that criticism which the public interest required. Irish Members, however, were not disposed to interfere between English Members and the Government; and, therefore, the reduction which he meant to move on the Vote should have reference only to items of expenditure for purposes of State in Ireland.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must inform the hon. Gentleman that after the Motion which has just been decided upon by this House no further reduction can be moved, because the House has affirmed that the original sum shall stand part of the Resolution. The hon. Member is at liberty to make any observations he pleases in reference to the Vote; but he cannot move its reduction.

Mr. SEXTON: Then I will confine myself to observations with reference to Ireland.

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR, as a point of Order, wished to ask whether it was not competent for an hon. Member now to move for a reduction of the Vote smaller than that which had been moved by the hon. Member for Birkenhead (Mr. Mac Iver)? Would it, for instance, not be competent for the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) to move for the reduction of the Vote by £1,200?

Mr. SPEAKER: The vote of the House was to this effect—the Question is, "That the sum of £3,631,600 stand part of the proposed Resolution." The House having resolved that in the affirmative, it is obvious that the amount cannot now be reduced.

Mr. SEXTON said, he apprehended at once the force of the right hon. Gentleman's ruling; and he should therefore strictly confine himself to observations on the item for the Office of Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant and that of Irish Prisons. He might say a great deal with reference to the manner in which the Civil Service in Ireland as regarded the prisons had lately been administered ; that from time to time in that House he had felt it his painful duty to expose the manner in which, in the name of the resources of civilization, the instincts of barbarism had been applied with intense gratification ; but, at present, he would confine himself to an inquiry into the present condition of the question of the imprisonment of three Members of Parliament in an Irish prison by a Government of which the Chief Secretary for Ireland was the principal responsible Officer in Ireland. He said the present condition, because the condition of the question with regard to these three hon. Gentlemen had within the last few days—he might say within the last few hours—very gravely and materially changed. In the first place, these hon. Gentlemen were not imprisoned in pursuance of any judicial process, any verdict of a jury, or any finding of a Judge. They were imprisoned on what was called “reasonable suspicion” in the mind of an Irish subordinate of the right hon. Gentleman at the head of the Government ; and if the Government saw any reason to order their release, nothing more was necessary than to instruct the subordinate, and they would be released as a matter of course. Why were these hon. Gentlemen imprisoned ? He (Mr. Sexton) was in a position to state the exact words of the Chief Secretary for Ireland on this point. He said, in a public letter, which was in strict keeping with previous declarations in this House, that the Coercion Act was intended to be used for the purpose of prevention, and not for the purposes of punishment. He asked the right hon. Gentleman for the purpose of preventing what ? For the purpose of preventing the illegal acts contemplated by the Coercion Act—namely, acts of violence and intimidation. Passing on to the next point, he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether the telegram he was about to read accurately represented the facts to which it referred ? This telegram was addressed to him (Mr. Sexton) by the hon. Members for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and the Counties of Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) and Roscommon (Mr. O’Kelly), and was dated yesterday, from the prison, Kilmainham—

sion on Mr. Marriott’s Amendment, and undertaking to refrain from any action in any other political matter during our absence from prison, and after the division to return to Ireland, and surrender ourselves to the Lord Lieutenant.”

He (Mr. Sexton) now wished the Prime Minister and the House—he wished the Government and the country to clearly understand that these hon. Gentlemen had not taken this step of their own motion. He most firmly believed that the spirit which had sustained them through weary months of imprisonment would have animated them yet, and kept them silent ; but they had made this application in obedience to the unanimous wish of their Colleagues in Parliament. If they had consulted their own feelings, they would have made no application on that or any other subject to the right hon. Gentleman ; and it was only in deference to the wishes of others, and in obedience to their sense of duty to their country and to the mandate given by their constituents of the city of Cork and the counties of Tipperary and Roscommon that the application had been made. And why had it been made ? Because they were on the eve of a trial of strength the most momentous that had distinguished the Parliamentary history of this century. It would be an idle task to compare the division to be taken on Thursday night with any other division. It would be no ordinary division, but an extraordinary one, perhaps the most extraordinary that had ever been taken in that House, for it was the first step in proceedings which proposed to uproot and shatter the Parliamentary Constitution which had been the slow accretion and natural growth of centuries. It proposed not merely to vitally alter the Constitution of that House, but also permanently to limit and restrict the rights of individual Members. Why, it was not merely because the Constitution of the House, as a whole, was threatened by these Resolutions, but also because by virtue of them their right, the most valuable, sacred, and hitherto cherished right of every individual Member—the right of free, unrestricted speech—was about to be taken away. It was for that reason that he claimed, for those three absent Members who were detained in prison, and who had as good a right as he or his Leader had to be heard and to vote on a question that concerned not merely their constituents and country, but their own personal exercise of their political, Constitutional, and Parliamentary rights, the right to decide as freely as any other hon. Members of that House. Having shown, in the first place, the circumstances under which those hon. Gentlemen were imprisoned, and the unquestionable gravity of the occasion when desired to be present, he would proceed to ask briefly what were the terms under which they wished to come to that House? They were imprisoned under suspicion, and, therefore, could not lawfully be punished, but only detained. The only moral reason and the only legal reason why the right hon. Gentleman, upon the authority given him by that House, could have a right to detain his hon. Colleagues was, that he apprehended that their release might lead to incitement to acts of violence or intimidation, or other acts punishable by law, and specified in the Coercion Act. In all the discussions on the subject, he would admit that he never felt that he could completely reply to the argument which might be advanced on the side of the Government. If they released these Gentlemen, what assurance had they that they would not repeat the acts of alleged misconduct of which they were suspected? He might have replied—and it was the only answer he could give—that the imprisonment they had already suffered had probably been long enough for the acts for which they were suspected, even if they had been found guilty; and if they were released and again misconducted themselves, the Government had their Coercion Act, their policemen, their warrants, and their gaols, and could renew the imprisonment and protect society against them; but now he had a different argument. He had the proffered word of honour of these three hon. Gentlemen, and he did not suppose that either of the right hon. Gentlemen or any Member of the House would question for a moment the adequacy of the word of honour of any one of these three hon. Members as a guarantee in respect of his future conduct. What was the demand they made, and what were the terms they offered? They asked to be allowed to come to that House on Thursday evening and exercise, in the most limited and restricted form, their Parliamentary right to vote on the Amendment of the hon.

and learned Gentleman (Mr. Marriott) to the Resolution of the Prime Minister in regard to the 1st Rule of Procedure. They did not ask to be even permitted to speak, but only to vote. In what direction they would vote it was not for him (Mr. Sexton) to say, and the Government were too high-minded to inquire. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) had said that if the Government had been willing to release them in order that they might vote on their own side; such conduct would be worthy of the highest reprobation. Perhaps the Government were afraid that their votes might be given on the other side; and even supposing they knew such to be the case, was that a reason why they should, any the less, release them for that purpose? Let him put in brief words the sum total of the engagement in that telegram. The hon. Gentlemen the Members for Cork, Tipperary, and Roscommon, on being released, pledged their word of honour that they would proceed to that House, that in that House they would limit themselves to voting on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Brighton; that, having voted on that Amendment, they would return to Ireland, and all the time vigorously abstain from any political action, and personally tender themselves to the Chief Secretary for Ireland. If the Coercion Act was not for punishment but prevention, why would such an offer be refused? On what special pleading could the Chief Secretary for Ireland assert that the prevention which was the object of their imprisonment would be less effectually carried out in that House than in Kilmainham? Nothing more was asked by these hon. Members than was freely granted to prisoners of war. Prisoners of war taken red-handed were released on parole; the sole condition being that during their parole they should not take part in the conflict. What was the conflict in the present case? It was the agitation in Ireland, and the three hon. Members pledged their honour that during the period of their parole they would not take part in that agitation. He trusted he had fully shown that there was no possible conceivable danger to law and order involved in the granting of that demand. He had also, he thought, shown that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was bound by the maxim he had laid down, limiting the purposes of the Coercion Act to prevention, to release these hon. Gentlemen, it being clearly proved to him that there was no danger on their parts of a repetition of illegal practices. There was one further argument on which the Chief Secretary for Ireland was bound by his administration of the Coercion Act to release these Gentlemen for the purpose mentioned. He was bound to say, in justice to the right hon. Gentleman, that he had not been slow to grant releases upon parole. One man was released because of something in connection with his shop, and another because of something in connection with his farm; and the cases had been numerous in which the right hon. Gentleman had allowed men to proceed from gaol to their farms to carry out some domestic or business requirement. In no single case had the right hon. Gentleman found the parole broken. The difficulty he (Mr. Sexton) believed was in the opposite direction; because, on at least one occasion, the right hon. Gentleman persisted in regarding the release as permanent, while the "suspect" insisted it had been only temporary. The prisoner returned to the gaol and persisted in his demand to be re-taken into custody. How could the right hon. Gentleman reconcile that inconsistency? When the state of feeling was such in Ireland that men in the humbler ranks of society kept their parole, and returned to prison rather than bring the dimmest constructive stain upon their characters, the evidence was ample to show that the parole of the three hon. Members now in prison was sufficiently guaranteed. Men had been allowed out on parole to till their farms, and had been allowed to go freely through Ireland. Was a private obligation more sacred than a public right? Had a man who merely wanted to till his farm or stock his shop a greater right to release on parole than the men who wanted to come to the House of Commons and to take part in the highest function a subject could perform. He feared the difficulty in the latter case was precisely because these hon. Gentlemen desired to exercise a public right. If they wanted to go to the Mediterranean or to America, or upon a tour of pleasure, or on business, there would be no hesitation about granting the parole. It was because they wanted to perform their public duty that they would, he supposed, be refused a parole, for the countenance of the right hon. Gentleman forewarned him of the probable reply. It was because the strongest Government of the 19th century in England apprehended that upon a division from which the greatest events might hang—the existence of the Government, the holding of a General Election, the future force of that Parliament—those three hon. Gentlemen might be found in the Opposition Lobby, that the Government would refuse to them, their victims of suspicion, the common privilege—he would say the right—which the right hon. Gentleman extended to the poor tenant who simply wanted to leave prison that he might sow his crops. Having said so much, he would leave this question to the judgment of the House and of the country. Rather, he would say, to the judgment of the country, because, as the right hon. Baronet opposite remarked, the mechanism of the House was nervous, and speedily responded to the hands of those who so well knew how to use it. In the country there was intelligence, there was honesty, there was a vast and abundant perception of public rights. He would conclude his observations with the remark that, however high might be the pretensions, however moral might be the professions that emanated from the Treasury Bench—and Heaven knew they had abundant moral professions from the Treasury Bench—every man in England, Scotland, and Ireland, however humble was his intelligence, however limited his political knowledge, would know that the great Liberal Government was afraid of their votes upon the first clôture division. When the hon. Gentleman used an Act of suspicion to keep three hon. Members away from their Constitutional right they would know that a Statute obtained by deceptive practices from the House, which gave it, for great purposes of public right and safety, was being used by the Government for the meanest ends and for the most contemptible intrigues of Party.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA said, he desired, before any Members of the Government might state their views on this question, to say a few words. The proposition put forward by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was made under circumstances without parallel in the history of Parliamentary legislation. In supporting the proposal for the release on parole of the three hon. Members, he (Sir Joseph M'Kenna) would ask—was it possible that any exercise of the prerogative could be so fenced around with safeguards? Could those three hon. Gentlemen afford to break their words of honour before the country by endeavouring while on parole to renew the conduct for which they were arrested? He asked the Government to consider carefully the request that they had made, and not to give a hasty refusal.

MR. WARTON said, he wished to offer a suggestion as a Member in an independent position, being neither a Member of the Government—thank God—nor a Member of the Irish Party, for which he was equally grateful. He had already suggested that the Prime Minister should pair with the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), that the Home Secretary should pair with the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), and that the Chief Secretary for Ireland should pair with the hon. Member for Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly), &c. That suggestion, unhappily, had not met with the approbation of the Government; but he had yet another to make, so anxious was he to assist his kind friends among all Parties in the House. Could not some three of the Irish Members now in the House be held as hostages while the division was going on, and, when the division was over, be detained in the custody of the Serjeant-at-Arms until the three "suspects" re-entered Kilmainham? He did not see how the Government could refuse, for they already had liberated "suspects" in order that they might attend the funerals of their relatives; and it was only consistent that these three hon. Members should be liberated for the purpose of enabling them to attend at the funeral of the British Constitution.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had understood that the hon. Members of the political section to which the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) belonged intended to arraign the general conduct of the Government upon that occasion. From the course of the observations of the hon. Member, however, and from the silence of those who sat around him, he conceived that he must have been misinformed upon the subject, because, undoubtedly, if there had been a disposition to arraign the general conduct of the Government, he should have desired to have taken his part in its defence, and to have stated what he thought about the course which the hon. Member and his Friends had taken in bringing about the present condition of Ireland. But as that was not the case, and as the Irish Representatives were evidently waiting for some reply from the Government upon this particular subject, he would give one; but he must, however, rely upon them that there was no other subject of debate that afternoon. ["No, no!"]

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY was understood to signify that the Irish Members intended to enter upon a general discussion after the right hon. Gentleman's speech.

MR. GLADSTONE: Then, he begged pardon—he must decline to proceed then if there were to be any other subjects of discussion. If there was to be an attack made upon the general policy of the Government, he hoped that he should be allowed to sit down for the present. He had been drawn by the speeches of the two hon. Gentlemen who had just sat down to speak on the subject now. He now learnt, after they had sat down, that it was the intention of Irish Members to attack generally the policy of the Government.

MR. CALLAN hoped that his hon. Friend (Mr. M'Carthy) would not be led into a trap. The people in Ireland and Irish Members wished for a clear and distinct declaration from the Government upon this subject, and that nothing should be done to prevent that from being given.

MR. GLADSTONE said, then he would proceed; but, with the Speaker in the Chair, he would lose his right of speaking again. The hon. Member for Sligo began by observing that he regretted very much that there seemed to be a growing practice of asking the House for Votes on Account for the Civil Service, and said that that was a system dangerous to Parliamentary control. The hon. Member should bear in mind that, so far as that Vote on Account went, it was a matter of absolute necessity, under the arrangement by which the public money was paid. It might be a reason against the arrangement—he (Mr. Gladstone) gave no opinion upon that subject—but as long as the arrangement continued, as long as the law was fulfilled under which balances of money voted were repaid to the Exchequer by the 31st of March, so long as the custom continued of the House meeting in the month of February or the last days of January, so long it was a matter of absolute necessity that there must be a Vote on Account taken about that period of the year. Therefore, it did not form the subject of attack or defence of the general character of Votes on Account. The hon. Member had concluded his speech by an imputation which, he need not say, was in the highest degree offensive. [“Oh, oh!”] The imputation was this—and it was for hon. Gentlemen who heard him to judge whether it was offensive or not—that any reasons or pleas which the Government could advance for declining to accede to this request were mere shams and pretences, and that the whole and sole reason why their request was refused was in order that the Government might avoid the disadvantage of having three additional votes recorded against them on that night. Was it possible to assign to any body of men conduct more disgraceful? If to assign disgraceful conduct were offensive, he must say that the speech of the hon. Gentleman conveyed the imputation with an appearance, a cool assumption of certainty which treated the matter as beyond all doubt or question, and was offensive in the highest degree. He did not intend to reply in a similar spirit, he did not intend to use any words himself in dealing with that comparatively limited, though rather delicate and somewhat important question which could hurt or wound anybody; but he thought it right to record instances of this kind as he went along in the conduct of Parliamentary debates. The hon. Member said that, under the plea of making use of the resources of civilization, Her Majesty's Government were indulging in the instincts of barbarism. That was a much fairer, but still a very serious, charge; while it was one that was perfectly intelligible. It certainly did tempt him (Mr. Gladstone) to widen the field of this debate, and to inquire what instincts of barbarism they were that were now being principally stimulated and indulged in Ireland; and who were the persons by whom those instincts were deliberately stimulated, with the effect of carrying rapine, murder, and mutilation into the houses and dwellings of the families of the innocent people in Ireland as a punishment for the offence of paying rent? That was the inquiry which he was tempted to enter into, and although he believed there was good reason for putting forward the allegation against certain persons with considerable force, yet it was not a matter on which he should enter at the present moment; and he should not have introduced it, but that the phrase was one so remarkable that he could not pass it by. There was another point to which he would refer. The hon. Gentleman called his (Mr. Gladstone's) right hon. Friend near him his subordinate. The hon. Gentleman did not appear to be very well aware of what was the constitution of the British Government, or else he would not have made such a statement. He could not, for a moment, suppose that any Cabinet Minister could be subordinate to the First Lord of the Treasury. Every Cabinet Minister was in that country a responsible Adviser of the Crown. He was not subject in the affairs of his Department to the orders or the injunctions of the First Lord of the Treasury. He was, therefore, not the subordinate of the First Lord of the Treasury, and that difference he noticed in order that the hon. Gentleman might forego that mode of indulging his desire to irritate—but, happily, that had been found impossible—to irritate, if he could, the mind of his right hon. Friend. But, putting aside those matters, let them look at the point before the House. The hon. Gentleman requested that three Members of Parliament who were unhappily detained in Ireland upon suspicion—[“Hear, hear!”]—yes, very unhappily detained—[An hon. MEMBER: On suspicion]—very unhappily detained on suspicion. Nobody would ever hear him speak with levity of the serious nature of the case. He never had undervalued it. He never had attempted to gild over the character of any law which set aside the Constitutional privileges with which Members of that House were invested. Those Gentlemen who were unhappily detained upon the responsibility of the Government in gaol in Ireland had made a request to be allowed to come over to this country for the very limited purpose of voting in this House upon one particular division. They disclaimed, he understood, even the privilege of speech; and he might say that—knowing as they did the general experience of that House—he appreciated the enormous sacrifice which must be made by these Gentlemen in such a disclaimer. They offered their parole as a security that they should come here for one purpose, and for one purpose alone, and that, having satisfied that purpose, they should return to their gaols in Ireland; and, moreover, the hon. Gentleman said that they founded themselves upon the allegation that there was an unapproachable gravity in the occasion of Thursday next. The hon. Gentleman's allegation was—first, that there was a perfect security against the misuse of that release upon parole for any purpose forbidden by the Protection of Person and Property Act. To that proposition he entirely subscribed. He had not the least doubt as to the sufficiency of the parole, or as to the faithfulness with which it would be kept. He quite admitted that no direct stimulus would be offered by virtue or by means of it to the passions that were active in Ireland; and, in fact, that no abuse whatever would be made of the licence thus asked. But then hon. Members would, he hoped, concede to him that when an extraordinary Statute of that kind had been passed, those who administered it must be prepared to do so with something like consistency. The hon. Gentleman had impeached the consistency with which the Act had been administered. He stated that various prisoners had been temporarily released—some of them upon what he called domestic occasions, by which he (Mr. Gladstone) imagined he meant to refer to cases of death or sickness in the family, or occasions connected with their private affairs. His right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not prepared to accede to the correctness of that statement. The hon. Gentleman had given no details to support it. If the hon. Member had details, or called for details in order to support it—

MR. HEALY, interposing, mentioned the names of Messrs. O'Toole, of Baltinaglass, and Reddington, of Maryborough.

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was not for him to contradict the hon. Gentleman; but he was not acquainted with the case. But what he was going to say was this—If such cases existed they must be judged upon their own merits, and they were of a totally different character from the case that was now before them. No inference could be drawn from them. If such cases existed—which he was not prepared to admit—they might be right or they might be wrong, and they ought to be repeated or not be repeated accordingly. But he contended that they were totally distinct and different from the case before them. He had admitted that the parole was safe. There was no danger whatever—nay, more, he would admit that even if they came there to speak on the subject he made no doubt they would speak in the spirit of that parole, and that they would not make use of their liberty of speech in that House for the purpose of stimulating to outrage in Ireland. But what he denied was this—that parole on that occasion was better than parole upon any other occasion. He had not the least doubt that if they requested to be released on parole once a week, and once a week to be under an engagement not to contravene the Act by virtue of their liberty for any certain time, and then went back to prison, the security of their parole would be precisely the same. But was he prepared on that account to say that wherever an unexceptional parole was offered, when a proper engagement was made not to make use of temporary freedom for purposes alien to the Act, therefore release should be given? [An hon. MEMBER: Certainly not.] He was much obliged to somebody whom he did not see for supplying the answer he was about to give. He said certainly not. The mere fact that parole was trustworthy was not a sufficient ground for releasing a prisoner under an Act of the kind. Well, but then the hon. Gentleman said there was an unapproachable gravity in the occasion of Thursday, and not only so, but those whom they were asked to release in order that they might come there were to come there as witnesses and judges. But that was not applicable to the occasion of Thursday alone. Every day, every hour, every Member of the House of Commons was not only a witness of what took place, but was a judge of the proceedings of the Government; and, therefore, the argument of the hon. Gentleman was a great deal too wide, and showed that, if once they admitted that because these Gentlemen were witnesses and judges they might be brought there on Thursday next, they should have no plea to stand upon when, upon any other occasion, a request was made that they might come there to take part in Parliamentary Business. The hon. Gentleman said there was an unapproachable gravity on this occasion. Well, he would not contest that proposition; but he would say that, in his opinion, the division which was taken about a couple of weeks ago on the Parliamentary inquiry into the working of the Land Act in Ireland was, in their view, an occasion of gravity quite as unapproachable as that. [Laughter.] It was all very well for those to laugh whose object it was to destroy the Irish Land Act. ["No, no!"] He was speaking of hon. Gentlemen who laughed when he stated that the vote of that House on Parliamentary inquiry into the Land Act was a matter of gravity as great as the one now before them. He said it was very well for those to laugh who sought to impair, to undermine, and to destroy the working of that Act, for they knew that that Act was the one efficient instrument for counteracting their views. But for the Government, who believed that the Land Act was the instrument by which they might hope to do justice to the people, and to save order and property in Ireland, for them a Motion touching an inquiry which, as they thought, went to sap the authority and operation of that Act, such a Motion was a Motion of quite as unapproachable gravity as the division of Thursday next. Well, then, they might say the division of Thursday next had been declared to be a division involving the fate of the Government; and did they suppose, then, that in the division of March 9th the fate of the Government was not involved? There was just as much reason for those hon. Gentlemen being present on that occasion as on Thursday next. [Laughter.] It was a question upon which those hon. Gentlemen had a far nearer and more immediate right to appear, if a distinction were to be drawn between one Parliamentary question and another.

MR. CALLAN: They did not ask to. [Cries of "Order!"]

Mr. Gladstone

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was extremely sorry that these practices of laughter and jeering and ridiculing those who were in the performance of a public duty, the cessation of which was not required on any other public ground but that of courtesy and good sense, should be persisted in. They were practices that did not contribute to raise the character of those who indulged in them. He would look at the matter a little more nearly. It was proposed that three hon. Gentlemen should be released from confinement in Ireland, to come and give a vote on Thursday next on the 1st Resolution. But that vote on the 1st Resolution was not to be a conclusive vote. It was not to be a vote which was to determine what should be the contents of the following Resolutions. The right hon. Gentleman in the Chair had told them that after that vote had been taken every Amendment on the Paper might be put; and each went, in the view of some, to determine the character and bearing of the Resolution more than the vote that was to be taken on Thursday next. [MR. SEXTON: To determine the course of the Government.] How did the hon. Gentleman know how many votes would determine the course of the Government? Did the hon. Gentleman mean that whenever the Government proposed, as they proposed a few weeks ago, some Resolution or some measure upon which their fate depended, that then, and then only, these three hon. Gentlemen were to be brought over from Ireland? Why, it would, he said, place the House of Commons and the Executive Government in a position nothing short of ridiculous were they to say that three hon. Gentlemen so confined—unhappily and unfortunately from necessity confined in Ireland—["No, no!"] Well, he would not make any further comment. He did not wish to repeat what he just now said. He was only compelled to inflict upon the House the commencing part of the sentence. It would place the House of Commons and the Government in a position nothing less than ridiculous, in connection with this most grave subject, were they to allow that those three hon. Gentlemen were to come over to that House in order to give a particular vote on the first Amendment that came up to the 1st Resolution; and then to say they should take no further part in any decision or in any vote that might come up on other Amendments, or upon the final question of the adoption of the Resolution itself. He hardly thought that hon. Gentlemen could be serious in the contention that they made. He quite understood their being serious in the desire that their three Friends should be free, even for a brief period, to breathe the air of liberty. That he could quite understand, that he could sympathize with; but what he could not understand was that they should gravely state to that House that it would be possible for them to bring these hon. Gentlemen there for the purpose of giving a particular vote—a very important vote, no doubt—and then, with regard to other votes, which might be just as important, or which might be indistinguishable in point of importance by any line of principle from that vote, that they should cancel the privilege, and say they would refuse such an application. That appeared to him so plain that he did not think it was necessary for him to dwell upon it. He had shown it was not the security of the parole. They might have plenty of security of parole from these and from many other prisoners in whose honour they would have perfect confidence—the question was not whether they were witnesses and judges, but whether, because they were witnesses and judges, they ought to be there that day. [“Hear, hear!”] Yes; that was a very fair admission, for the proposition really meant that they ought always to be there. That was the meaning of the proposition, and that was a candid admission. Yes; but if that was what they were asking for, they were then asking of the Government to import into the operation of the law a principle which Parliament deliberately and advisedly excluded from it—namely, that a distinction was to be drawn between Members of Parliament who came under the reasonable suspicion described in the Act, and other persons coming under that reasonable suspicion. The Government believed that they would be acting contrary to the spirit of the Act and the intentions of Parliament if they admitted any such distinction. It was only on the latent ground of such distinction that the proposal could for a moment be justified. They could not, in their opinion, separate between the occasion for which the request was made and any other occasions. They could not admit that special treatment was to be made applicable to those personages who had brought themselves, as the Government held, within the scope of the law; and, therefore, they were compelled to say to the hon. Gentleman, without making light of his request or the subject he had raised, that it was impossible to comply with the request that he had made.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he had listened with profound regret to the Prime Minister's speech. He must confess that he was one of those who were sanguine enough up to the last moment to hope that this very reasonable request might have been granted by the Government. He should say that he listened with regret to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, not only because of its substance, but also, in some measure, because of its tone. The right hon. Gentleman had displayed too great subtlety in his argument that, though a parole might be perfectly safe, the Government were not therefore bound to grant a person his liberty. What rational being wanted convincing of that? What the Irish Members contended was, that this was a most remarkable and exceptional case, that these men had made application to be released on parole, that that application could be safely granted, and that it was only reasonable, and the public duty of the Government, under the special circumstances, to comply with the request. The right hon. Gentleman had asked what distinction could be drawn between this and any other applications? and immediately went on to say that every application ought to be considered on its merits. The Irish Members fully admitted that if this application were granted, the Government would not, therefore, be bound to grant any other; but the present occasion was a special and momentous one, and for a most important purpose. He was astonished at the right hon. Gentleman saying that if he granted the application in this case he must grant it in every other case. His hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) showed most clearly that there was a precedent for granting a release on parole to prisoners confined under this Act. It had been done over and over again. Under the present

Coercion Act permission had been given to prisoners to attend to their private business, to see a sick relative, or even to attend a funeral; and he asked the House whether any such occasion, however momentous it might be to the individual himself, could be so important as the desire of a man to perform a great public duty to his constituents and to his country? The Prime Minister had denied that this was so important an occasion as they had attempted to make out; and he had declared that he considered the vote given on the 9th March to be much more momentous. He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) was quite ready to accept the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman that he did regard the occasion as more important; but he would venture to say that if the right hon. Gentleman so regarded the relative importance of the two votes he was the only Member of the House who did anything of the kind. At the very most, the last was a Motion to prevent inquiry into an existing Act of Parliament. It concerned one Act of Parliament only. But the vote of Thursday next would relate to the making of Acts of Parliament for all future time. The Premier did not seem to regard the vote of Thursday as necessarily involving the fate of the Ministers; but he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) could not see how it could be otherwise. It could only have one of two results—it must either make the Government victorious, or inflict a substantial defeat upon them. The fate of the Government, therefore, depended upon it. If upon it they got a strong and substantial majority, they could pass the other Resolutions, and entirely alter the Constitution of Parliament. But if they failed in that purpose their whole scheme fell to the ground; and whether they afterwards remained in Office or went out, they were shattered as a Government, and would have no strength whatever either in the House or in the country. If that was so, it was impossible to contend that this was not a serious crisis in the history of the House and of the Constitution, and one upon which every Member of the House should be allowed to record his opinion. What comparison was there between a vote of that kind and a vote on some casual, unimportant question of the ordinary Business of the House? He did not believe the subtle argument of the right hon. Gentleman could convince hon. Members that there was any comparison whatever between them. Every week some man was allowed, for some reason or other, to leave prison on parole. Could the right hon. Gentleman say that the purpose for which each prisoner was so released was more important than the vote of next Thursday? He could not think how the right hon. Gentleman could do so with consistency. All the Government had to do in this case was to exercise that discretion which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had already done in the case of other "suspects;" and until he could convince the House and the country that the occasions on which other "suspects" were released were not as important as this he could not consistently refuse the request.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he also regretted that the Government had not consented to the very moderate request made by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). It was very little to ask. The concession could have done no one any harm, and it would have been looked upon in Ireland as a symptom of a return to a more kindly feeling on the part of the Government toward the people. The votes of the three hon. Members in Kilmainham would not imperil the Ministerial majority on Thursday. The division was not likely to be so close as that; and if the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had allowed them to come there, even for a few hours, the act would have been regarded as an olive branch—a small one, it was true, but still an olive branch—by the people of that disturbed and distracted country. But his (Mr. Cowen's) object in rising was not so much to plead for the release, on parole, of his three hon. Friends, as to remark on an observation made by the Prime Minister. The right hon. Gentleman took exception to the speech of the hon. Member for Sligo, and he censured him very strongly for the language he used, or rather for the imputations conveyed by it. The language itself could not be condemned, as it was both moderate and correct. His hon. Friend had expressed a fear that the request he was preferring would be rejected, because the Government were afraid of the influence that these three votes might have on the pending division. The Prime Minister conceived that that was an imputation on Ministerial honour. He (Mr. Cowen) scarcely saw it in that light himself. He was not squeamish; but he was very far mistaken if he did not hear in that House, daily, remarks much more severe which passed without notice. But whether the observation did or did not wander beyond the legitimate bounds of discussion, he was quite sure that one of the remarks of the Prime Minister had exceeded those bounds; for while censuring the hon. Member for Sligo for imputing improper motives to the Ministry, he broadly and emphatically accused his three Friends, now prisoners in Kilmainham, with having deliberately, intentionally, and knowingly, incited to rapine, murder, and outrage. Now, he (Mr. Cowen) undertook to say, on behalf of those three hon. Gentlemen, that the charge against them was absolutely unfounded. There was not any justification for it. The Land League, with which those hon. Gentlemen were identified, had avowedly and openly advocated "Boycotting"—that was, they had counselled their countrymen to put a social ban upon such of their neighbours as did not act faithfully to the Land League, and in accordance with Land League principles. That course might be wrong, or it might be right, and the practice might be made an instrument for inflicting much cruelty and hardship. He was not defending it, or apologizing for it. It was a weapon that was used constantly in political, social, and private life, with a view to accomplishing given ends. It was a recognized instrument in the hands of English trades unionists. In the event of a strike they "picketed" factories, and "blacklegged" those of their craft who deserted them. If the custom was not only tolerated, but upheld in this country, he failed to see the justice of condemning it so severely when put in requisition by the peasants' trades union in Ireland. He knew there was one code of law and liberty for this country, and another for Ireland; that a man could say things here that he could not say across the Channel; that newspapers could be printed and circulated in England that were confiscated in Ireland; and that meetings could be held here that were there suppressed. The difference was marked and glaring.

It was only a legal difference—not a moral one. The use of such terrors could only bring discredit on their organization; they could serve no good cause, and the Land League leaders knew that. They also knew that every crime of the kind was a detriment to them, and a disservice. For the Prime Minister to stand up in Parliament and accuse three hon. Gentlemen of the House with being inciters to, and participants in, such horrible outrages was unjustifiable. If these hon. Members were guilty, either by act or implication, of such proceedings, they should be brought to trial, and no punishment would be too severe for them. To utter the imputation, and refuse to try them, was a much greater breach of the courtesies of debate than anything that was involved in the very mild remarks of his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo. As for the request itself, he would have been glad if it had been more comprehensive. Instead of asking that the three Members should be permitted to visit Westminster and vote in one division, he thought a request should have been made for them to attend altogether. According to the Government's own showing, such a demand would have been reasonable. They admitted that the Coercion Act only applied to Ireland, and even more than that, that it only applied to certain districts. The three Members, if released, would remain in London, in the discharge of their duties. They would not go to Ireland, or come within the operation of the Act; and it was fair to ask that they should be allowed to attend to their work as Representatives. The reasonableness of such an application, and the injustice of refusing it, was seen in the fact that there were three Members sitting opposite for whose apprehension warrants had been issued; but they managed to get away from Ireland before they were served, and the consequence was that they could be in Parliament, when, according to the Government's own confession, they were just as guilty as his hon. Friends, Mr. Parnell, Mr. O'Kelly, or Mr. Dillon. The desire to have them released, in order that they might look after their Parliamentary duties, therefore, was a moderate and fair one. The Prime Minister had denied that any prisoners had been liberated for the purpose of attending to their business—planting their potatoes, or looking after their shops. Of course he (Mr. Cowen) assumed that the Prime Minister was well informed before he made that statement; but his (Mr. Cowen's) information conflicted entirely with it, and he believed that prisoners on several occasions had been released in such a way. The fact that the release was refused to these three Members went to show that they were treated more harshly than others. He did not wish to drive the case against the Government too hard or too far; but it was quite open to say that the Ministers themselves had contributed as much to the outrages in Ireland as the Land League. They did not mean to do that: they meant to do the very opposite. What, however, had been the effect of their coercion? They had promised to arrest the village ruffians, but instead of that they had arrested the village politicians—the men who acted as a restraint upon the ruffians. Any moral assistance that they otherwise might have obtained from the population in the enforcement of the law had thus, in consequence of the Ministers' own act, been withdrawn. Coercion, indeed, had helped the disorder, and in a sense increased the outrages. It was a very effectual way of silencing a political opponent to lock him up in prison—to lock him up in prison, too, without accusation, without trial, and without affording him an opportunity of either defending or explaining himself; but it was a very cowardly way. It was a course of action that had never been followed in this country since the dark and dismal days of the Stuarts. Amidst all their troubles and disorders, no Representatives of the people had for centuries been arrested in such a high-handed fashion. It had remained for a Government that ostentatiously boasted of its liberality, that pretentiously proclaimed its regard for the principles of nationalities and the rights of struggling peoples, to resort to a practice that brought dishonour upon themselves and humiliation upon their country.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he could not, looking at the right hon. Gentleman the Premier as a governing man, as a statesman responsible for the good government of this country—could not, regarding him in that light, but express his astonishment at the great opportunity he had lost on that occasion. That opportunity would not soon recur, seeing that the division of Thursday next would be exceptionally momentous to the Government and the country. If there was one measure more than another calculated to relieve the painful tension and embarrassment in Ireland, it was the measure which was pressed on the Government that day. With reference to the arguments of the Premier, it was the first time that the securities for the liberties of that House were proposed to be placed at the mercy of the majority, and it was useless for any hon. Gentleman to tell that House that it was not an exceptional occasion. The position of the Government would be vastly improved if the imprisoned Members were permitted to vote on Thursday, for they would then show that they were not afraid of three additional votes, especially if, in addition to permitting the hon. Members to attend that House, they were afterwards to say—"We release you from your parole; but, although we may feel it our duty to re-arrest you if you return to Ireland, we make you a present of your liberty to discharge your duties in this House." If the Government had assumed such a position, although far below the rightful demand of the Irish people, it would be a position on which they could trust themselves to the best feelings and best sentiments of the Irish people; but, unfortunately, the Government had determined, with Shylock, "to stand upon the letter of their bond," and, in consequence, there was not a son of Ireland who would not think night and day of the best means of avenging that treatment on all who supported Her Majesty's Government. They deliberately thrust back the proffered hand of the Irish people, and had thrown down the gauntlet in response to the olive branch that had been tendered to them. By the refusal of the Government they had deliberately renewed that strife in Ireland, and this was but another instance of the inability of the Government to appreciate the situation. They evidently wished, or, perhaps, in spite of their wishes, were fated to blunder blindly into a position from which escape was impossible. One day or other they would have to set free the three Members, blanched with prison life, enfeebled in health, and objects for the commiseration of men who did not agree with them in politics, and which would re-kindle and enflame the resolution of every Irishman throughout the whole world. They might not let them out to-day, or for a month, or six months, or 12 months; but the day would come when, dead or alive, they must let them out, and the chances of death in the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon's) case were weekly increasing. Dead or alive, they must let them out; and, if it were deferred, the day they let them out the beginning of a new era of increased difficulty would arise between the British Administration and the Irish race. The Prime Minister had indignantly repudiated the idea that his decision had been formed with an eye to the main chance; but was it more outrageous and more insulting to be reasonably suspected of wishing to reduce a dangerous minority by three votes than to be well known to have issued a four-lined Whip for one purpose ostensibly, but in reality in order to bring up their Party for another? Was it not notorious that they had endeavoured to do so, and, but for circumstances over which they had no control, would have snatched a division by surprise? Under the clôture, he supposed, such four-lined Whips would not be uncommon. The truth was that the presence of the three imprisoned Irish Members was feared by the Prime Minister, who had shown all the marks of the danger caused by apprehension. The arrest of the Irish Members was futile and without justification, and was made because the Prime Minister had objected to their criticism of the Land Act. He knew that if they lifted a finger they could send 250,000 tenant farmers into the Land Court, who would completely break down its machinery, already hardly pressed by the number of applications to it. The Members had been imprisoned because they criticized the Act, though the Liberal Party had now admitted that every defect that the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and his Party had pointed out in the Land Act were seen to be real blots on the measure. The Government knew very well that they must very soon release these men. Let them not expect kindly feelings, gratitude, or any feeling but the sense that Her Majesty's Government no longer found it safe to refuse the Irish demand, if in a month or in a year they found themselves obliged to allow into the House the men whom they feared to meet upon equal terms that day. He was sincerely sorry, quite apart from any question of Party, at the action of Her Majesty's Government that day. It was, perhaps, explicable on the ground of the slight acquaintance which Her Majesty's Government had with the state of Ireland; but there were larger questions involved in this than the resignation of any particular Government. All the wisest and most philosophic observers of Irish affairs had agreed in regretting that every concession made by the English people came too late. That which would have been accepted at one time with feelings of kindly gratitude was delayed so long that when at last it came it was felt to be insufficient for the altered state of circumstances. There was the question of the possible conciliation of the Irish by the English people; and he said it was a misfortune of England that she seemed to have so few men of the mental and moral courage of the hon. Member for Newcastle-on-Tyne (Mr. Cowen). He (Mr. O'Donnell) told the majority of the House that one speech such as fell from that hon. Member's lips that day did more to keep alive the hope of ultimate reconciliation in the breasts of the more sanguine of the Irish patriots than all the measures of Coercion at the disposal of the united Front Benches. Beyond that, it would have more influence in Ireland than arguments even in The Irish People or United Ireland. Some years ago, when he (Mr. O'Donnell) thought that English Liberals possessed some true Liberalism, and not merely the Liberalism of Party, he could not have believed that only one man would be found to raise his voice above Party interest. The Government were simply playing into the hands of the Separatist Party, and destroying their own influence in Ireland.

MR. BRAND said, he had to complain of the waste of time caused by the Irish Members. The hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) thought it would be better if the three Members now in Kilmainham were released. But, he (Mr. Brand) should like to ask, was there any indication of a better spirit on the part of those three hon. Gentlemen? The hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) said that there was more chance of conciliation in a speech like that of his hon. Friend (Mr. J. Cowen) than all the powers of coercion possessed by the Government. He challenged the hon. Member for Dungarvan, and asked him whether he, or any single Member of the Party who were Members of the Land League, had ever, by word or deed, or by any sign, denounced the outrages and horrors prevalent in Ireland?

MR. O'DONNELL: Yes; every one of them.

MR. BRAND said, he distinctly remembered a challenge of this character being addressed to the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) in the House, and on that occasion the hon. Member said he was not prepared to express to the House any disapproval of it.

MR. HEALY: I beg the hon. Gentleman's pardon. ["Order, order!"]

MR. BRAND, proceeding, said, the Land Leaguers had issued manifestoes more than once. Had they ever issued one to the Irish people advising them to abstain from these outrages?

MR. HEALY: Yes. ["Order!"]

MR. O'DONNELL: My hon. Friend will reply in due course.

MR. BRAND said, he had watched their proceedings for some time, and had never yet heard of one instance in which hon. Gentlemen opposite had exercised the power they possessed of pacifying their country. He could only say that if the Leaders of the Party had done that, there would be many men on his (Mr. Brand's) side of the House who would make the same sort of speech as the hon. Member for Newcastle, and urge the Government to release these men from imprisonment on suspicion. He felt a sense of indignation at the proceedings of that day. What had been done that day was a waste of time, and was only a repetition of similar proceedings in that House, which had been carried on by a small minority who were determined to exercise their powers in such a way as to make the position intolerable. Over and over again, since the Session began, hon. Members came to the House and considered themselves lucky if they got home by 4 o'clock in the morning, because of the conduct of a small minority. The condition of things had now arrived to be almost a national scandal; and yet there was, he regretted to say, a tendency on the part of some hon. Members of the House to ignore the gravity of the occasion, when the Government were introducing remedies which would put a stop to these discreditable proceedings. Under the circumstances, the truth should be told in this matter; and the truth was that the Members of the Land League, whether in or out of that House, who had signed the "no rent" manifesto, were distinctly responsible for the anarchy and disorder now existing in Ireland. No Party had violated their feelings so much as the Liberal Party had done—at least, some of them—in consenting to the passing of the Irish Land Bill; and yet the only answer to their efforts from hon. Gentlemen opposite was a constant endeavour to thwart and obstruct it in every possible way. He contended that if they wanted to show their good faith to the House and the country, and to show the sincerity of their wish to have their Friends liberated from prison, a very simple course was open to them if they chose to take it. The House should disabuse its mind of all superstition in regard to Rules of Procedure and good government in Ireland. So long as there were Representatives in that House whose object was to disintegrate the Empire, they must have Rules to keep them in order; and if Parliament desired peace, order, and liberty in Ireland they must have a strong and capable Government. It was impossible to have a strong and capable Government, if their action was crippled and hampered as that of the present Administration was by perpetual Obstruction. Locking up men on suspicion merely, and without trial, was, in his opinion, contrary to the principles and liberty of the Constitution. It had failed, or at the best it was but milk-and-water coercion. His firm conviction was that crime might be more effectually dealt with by other means than imprisonment without trial. What Parliament should do was to fight these men in Ireland with their gloves off, and to punish those who were guilty of these crimes and outrages. His opinion was that if the Administration only had the time of the House, means would soon be found not to put men in prison without trial, but means to punish the guilty and to relieve the peaceful and orderly inhabitants from the burden of the grievous terrorism under which they were now suffering.

MR. HEALY said, he felt bound to contest the assertion that there had been great wasting of time in the consideration of the Estimates. He was afraid that many of the statements of the hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) were very inaccurate. That hon. Member had challenged them to say why they had never denounced outrages in Ireland. He would answer the hon. Gentleman by showing that they had strongly denounced outrages; and lest the hon. Member should be inclined to distrust his (Mr. Healy's) assurance, he would reply to him out of the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. That right hon. Gentleman, upon the memorable occasion on which he introduced the Coercion Bill, said, speaking of the decrease of outrages—

“The improvement at first was only slight; but the outrages are now becoming smaller in number every day. And why are they diminishing? I believe there are two reasons for it. One is, that the gentlemen at the head of the Land League are using every power they possess to put a stop to outrages.”—[3 Hansard, cclvii. 1230.]

MR. BRAND: Was that before or after the issue of the “no rent” manifesto?

MR. HEALY said, he would deal with that interposition. The right hon. Gentleman made the statement just quoted on January 24th, 1881, and the “no rent” manifesto was issued in October of the same year. The original statement of the hon. Member for Stroud was an absolute allegation that at no period had the leaders of the Land League denounced outrages, and he had never attempted to confine it to any space of time, either before or after the issue of the manifesto. In answer to the hon. Member, he (Mr. Healy) would give two proofs to the contrary, one before the issue and one after. The first was an extract from a circular memorandum of instructions issued by the League in December, 1880, to the organizers and secretaries of branches. He might inform the hon. Member that the writer was Michael Davitt, and that within one month afterwards Mr. Davitt found himself within Portland Prison, which was no great encouragement to others to take a similar course. Having noticed that they could not believe the numerous reports of outrages upon dumb animals which appeared in the landlord newspapers, and declined to believe that any member of the Land League organization would be guilty of participating in the few cases that had been authenticated, Mr. Davitt used language of condemnation which, probably, the hon. Member for Stroud could not make stronger—

“No injustice in the power of Irish landlordism to perpetrate upon our people can justify in the least degree the unfeeling brutality which inflicts injuries or sufferings upon homeless and defenceless animals in return for wrongs done by man.”

He supposed it was for penning this circular that Michael Davitt was arrested. The hon. Member for Stroud wanted a denunciation of outrages subsequent to the “no rent” manifesto. If he (Mr. Healy) might intrude a personal matter upon the House, he would inform the hon. Member that since his return from America he had been writing a series of articles in an English newspaper, and if hon. Members opposite would turn to the pages of The Newcastle Chronicle—[Laughter.] He was not aware that The Newcastle Chronicle was not as respectable as the organ of the hon. Member for Northampton. [Mr. BRAND: Are those anonymous articles, or signed?] They were not anonymous; and he might tell the hon. Member also that the portion in which he denounced outrages in the strongest terms was quoted in the London Echo, an organ which might find favour in the eyes of those who discredited The Newcastle Chronicle. He believed that at the present moment those articles were being published in The Freeman's Journal. When the hon. Member for Stroud challenged him to stand up and say whether he had denounced outrages, he refused to do so. They would never find an Irishman consenting to be dragged on by the tail in answer to the call of any Englishman for Party purposes. They had their own standard of speech, their own standard of conduct, and they were, he was happy to say, in no way influenced by English opinion. They despised English opinion, and when he was asked by any Englishman to stand up and make a statement, because he (John Bull) desired it, and thought he ought to do so, he (Mr. Healy) begged respectfully to tell John Bull, “Mind your own business.” It was for them to choose their own way and their own time for denouncing outrages. Furthermore, he wished to ask the hon. Member for Stroud, did Englishmen think they could dance upon Irishmen, and walk over Irishmen, and slap Irishmen in the face without getting a blow in return? That day was past, and if the "no rent" manifesto had produced anarchy and outrage, it was those who put the authors and the leaders of the Land League in prison who made that manifesto necessary, and who were responsible for the crime and outrage in Ireland. Was the theory of the hon. Member for Stroud this—that no matter what outrage was committed on the liberty of Irishmen they were to sit quietly under the rod of the chastiser? He declined to accept such a theory, even though it had been promulgated by that new prophet of the Liberal Party, the hon. Member for Stroud. He had dealt sufficiently with the hon. Member, and, perhaps, had accorded more notice to his observations than they deserved. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister had charged the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) with having applied the word "subordinate" to the Chief Secretary for Ireland in an offensive sense; but if the Chief Secretary for Ireland were not a subordinate Member of the Government, why did the Prime Minister make himself the mouthpiece of the Irish Government on this question, instead of allowing the Minister of the Crown, responsible for affairs in Ireland, to answer for himself. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, while chastising others for offensive language, did not abstain from using it himself. Having first discharged himself of offensive language, the right hon. Gentleman said that in the remainder of his speech he would use no words calculated to hurt anyone. The right hon. Gentleman did not scruple to say that the hon. Members for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), Tipperary (Mr. Dillon), and Roscommon (Mr. O'Kelly) were responsible for the rapine, murder, and mutilation going on in Ireland, and he made that statement while he said he would say nothing calculated to offend anyone. The Chief Secretary for Ireland, however, might remember that he himself was at one time publicly charged with being a member of an organization which might have been justly charged with rapine, murder, and mutilation. It had been publicly stated that the right hon. Gentleman had been a contributor to the funds of the Carbonari in Italy, by whom serious outrages had been inflicted. [Laughter.] He (Mr. Healy) was not the author of the statement, and he assumed no responsibility for it. The statement had been made in the House, and outside, that the right hon. Gentleman subscribed to the funds of those friends of Italy, who were known at one time as Mazzinists, and at another as Carbonaris. If the constructive theory put forward by the Premier were to be pursued, was the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland not morally responsible for all the crimes and outrages by his friends, the gentlemen of Italy, to whom he subscribed money? Hon. Gentlemen on the Liberal Benches had almost wholly devoted their speeches to the outrages in Ireland, because they had no arguments to advance against the liberation on parole of the hon. Members for the City of Cork, Tipperary, and Roscommon. He congratulated those hon. Members opposite upon the ingenuity they had displayed; but would remind them that they wandered very wide of the question before the House, which was the desirability of liberating on parole three imprisoned Members of that House. He had followed that speech of the Prime Minister in vain to perceive any argument against the liberation of those hon. Gentlemen, except these—First, that the division likely to occur on Thursday next was not one of supreme importance; and, second, that if these hon. Gentlemen were released for that division, they might make similar applications once every week; and, finally, that the division in reference to the Lords' Committee was of as great importance, and one upon which those hon. Gentlemen might as properly have been released. With regard to the last argument, the Prime Minister might have perceived a very important distinction, which was this—In the division upon the Lords' Committee, his hon. Friends made no application for leave to vote. In the division to take place on Thursday next, they had asked leave to vote. The right hon. Gentleman ought to know sufficiently the character of those three hon. Gentlemen to perceive that they were not likely to make applications either to him or his subordinates of their own motion, nor were the Irish Party likely to imagine every week that occasions of importance were likely to arise to justify them, as reasonable men, in expecting that the Government would favourably entertain such applications, though they did think that upon this occasion the application would be successful. It was undeniable that the approaching division was without parallel. Suppose their application were now granted, and that the Government should find they abused their parole, what would prevent the Prime Minister using his Coercion Act to send these hon. Gentlemen back to the Lord Lieutenant's purview, and the Government would have the moral support of the country and the House of Commons in refusing those applications once a week which he appeared to dread? The right hon. Gentleman went on to say that the Government must be prepared to administer the Coercion Act with consistency. That was exactly their claim. They claimed that when Dick, Tom, and Harry had been released on parole to sow their potatoes or attend their shops, Charles Stewart Parnell, the Leader of the Irish race, and his Colleagues, ought at least to be allowed to attend at the House of Commons in order to record their votes on so vital a question. He was sorry to say they were not likely to get the consistency which the Prime Minister seemed to admire so much. Perhaps the discriminating Members on the Liberal Benches would discover the consistency of the Government. At present it appeared to him very microscopic. The Prime Minister ignored the fact that the Chief Secretary for Ireland had frequently, in twopenny-halfpenny cases in some County Court, released "suspects" on parole. But that having been done by the right hon. Gentleman, the Irish Party demanded that the three imprisoned hon. Members be permitted to record their votes on an occasion of extreme gravity. The right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister resented, with noble indignation, the allegation that the Government was influenced by the consideration that three votes were involved. He (Mr. Healy) made the right hon. Gentleman and his Colleagues a present of that indignation, and, using a phrase which the Liberal Party had imported into political life, and which was likely to be associated with the name of the Chief Secretary for Ireland for some time to come, he would say the Government might be "reasonably suspected" of entertaining that consideration when they refused to release the three hon. Members. Of course, such a "reasonable suspicion" could not have the status of one of the right hon. Gentleman's "reasonable suspicions." The one was supported by an Act of Parliament, and the other had only common sense at its back. Any way, far stronger grounds existed for that "reasonable suspicion" than for the "reasonable suspicion" on which those hon. Members had been deprived of liberty. The Government, according to the right hon. Gentleman, would be placed in a ridiculous position if they acceded to this request. He (Mr. Healy), however, feared the Government would be placed in a worse position by refusing it. Ridicule they might withstand; but scorn and hatred, if they aroused it, would count in future times for something. The Government should remember that—was a more powerful thing than any ridiculous position they might occupy. It might be that the votes of the three hon. Gentlemen in prison would decide the fate of the clôture and turn the right hon. Gentleman's Government out of power, and then they would be absolved from all liability in the matter. But the right hon. Gentleman, counting on a mechanical majority, and believing his Government would retain Office, refused this request lest he might be in a ridiculous position. Let the right hon. Gentleman take care lest he might find himself not to be in any position at all. The division had yet to take place, and they could not yet know its result. Therefore, the right hon. Gentleman need not be so sensitive about having to occupy a ridiculous position. Finally, the right hon. Gentleman said it would be against the spirit of the Act to release these three hon. Gentlemen. They had heard a great deal about the spirit of the Act. The only spirit he could perceive about it was the spirit of malignity. The Chief Secretary for Ireland claimed the Coercion Act to have as its object to imprison village ruffians and dissolute scoundrels, and to put under lock and key men who committed midnight outrages, and he assured the House that it would be used only as a means of prevention. If that was the spirit in which it was obtained, where was the consistency on which the Prime Minister prided himself? The spirit of 1881 was prevention—the spirit of 1882 was punishment and deprivation of Constitutional privileges; and as years rolled on, they would find the Government assuming new spirits and inventing new stories to justify them in their downward course. He confessed it was with reluctance that he, as a Member of the Irish Party, consented to the Resolution asking his hon. Friends to request the Government to release them on parole. He was not in favour of asking the British Government for anything. He was in favour of making them give all that could be forced out of them by the Irish people. He knew that in making the application their Friends would be placing themselves in a position in which they would be refused; but his voice was overborne by the superior consideration which should influence them on occasions like this, and he assented to the Resolution. Perhaps it was as well that the application had been made; perhaps it was as well that the last shred of the garment of decency which might be supposed to surround the Government in this coercion business should be thrown aside; but, for his part, he regretted that any such application should be made to those who were without a shred of feeling in the uses to which they put the Act, and without an idea, except that of tyrants, with regard to those whom they had in their power.

Of him who treasures up a wrong"

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that in the course of the tenure of his present Office he had had many attacks made upon him, both within and without the House; but that was the first occasion on which he had been called a Carbonaro. He was bound to say that the charge of being a Carbonaro was about as true and as false as most of the charges made against him. [MR. HEALY: I did not make the charge.] He understood the hon. Member to have made the charge. With regard to the application made on behalf of the three Members of Parliament confined in Ireland, the debate had wandered somewhat from the Motion; but the last speaker had brought it back to the original question—the proposed release of the three Members. It was not for him to repeat the arguments of the Prime Minister, with which he agreed; but a particular appeal was made to him to give the reasons why, having released some of the “suspects,” he could not release the three Members, and he now wished to state those reasons. Hon. Members opposite had somewhat exaggerated the grounds upon which the release of private individuals under the Coercion Act had been made. He would at once admit that in that, as in other matters, he had tried to administer the Act with as little suffering to, and as little reasonable cause of complaint by, individuals as was compatible with due regard to their safe custody. In cases of domestic affliction, and when relations were on the point of death, he had consented to liberate prisoners; but he believed the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was not quite fair in his interpretation of the grounds on which certain persons had been released, for he (Mr. W. E. Forster) could not recollect that any prisoners had been released on such grounds as that of attending to the stocking of their farms, and so forth.

MR. SEXTON: Mr. O'Toole was allowed out.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he would look into the case of O'Toole.

MR. HEALY: Mr. O'Toole.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: But there was no encouragement to administer the Act with as much consideration as possible, when it was found that every possible advantage was taken of a case to make out illustrations and precedents for using the Act as regarded cases of a totally different nature in a way which Parliament never intended it should be used. That was the way, if it were possible, to compel a harsh administration of the Act; but he did not suppose that was the object aimed at by hon. Members, and, if it was, they would not succeed. The distinction was very manifest between releasing men who could with safety be released upon private grounds and men whose release was claimed on public grounds. It would be impossible for the Government, without bringing themselves into ridicule, to admit that Members of Parliament should be allowed to attend to their duties in the House of Commons in a particular case without allowing them to do so in all cases; and it would also put them in the position of being unable to give a reason for refusing a release in one case or granting it in another. The hon.

Mr. Healy

Member for Newcastle (Mr. J. Cowen) put the matter into legitimate form, when he said that the question was—Why do not you allow these Gentlemen to come to Parliament and act as Members of Parliament? But the question was fully debated last year, and the House decided, by an overwhelming majority, that they would not take that view; and he must say that, in his opinion, if the House had taken that view it would have been giving an immunity to Members of Parliament which would have been unjust to the other subjects of the Crown. The hon. Member for Wexford asked why the Government brought in the question of crime and outrage in connection with the proposed release of the Members? They had so far this reason—that if it were not for crime and outrage, these hon. Gentlemen would not be in prison. The hon. Member for Stroud (Mr. Brand) challenged hon. Members opposite to say why they did not try to stop crime and outrage in Ireland. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) did not think the reply of the hon. Member for Wexford to that challenge was satisfactory. The hon. Member alluded to some remarks made by him (Mr. W. E. Forster) last year, and to some letters he had not seen which had appeared in The Newcastle Chronicle; but had the hon. Member written any letters to his own constituents advising them against outrages? [Mr. HEALY: Does the right hon. Gentleman ask me the question?] It would be more to the purpose that it should be known whether the hon. Member addressed such a letter to his own constituents, warning them against crime and outrage, and telling them how all Irishmen were disgraced by their occurrence. Allusion had been made to his statement, that at one time outrages were diminishing; but if the context had been given, the statement would have borne a rather different interpretation. He gave the reason for the diminution, and it was that the Leaders of the movement were trying to discourage them after the bringing in of the Protection Act; and, whether he said so or not, he thought what a pity it was that they had not done so before. And why did he think they were doing it then? Because they had some hope that they might prevent the Protection Act being passed. [“Oh!”] And, unfortunately, when it was passed, the efforts at discouragement were not persisted in. During the course of last year these outrages were constantly happening, and no resolute effort was made by the Leaders of the Land League to stop them. An occasional remark might be made; but, on the other hand, words were spoken and written which no one having a knowledge of the Irish people and of human nature could doubt would lead to the commission of outrages. Then came the “no rent” manifesto, and its publication over Ireland. But its track had been marked by letters of blood. Take the outrages that had lately happened. Almost all of them were outrages on men who disobeyed the “no rent” manifesto, and who paid their rent, or because it was thought they would do so, and the men who committed these outrages very reasonably supposed that they were carrying out the advice of those who issued and circulated that manifesto. The hon. Member for Wexford said outrages might have followed the “no rent” manifesto; but he says also—“If you slap an Irishman in the face you must expect a blow in return.” Yes; but a blow to whom? Not to the Government. [“Yes!”] But the blow was given to poor men—as, for instance, the man he saw lying in his death agony from the injuries he had received. The blow was given to hardworking, honest men, who were torn from their beds, maimed, or killed. That was the way an hon. Member would wish his countrymen to act.

MR. CALLAN rose to Order. He wished to ask whether that was not an imputation of the most atrocious character made by the Chief Secretary for Ireland against Members of that House, and such that ought not to be permitted? He moved that the right hon. Gentleman's words be taken down.

MR. SPEAKER said, that the hon. Member (Mr. Callan) had appealed to him whether the right hon. Gentleman was in Order; he then proposed that the right hon. Gentleman's words be taken down. The hon. Member was too late, after his first appeal, to move that the right hon. Gentleman's words should be taken down. The hon. Member could not propose two courses to the House. At the same time, he (the Speaker) was bound to say that he had heard nothing fall from the right hon. Gentleman which was not in Order.

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that not unfrequently it had been his painful duty, as the Representative of the Government in Ireland, to try to bring home to hon. Members opposite the effect of their influence upon sections of the people in Ireland, and it was no uncommon thing for some hon. Member to jump up and interrupt him, and to call him to Order. But the Speaker had declared that such attempts were not well-founded. The hon. Member, no doubt, rightly believed in the courage of his countrymen; but what he had said in that House was an extraordinary exemplification of the way in which he would exhort them to use their courage—that was, to return the “slap in the face”—by which he (Mr. W. E. Forster) supposed he meant the arrest of his Friends by the Government—with blows; blows not to the Government, but to those who might be honest enough to disobey the commands of the Land League.

MR. HEALY said, he had never said so.

MR. W. E. FORSTER begged the hon. Gentleman's pardon if he misinterpreted him; but he was in the recollection of the House.

MR. HEALY said, he had never given such advice; he had said that was the explanation of the outrages.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: That might be so. But he believed the hon. Member had added, “what else could they expect but a slap in the face from the Government?” And when that was spoken of, they knew what must follow. Why, a blow back—a return blow—a blow which was not merely a blow to the cause of law and order, but a blow to the poor, hard-working Irishman who wished to do his duty. What happened in Tipperary two or three days ago? A band of men, at night, about 15 or 20—he was uninformed as to their number—attacked the house of a farmer, an isolated house, took a crowbar, and tried to break down the door, evidently with the intention of murdering the man who lived there. Why? Because he had disobeyed the “no rent” manifesto. Then the hon. Member said, “the Irish people would not tamely kiss the rod.” They did not want them to kiss any rod. They asked them not to commit outrage and murder, and not to incite to such crimes, and they would prevent them from committing them, if possible. Even if in doing so it was their painful duty to keep three Members of Parliament in Kilmainham on an important division, they would do it. The hon. Member had alluded to some letters he had written and to his visit to America. He (Mr. W. E. Forster) was glad he had done so. When the hon. Member was speaking in America—if he might judge from the reports he seen, and which he had every reason to believe were faithful reports, as they had appeared in papers in the hon. Member's own interest—he spoke with entire freedom. He always spoke as freely in that House as in Ireland; but in America the hon. Member had spoken almost more freely than he spoke either in that House or in Ireland. Perhaps he would get up and deny that he ever used the words; but most certainly in United Ireland he was reported, in one of the speeches he had given in America, as saying, speaking of the “no rent” manifesto, “that the farmers would not dare to take the farm of an evicted tenant.” [MR. HEALY: Hear, hear!] “Hear, hear!” That was the meaning, then, of the “no rent” manifesto. Hon. Members would excuse him if he spoke with some degree of earnestness in the matter. He had been blamed—and perhaps with some justice, as holding the Office he did—for not having been in the House to answer every Question put on the Paper. Why had he not been in the House? Because he had higher duties to perform in Ireland—to try and restore peace and order there, despite the “no rent” manifesto, and despite the men who had issued it—duties which were to try to make impossible that fear to take a farm whose former tenant had been evicted, of which the hon. Member had spoken. The hon. Member for Stroud had said that the Protection Act had failed, but he gave no reason for that statement. But he (Mr. W. E. Forster) could not allow such a remark to pass unnoticed. The Protection Act, certainly, had not succeeded to the extent they had hoped, because the remittances from America had been too constant, and those hon. Gentlemen whose efforts naturally and inevitably led to those outrages were too persistent. They might have underrated the power with which they had to contend. To some extent he acknowledged it was the case, for they did not fully estimate the motives and feelings of the men with whom they had to contend in carrying on the movement. It had been often said that the Act had been passed for the purpose of arresting the "village ruffians," and that they had not done so. He acknowledged that at the time of the discussions on the Bill he thought that was the class of men they should mainly have to contend with. He did not expect that anyone not a village ruffian would have pursued the course that had been taken, that men of influence and position would act as they had done. Certainly, as he had said, the Protection Act had not succeeded to the extent which some of them hoped it would succeed; but it had done much, and that was what he wanted his hon. Friend to bear in mind. Had it not been for the Protection Act, the law of the land would have been displaced by the unwritten law. It was only just passed in time to prevent that. The hon. Gentlemen now in Kilmainham, with hon. Members opposite, would really have been the Law Administrators in Ireland. They would have fixed what rent should be paid, and what trade should be carried on, and what men should take advantage of the Land Act. That had been prevented. The Protection Act had prevented that. Again, the Protection Act had to some extent struck down that weapon, that pike, which was so eloquently described as being more powerful to aid those who would assert the unwritten law against the written law than any weapon in all the power of the Government. Without the Protection Act the Government could not have struck down that. One other thing had been done. There were, no doubt, secret societies in Ireland, and societies whose object was murder, and who had much to do with the outrages which had been committed. He did not mean that the arrest of a man under the Protection Act was the punishment that ought to be given to a man who was implicated in murder; but, as he said before, their object was prevention, not punishment. They had stopped murders in some districts—they had stopped them, for instance, in Loughrea, by arresting large numbers of the people, who, if they had been at large, would have continued those murders; and he thought the number of them had, in consequence, been less than it otherwise would have been. He admitted the Government had not entirely succeeded. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who had been his Predecessor, had asked whether the Government still saw signs of improvement in Ireland? Well, he had only just returned from Ireland, and he might give the House his honest opinion as to its condition. He would admit that the state of things was still terrible; the Government was still in desperate conflict with the powers of lawlessness, with a conspiracy against law and order, with the men who maimed and murdered, and those who were reckless whether they fomented crime or not; but, to some extent, he saw hope. The "no rent" manifesto had failed. Rents, in spite of it, had been paid, and were being paid, to a larger extent in Ireland than before, and that, he thought, was an important sign of improvement. Why did he say that that was a sign of improvement? Not merely because of the individual cases, but because it was a conquest of law and order, a defeat of that conspiracy which would put the unwritten law in place of the law of the land, and which would determine whether rent should be paid or not. The "no rent" manifesto, though it had been followed by outrages, though it had succeeded, as he believed to have been the case, in causing many a murder and many a mutilation, had not succeeded in depriving the landlords of their rents. The pith of one of the hon. Gentleman's (Mr. Healy's) remarks was "Mind your own business." That motto he (Mr. W. E. Forster) took home to himself. As Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, he was as responsible for the maintenance of law and order as any man could be, and he meant to stop outrages; that was his business—the business which he had been requested to mind, and, let him say, that was the business of that House also. The signs of improvement in the future might be much greater than at this moment; but it might turn out, in order to maintain law and order, and to stop those murders which were a disgrace to their country and to humanity, that some stronger measures even yet would have to be resorted to. And if the House was convinced of the necessity, it would mind its own business, and resort to them. He could only say that if the Government saw the necessity of such an application they would not hesitate to make it.

MR. T. D. SULLIVAN said, in the speech that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) had just delivered, and in other speeches, the charge had been again and again laid against the Irish Members that they had not condemned crime and outrage in Ireland. ["Hear, hear!"] Hon. Gentlemen who cheered that statement proved their ignorance of the facts by doing so. He believed there was no Irish Member in that House who had taken part in the Land League agitation who had not denounced outrages thoroughly and earnestly. He was a witness to that fact in his own person, and he could also affirm the same of others. He had denounced from Irish platforms the perpetrators of crime and outrages, and had never failed to do so, unless when that work had been done by the preceding speakers. He had the honour also to be a journalist, and in the journal which he owned and edited, he had written articles, not one, but several articles, in strong and earnest repudiation of crime and outrage. What was, therefore, the honesty of hon. Members opposite who, knowing nothing about the matter, dared to give them the contradiction implied in their ironical cheers? The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had laid great stress on the statement said to have been made in America, that no man dare take a farm from which another had been evicted for the nonpayment of an unjust rent; but he (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) would point out that before the "no rent" manifesto was issued the same thing had been said both in Irish newspapers and on Irish platforms over and over again, and no exception was taken to it by the constituted authorities in that country. The meaning of that phrase had more than once been explained in the fullest and clearest manner by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), who said he wished to substitute for the old methods of dealing with people who offended against their neighbours in that way the new and comparatively harmless system of simply shunning them, turning away from them when meeting them in the street, and having no communication with them. He (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) was present with the hon. Member for the City of Cork on the platform at Ennis when he gave that advice in a memorable speech often quoted in that House, and which the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland could scarcely have forgotten. That course was advised as being not illegal, not immoral, and not beyond the rights of everyone. No man was bound to speak to another, nor was a man bound to have dealings with another whom he believed to be base and disloyal. ["Oh, oh!"] Now, would such advice be an incitement to murder and mutilation? [MR. MITCHELL HENRY: Yes.] Then the hon. Member for Galway was not accessible to reason. It was to be noticed that in all the speeches that had been made from the Government side of the House there was one important fact left entirely out of view. How did it happen that the right hon. Gentleman never once alluded to harsh landlordism, unjust eviction, and constantly-increasing unfair rents during that debate? It was these evictions that were the real parents of crime and outrage in Ireland. Harsh landlordism and unjust evictions led to crimes and outrages in Ireland before ever the Land League was founded. He contended that so important a factor in the production of crime and outrage in Ireland as these rent-raising and evictions should not have been kept out of view by any man speaking on the subject and wishing to deal fairly with it. The resources of English civilization had been contrasted with Irish barbarism by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister; but no one had noticed the now fulfilled prediction of the Irish Members that barbarism would result from the Coercion Act. As for the release of the three imprisoned Members, he asked the Prime Minister only to be consistent, and to remember that other prisoners had been released on parole. It was true that these hon. Members had not asked to be set free on a former occasion; but that was no reason, except to the Prime Minister, why they should not be released now. The right hon. Gentleman, if he believed in such an argument, might as well reply to the man who wanted a few days of liberty in order to sow his potatoes, that he had made no application three weeks before to attend to his cabbages. He saw in the Government's refusal of this small request the old historic spirit of England against the Irish people. He saw in it the result of the old spirit of tyranny and cruelty under which the Irish people for generations had been suffering. Did the right hon. Gentleman think he was sending a message of peace to Ireland that night? He (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) believed that the refusal would sting the Irish people very deeply, and would give a shock to the sentiments of all well-disposed people in the country. Since the time when three Irishmen were executed on the gallows at Manchester, he remembered no act of the British Government which should create in Ireland such a feeling of intense indignation and exasperation, which would be felt from one end of the country to another, as the curt and churlish and ungenerous refusal of this small favour by the Prime Minister that night. The Government was unable to rise even to the small height of that little occasion, and preferred to stand in that uncompromising attitude of hostility to the Irish people; and assuredly now or hereafter they would have their reward for it.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he most earnestly protested against the sanction which the hon. Gentleman the Member for Westmeath (Mr. T. D. Sullivan) had just given to the practice of "Boycotting." In fact, he thought the justification put forward by the hon. Member of the advice given by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) was a matter which ought not to be passed over by the House. Civilized and Christian society was dependent on the mutual association of mankind for support and comfort, and for anyone in the position of a Member of Parliament to advise poor ignorant men to shun one of their fellows who had paid his rent, and make his life a hell upon earth, was most reprehensible. He knew of no advice that could be given by a Christian more wicked than that advice given by the hon. Member for the City of Cork. In consequence of it, many unfortunate men and their families had been reduced to starvation in isolated country districts in consequence of their neighbours refusing to sell them the necessaries of life. Could the hon.

Member for Westmeath justify such conduct in the face of the House of Commons? [Mr. T. D. SULLIVAN: Yes.] Did his conscience justify it? [A laugh.] Did the hon. Member who laughed justify it? [Mr. BIGGAR: Yes.] Let him give such advice in this country, and the law would soon stop it. [Mr. BIGGAR: Trades unions do.] It was illegal. The practice of picketing, to which the hon. Member for Newcastle (Mr. Joseph Cowen) had referred, was illegal and had been punished repeatedly. He wondered that the hon. Member could possibly speak of it without reprobation. He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) had spoken thus strongly because of the advice that had been given, and he would continue on all occasions to denounce the "no rent" manifesto and the cruel practice of "Boycotting." If more hon. Members were to do likewise, perhaps they would produce some effect upon the hardened consciences of those who gave the advice.

MR. DALY said, that, while claiming to be as conscientious as the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry), he was prepared most earnestly to maintain that "Boycotting" pure and simple, as it was laid down by the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell), and not exercised for the gratification of malice and the avenging of private quarrels, was perfectly fair and justifiable under the circumstances now existing in Ireland. Why, as regarded England, before the institution of the ballot any man who voted against his landlord was "Boycotted." With all his respect for the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, he (Mr. Daly) was greatly disappointed at the disingenuous way in which the Prime Minister had met some of the arguments put forward by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). He would almost infer from some parts of the speech of the right hon. Gentleman that the Government intended imprisoning other Members of Parliament, and did not want to create any precedent by releasing those already confined to vote. Those hon. Members had been spoken of as witnesses and judges—perhaps, if they were released, they might become the executioners of the Government. The Prime Minister described the Land Act as an efficient means of preserving peace in Ireland, and taunted the Irish Members with not supporting it. He (Mr. Daly), in return, charged the Government with being responsible for the crime and outrage which had been taking place in Ireland. The Estimates before them supported the charge. He found that they required only £96,000 for the working of the Land Act, notwithstanding that tenants in arrears were beseeching for admission to the Land Courts, and denied it because of insufficient facilities, while the landlords were allowed to put them out of their homesteads. But an excess sum of £140,000 was on that occasion asked for the Constabulary, or, in other words, for the landlord interests. When the excitement caused by the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland had died away, he thought that hon. Gentlemen below the Gangway opposite would see that many of the crimes, the commission of which he (Mr. Daly) deplored as much as any man, had arisen from the imbecility of the Irish Administration.

MR. A. MOORE said, he had heard with very great regret the decision the Government had come to on the question under notice. He thought the condition of Ireland was so critical, and the whole situation was so complicated, that the Government ought to have grasped eagerly at such an offer as was made by the three hon. Gentlemen to come forth from their prison on parole. The Government ought to take that offer, unless they were prepared to bring them to trial. Indeed, they ought to go further, and to invite those hon. Members not merely to come there on Thursday night to register their votes, but to attend to their Parliamentary duties throughout the remainder of the Session, accepting the parole which they offered. While saying that, he need hardly say he had no sympathy with the policy of those hon. Gentlemen, or with the "no rent" manifesto which, indeed, he had denounced, together with the outrages connected with it, in every possible way. But he believed that these hon. Members would be less dangerous in the House of Commons in the discharge of their duties than in Kilmainham, and that their release would remove a great deal of the irritation at present prevalent among the lower classes of Ireland on account of their arrest. He was sorry to hear hon. Gentlemen opposite speak in slighting tones of the consequences which had undoubtedly followed from the "no rent" manifesto. As long as he had a seat in that House he should always raise his voice against the crime, misery, and misfortune which had followed from the propagation of that disgraceful document. Another point which hon. Members opposite glossed over very gracefully was the question of "Boycotting." They were told it was no harm to tell people not to deal with a man. Was it no harm to order people not to deal with him under pain of burning, mutilation, and perhaps death? Nothing could exceed the extraordinary tyranny practised under the system. At that very moment a gentleman in Tipperary was "Boycotted" because he gave a site for a police barrack to the Government. ["Hear, hear!"] Was it a crime to support the authorities? He certainly did not understand these new doctrines; he did not understand why the law should not be maintained without peril, and he regarded it as the duty of every citizen to help to do it. This gentleman in Tipperary was a kind neighbour, a good landlord, and had not even asked for his rents; and merely because he gave the site of a police barrack where a barrack had previously existed, he was "Boycotted," his land was kept idle, and he had no one even to attend to his horse in the stable. Could there be anything more tyrannical than a system under which notices were posted on the walls telling men, under pain of death, not to work for such and such a person, and where even an unfortunate woman was threatened that if she did not leave her employment her mother would be burnt in her bed? In her case, however, he was glad to say the menace had failed, for she had not yet left her employment, and did not mean to do so. He was sorry that the hon. Member for Cork (Mr. Daly), for whom he had a sincere respect, and who, being an urban Member, did not know what was going on in the country, should give the weight of his character in recommending a practice which was most demoralizing and misleading to the people.

MR. GORST said, he had paid the utmost attention to the arguments urged by the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister to show that it was impossible for the Government to grant the request to allow those three Irish Members to record their votes on Thursday. The only reason for the refusal, however, which he could understand was, that the three votes, if given, were likely to be given against the Government. If, as they had been often told, the Coercion Act was intended for prevention and not for punishment, he should have thought that the admission of the right hon. Gentleman himself, that no harm would be done in Ireland and no ill would be produced on the population of that country by those three Members coming to the House, would have been a sufficient reason for giving them leave to come. He, however, rose chiefly to call attention to the very grave statements made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant. The right hon. Gentleman was in the habit of making vague announcements of changes in Irish policy in casual speeches. They never understood those statements when they were first made, they always required subsequent explanation; but he understood the right hon. Gentleman to say he admitted the present Irish policy of the Government to have failed. [Mr. W. E. FORSTER: No; I did not.] The right hon. Gentleman admitted that it had failed to restore peace and order in Ireland; and if he had not done so, and an opportunity were given for discussing the question, there would be no difficulty in showing that the policy of the Government had absolutely failed to restore peace and order in that country. But he had understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that, in view of the comparative failure of his past measures, he was preparing some new and more severe policy; that there were some measures of a more stringent character in the background which he shadowed out in rather a mysterious manner, and which would be shortly introduced.

MR. W. E. FORSTER (interposing): The hon. and learned Member must not suppose, because I have not an opportunity of making any lengthened remarks, that I admit the correctness of his statement.

MR. GORST said, that he was quite accustomed to that sort of thing. ["Oh, oh!"] The Irish policy of the Government was always announced to the House in a piecemeal way. He understood from the right hon. Gentleman's speech that there was to be some change in their policy. The present measures of coercion had entirely failed to restore order in Ireland. The Assizes just concluded showed that the amount of crime now was double what it was in all the various districts last year; in almost every case the juries failed to convict; and, therefore, there must be some new departure on the part of the Government. They could not go on holding Office and refrain from taking some fresh step or other in order to ameliorate the present state of things in Ireland. He, therefore, wished to know whether the announcement of the new Irish policy would be made to the House in a distinct and formal manner, so that they might be able to understand and discuss the measures of the Government?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he thought it was understood the other night, although he was not then present, that the Report of Supply would be taken to-day, and he hoped that, as they were now near the hour for closing the debate, the House would be allowed to take that step. It would be altogether inconvenient at the present moment to enter into the large question to which the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had adverted, and which might, no doubt, be fairly raised upon some of the language that had been used by the Government. In a matter of such very great importance he thought the responsibility of the Government ought to be left as unfettered as possible, and he should be sorry if anything interfered to prevent the debate being brought to a close.

MR. BIGGAR (who rose amid great interruption) said, he did not intend to talk the Motion out; but he felt bound to take some notice of the language of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. Mitchell Henry) with respect to "Boycotting." He (Mr. Biggar) did not see why such attacks should be made on Irishmen for that practice, seeing that it was in use in every part of the world. Moreover, it could be defended from its analogy with what had recently occurred at a particular Club, the Reform Club, in London. A number of its members, among whom were many Members of Parliament, had refused to hold any personal communication with gentlemen of whose opinions they disapproved, and, therefore, they had "Boycotted" them to the extent of their power by voting against their admission to the Club. As to the imprisoned Members, the proceedings of the Government that afternoon were such as they had consistently followed when the question of the treatment of political prisoners was under discussion. They had attempted to raise a false issue. But the real question at the present moment was, whether certain hon. Members should have an opportunity of voting against the Government on Thursday next? The Government were making special efforts to get up their Supporters, and they ought not to hinder their opponents from voting.

Resolution agreed to.

It being now five minutes to Seven of the clock, the House suspended its Sitting.

The House resumed its Sitting at Nine of the clock.

ECCLESIASTICAL AND MORTUARY FEES.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in rising to call attention to the subject of Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees; and to move for a

"Select Committee to inquire into the Law which authorizes the demanding of Mortuary Fees, and into the Ecclesiastical Fees levied by Ministers of Religion upon the occasion of Burials and the erection of Monuments in Cemeteries and Parish Churchyards; and to report to the House whether any legislation is desirable with a view to their regulation or reduction," said, the subject was not one which he should desire to approach, if it could be avoided, and, indeed, few cared to do so. He brought it forward in no spirit of hostility to the Established Church; the grievance was one which pressed on members of that Church as well as upon Nonconformists. It was a civil wrong which was felt by people generally, and which ought to be remedied. That it might not be supposed that he brought the subject forward as a hobby of his own, he would read a short extract from a letter written by one who was entitled to great respect—he meant the Archbishop of York. In a letter written in September, 1880, after a great many burial scandals had occurred in his Province, the Archbishop of York said that the whole subject of fees required careful consideration; that it would be desirable that a table of fees should be adjusted on one scale to be approved of by the Chancellor of the diocese; that the present state of things was extremely painful; that it produced conflicts even at the grave side; and that no time should be lost. There was also a letter from the Vicar of Sheffield, Canon Blakeney, who stated that the Clergy of the rural deanery did not object to a Select Committee to inquire into the whole question; indeed, the Vicar of Sheffield added, he might say the Clergy courted investigation. He (Sir Alexander Gordon) had also two notes from country vicars, who took the same view. Those reverend personages had seen the Bill he had brought in last year, and they stated that the Church would be under an obligation to him, if he would bring in a Bill to regulate marriage as well as burial fees. Now, there were two classes of fees connected with deaths and burials—mortuary fees and burial fees. The first, mortuary fees, were legalized so far back as the time of Henry VIII., in the early period of whose Reign such exorbitant fees were demanded by the Clergy that the Act of 1530 was passed, which prohibited the collection of any other fees than those which were specified by the Act. They were said to have been originally an offering to the Church for any possible omission by the deceased person of the dues of the Church during his lifetime. That might have been necessary in the year 1530; but he did not think Parliament would levy a duty now on such a basis. Though the Act had become non-effective by disuse in large towns, it still remained in force in many country villages in England, except with regard to Chester and some parts of Wales, which were exempted in later Reigns. Small villages and country parishes were still taxed upon the basis of that Act, and it was a great grievance. Strange to say, the fee exacted in some cases exceeded the amount authorized by the Statute. The fee was limited to 10s., but in some cases 10s. 6d. and 11s. were charged. Nonconformists especially complained of this burden, and he thought the House would agree with him that these complaints alone constituted a case for inquiry. But the other class of fees—namely, ordinary burial fees—were far more common. To show the variety of fees that were exacted, he had a list of fees, taken at random from Acts of Parliament and Returns presented to the House, and he found that they varied from 1*s.* 6*d.* to £1 3*s.*—these two rates being found in adjacent parishes. In fact, they were levied without any regular system. A committee of the Salisbury Diocesan Synod, appointed to inquire into the subject, had recommended that no fees should be demanded for the burial of a parishioner, and that monumental and other fees should be reduced practically to one-fourth; but, of course, these recommendations could only be carried into effect by Act of Parliament, and that was why he asked the House to institute an inquiry—that they might have material for legislation on the question. If any hon. Member should object that this was a clerical subject with which Parliament ought not to interfere, he would remind them that Parliament had twice interfered to prohibit baptismal fees. In 1872 the late Bishop of Winchester had carried a Bill prohibiting baptismal fees; and when they remembered that baptism was not required by the State, but burial was, he thought Parliament had a much stronger ground for interference with a view to the regulation of burial fees. He would not detain the House, because the subject did not require much comment. What he wished to point out was that while these burial fees were a benefit to a few thousand clergymen, they were injurious to 25,000,000 Englishmen. The whole population, rich and poor, but mostly the poor, were affected by these fees, except persons who belonged to the Jewish community, who had their own burying-grounds. The hon. and gallant Baronet concluded by moving for the Select Committee of which he had given Notice.

MR. BRINTON, in seconding the Motion, said, that the interests of both Churchmen and Nonconformists were bound up in this question. There was, he thought, fair and reasonable ground for such an equalization and reduction of burial fees as would satisfy a great number of the poorer portion of the community, especially the agricultural classes. The oppressive character of burial fees, as well as of mural and other monuments, &c., in churches might be learned by consulting Returns which were in the Library of the House; and he thought they were justified in bringing this matter before the House and asking that it might be inquired into by a Committee—and the more particularly at the present time, when so many churchyards were being transferred to Burial Boards and Cemetery Companies, who, as a rule, had to take also the rights or customs previously imposed on the Church. In a large number of parishes 5*s.* was charged as a fee for permission to inter by the Clergy. That charge was entirely separate from the interment charge, the charge for making the grave, the sexton's labour, &c. In some parishes 7*s.*, 8*s.*, and even 10*s.* was charged for interment. He regretted to say that this fee was found to be heaviest in populous places. For instance, a servant of a friend of his had to pay 10*s.* interment fee for the burial of a child in Kensington. In Brompton, also, the charges were excessive. He wished to do justice to members of the Clergy, who were at times most reluctant to make the charge, on account of the poverty of those who had to pay it, but still it belonged to their office; and, indeed, he had been told by some of the Clergy that a clerical fee of 2*s.* 6*d.* in each case would be to many of their body riches itself. He thought it would be much more desirable to augment the incomes of the Clergy from some other source, and to remove these oppressive charges on burial. In regard to memorial and monumental charges, there was a strong feeling throughout the country that the option given to the clergyman to make any charge he thought proper was one that ought to be controlled by the Legislature. The subject, as a whole, might be regarded as a not unfair or unreasonable corollary to the Burials Bill which was passed last Session; and if this Committee were given, it would tend to remove some of the difficulties which prevented the Burials Bill from being all that it should be to the community. As a member of the Church of England, he supported the Motion.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 “That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the Law which authorizes the demanding of Mortuary Fees, and into the Ecclesiastical Fees levied by Ministers of Religion upon the occasion of Burials and the erection of Monuments in Cemeteries and Parish Churchyards; and to report to the House whether any legislation is desirable with a view to their regulation or reduction."—(Sir Alexander Gordon.)

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he ought, perhaps, to apologize for intervening in this matter, which was in no way connected with his Department. But his right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department (Sir William Harcourt), possibly because he thought that by the interest he (the Judge Advocate General) had taken in the Burials Question, he had familiarized himself with this subject, had requested him to take charge of it, and he had willingly consented to do so. He thought it was impossible for anyone who had studied the subject, or had listened to the hon. Members who had moved and seconded the Motion, not to feel that the law on this subject was in a very unsatisfactory state. He thought he might go further, and say that there was no law at all on the subject—no law in the sense of any inflexible or general rule. The fact was, that the practice of exacting fees had grown up by custom, which in time acquired the force of law. Sir Robert Phillimore, in his learned work on Ecclesiastical Law, laid down that by the Canon Law and the Common Law also it was absolutely unlawful to charge fees for the burial of parishioners. In a leading case decided in the last century, it was held that a vicar was not entitled to demand fees for burials under either law, though such fees might be exacted by custom. The Civil Courts, however, had long since arrogated to themselves the right of determining whether the custom of exacting burial fees existed in a particular parish, and whether the custom in question was of a reasonable character. Now, in many cases, the measure of burial fees was what the clergyman in each case chose to exact, and what the parishioner could well pay. In that part of the Principality of Wales with which he was specially connected, he might observe, in passing, a very peculiar custom existed. In many parts of the Principality no burial fees were demanded; but it was customary for the friends of a deceased person to lay voluntary offerings upon the coffin, and in that way the clergyman was remunerated. There was no process, however, by which these offerings could be exacted. In 1852, as the House would remember, Statutes were introduced for the purpose of closing burial-grounds in urban districts and of opening cemeteries instead. Those Acts gave an incumbent power to exact such fees in connection with burials in cemeteries as he would have been entitled to exact in connection with interments in the old churchyards. In the subsequent Act, known as Marten's Act, there was no provision whatever affecting burial fees, so that in cemeteries constructed under that Act clergymen had no power to demand fees. The Burials Act had not altered the law in any way. Not only was the exacting of these fees a thing unknown at Common Law; but a clergyman had, neither by Common Law nor Canon Law, any right to exact any fee for the erection of a monument. His right to demand such a fee depended upon custom. Reference had been made to the Burials Laws Amendment Act of 1880, and, although it had only been in operation 18 months, no Act of Parliament ever passed had more completely falsified the predictions of its opponents. Thousands of burials had taken place under the Act; but there had been no appreciable decrease in the decorousness or reverence with which the funeral ceremonies were observed. That was largely due to the way in which the Clergy of the Church of England had received the measure, and had shown their desire to carry it out, not only in its letter, but in its spirit. There had, however, been some exceptional cases, such as that of the Rev. Mr. Hall, who refused to enter upon his register the burial of a Dissenter; and there had been cases brought to his knowledge, in which an incumbent had used his arbitrary power of exacting pretty nearly any burial fees he chose, as a sort of screw to compel Nonconformists to bury their deceased friends, not under the Act, but with the Service of the Church of England; and this was the way in which it had been done. A known Dissenter went to a clergyman and said—"My friend, my son, or my wife," as the case might be, "has died, and I want the burial to take place according to the Act." He asked what was the

fee. "Oh," said the clergyman, "If you choose to bury him or her with my Service the fee will be 5s. ; if you insist upon burial under the Burial Act it will be £5." Cases of that kind had occurred, and there was no doubt that this power had been used as a sort of screw for the purpose of evading the Act. On the other hand, as he had said, there were numerous cases in which the Clergy had cheerfully conformed to the provisions of the Act, carrying them out not only in the letter, but in the spirit. In Wales it was by no means an uncommon thing when a Nonconformist was buried, for part of the service to be performed in the Church by the clergyman, and for the remainder of the service at the grave to be performed by a Nonconformist minister. He was sure that occurrences of that kind had tended very much to knit together in Christian harmony the different members of the parish. There had, however, been these exceptions, and it was exceedingly desirable, not only in the interests of the public generally, but in the interests of the Clergy and in the interests of the Church of England, that such things should be made impossible. The abuse of this arbitrary power recoiled upon those who had recourse to it, and in every interest it was desirable that it should be taken away. The proposal for a Select Committee was an exceedingly reasonable and modest one ; and, on the part of the Government, he was authorized to consent to it. Of course, a Select Committee could not legislate ; but it could inquire into the whole question, and he had no doubt that his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon) would be able to lay before the Committee information which might serve as the basis of their Report, which Report, he hoped, would serve as the basis of future legislation. Under these circumstances, he did not think the House would act wrongly in acceding to the Motion.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY said, the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) had already informed the House what was the feeling of the borough which he (Mr. Stuart-Wortley) represented in this matter. On behalf of the Clergy of that borough, he was authorized to say that they were far from deprecating any such inquiry as that to which the right hon.

and learned Gentleman (the Judge Advocate General), on behalf of the Government, had given his consent. Generally speaking, where they had an existing inequality proved they had a prima facie case for inquiry. There was no doubt that it was owing to that inequality that irritation had been produced. Of course, the House would see that in the speeches which had hitherto been made—he did not make this assertion in any invidious sense—only one side of the question had been stated. He would not detain them by showing that there was much which might also be said on the other side, and which an inquiry by a Select Committee would usefully elicit.

MR. BULWER said, that if the appointment of the Select Committee were agreed to, it must not be taken that all hon. Members present also agreed in the views which had been expressed. He agreed with the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Osborne Morgan) that burial fees were forbidden by the Canon Law ; but his right hon. and learned Friend had also stated that they were not recoverable at Common Law, and he quoted the authority of Sir Robert Phillimore on the subject ; but against that he (Mr. Bulwer) might place the authority of Lord Stowell, who said that, although burial fees were forbidden by the Canon Law, fee offerings came to be made, and essentially became customary ; and the custom was founded on reasonable considerations. It was not the fact that parishes were left to fix any rates they chose, for they had to be submitted to the Ordinary, who satisfied himself of their propriety. These payments, though not due as of common right, depended upon custom, and were enforceable at Common Law, and the right to them thus stood, in that respect, upon the same footing as other rights founded on custom. It had been said that the parson was at liberty to ask any person demanding burial what he could pay, and to decide for himself whether the person was poor or not, and regulate his demand accordingly ; but that could not be done. The burial fee was regulated by custom. One authority stated 3s. 4d. as the accustomed fee for burial ; but, whatever it was, no clergyman had the right to demand a higher fee than was authorized by custom ; if he did so, it could be reasonably and successfully resisted. His right hon.

and learned Friend had mentioned a case where a parson had said that if he performed the Burial Service the fee would be 5s., but if another performed it it would be £5. Unless that other was a stranger to the parish, or not a member of the Church of England, he did not see how that could happen, because, by the last Burial Act, it was provided that the fee should be paid to the person to whom it would have been payable if the burial had taken place with the Service of the Church of England. If with the Service of the Church of England, the only fee the clergyman could ask for his own services was the customary fee, and no one else had a right to perform the services, he might deny justice to a poor man; but, except in that sense, he could not act as his right hon. and learned Friend had stated. Then, as to the fees for monuments, that was a matter strictly regulated by custom; and it was, in his opinion, very desirable that some restriction should be placed upon the erection of mural monuments and sepulchral effigies. Everyone had noticed how churchyards were often disfigured by 6-foot iron railings enclosing monuments expatiating upon the virtues of the deceased. The proper legal process to be adopted by any person desirous of erecting a monument in a church was to obtain the leave of the incumbent, who might prescribe his own reasonable terms, or demand the accustomed fees. If the incumbent asked an exorbitant fee, the person might apply for a faculty. In strict right this ought always to be done, and the Judge of the Consistory Court, if the incumbent objected to the faculty being granted, would say whether the fees demanded was such as was customary and proper under the circumstances. On payment of the proper fee, the applicant's wishes would be carried out by legal authority. He was not opposing this inquiry; but he wished to point out that there was some exaggeration in the charges made against the Clergy. He thought that they had not laid themselves open to the reflections cast upon them by hon. Members. They were quite as desirous as anyone else that some rule should be laid down by which fees might be fixed upon a definite basis.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) stated, in explanation, that he did not mean to say that fees fixed by custom could not be enforced in the same way as payments authorized by the Common Law; but that fees varied according to custom, the result being that there was so much uncertainty that no one knew what he had to pay.

MR. EVANS WILLIAMS said, that he should not have intervened in this debate, in which he would intervene for a few minutes only, were it not for some remarks of the two Members who spoke last. It was said an ounce of fact was worth a ton of argument. The hon. and learned Member for Cambridgeshire (Mr. Bulwer) doubted the existence of a grievance; but he could give instances of excessive charges in connection with the subject under notice, so far as monuments were concerned. He had been charged 20 guineas as a fee for erecting a simple stone cross with a low railing. That railing was not a high one enclosing ground beyond the grave, but one six inches high only, on a coping, just to mark the grave of two relatives—old parishioners in a borough which he represented. On his explaining this to the incumbent, the latter replied still that 20 guineas was his fee. He took counsel's opinion whether he could resist the charge, but was told that there was no Common Law right to erect a monument in a churchyard at all, and that it was a matter of bargain with the incumbent. In many parishes in the neighbourhood in question, and by many of his clerical friends, no fee whatever would have been charged for the monument, which was an ornament. Poor persons in the same parish were often charged £2 for a simple head-stone. All this he could prove before the Committee. He did not understand what had been said as to these fees being limited by custom, unless that was applied to fees for burial only, for which he knew of no such extortionate fees.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE said, that if it was the intention of the House to appoint a Committee, the inquiry, to be of any value, ought to be a searching one, so that no injustice might be done by a superficial review of the circumstances. At the same time, he feared that the proceedings before the Committee would degenerate into amusing small talk about headstones and humorous epitaphs. He fully admitted that among the 15,000 Clergy there might be some gradations of opinion and of judiciousness; but, taking them as a whole, the Clergy were kindly and considerate in the performance of their duty and the exercise of their privileges. As to the question of the burial of non-parishioners, it must be remembered that no one had a right in any burial-ground where he was not a parishioner; so that whenever as, in such cases, anyone of the Clergy was asked to give up any of his rights, it must be remembered that the clergyman, in consenting, was granting an indulgence, and an allowance should accordingly be made for that fact.

Question put, and agreed to.

And, on April 3, Committee nominated as follows:—The JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL, Sir EDMUND LECHMERE, Sir ALEXANDER GORDON, Mr. STANLEY LEIGHTON, Mr. BRINTON, Sir HENRY FLETCHER, Mr. RICHARD, Viscount FOLKESTONE, Mr. NELSON, and Mr. BERRFORD HOPE, with power to send for persons, papers, and records.

Ordered, That Three be the quorum.

ARMY—CONDITION OF THE ARMY.

OBSERVATIONS.

COLONEL BARNE, in rising to call attention to the unsatisfactory condition of the Army; and to move—

“That the chief command of the Army should be placed in the hands of the most experienced soldiers and administrators in Her Majesty’s Service; that the youth of the men now serving in the Army renders them unfit to undergo the hardships of a campaign,” said, he thought he expressed the opinion of nine-tenths of the Army when he declared that great discontent prevailed among the officers in consequence both of the slowness of promotion, and also of the rawness of the troops whom officers were called upon to lead in the field. In the old days, before the abolition of Purchase, promotion was rendered speedier by arrangement among the officers themselves. In place of that system they had another which was a source of great expense to the country, having cost them in the last year no less a sum than £1,116,112, without giving satisfaction to the Service. He attributed the inefficiency of the men to the short-service system, which had the effect of depriving the Army of men as soon as they became really efficient and serviceable. The youths who entered the Army, were, no doubt, good material, but they were too young to form really reliable soldiers in case of need. They had had three campaigns since the introduction of the short-service system, enabling them to estimate its effect with precision—the Afghan, the Zulu, and the Boer campaigns.

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS, NOTICES OF REMOVAL (SCOTLAND) BILL.*(Sir Alexander Gordon, Mr. M'Lagan, Mr.
Barclay.)*

Order for Second Reading read.

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, it might be in the recollection of hon. Members that two years ago the question which he now brought forward in this measure was discussed in the House, and met with a very favourable reception from Members on both sides of the House. Since then the question of extending the time for notice of removal in Scotland had gained favour very rapidly throughout the whole of Scotland amongst the class which was most interested in it—namely, the farmer class and occupiers of land. The change that had been asked for by them ever since he had had the honour of a seat in that House had been to convert the notice of removal of 40 days—which was all that a tenant farmer was now entitled to—at the end of his lease into a period of two years. The present law of 40 days' notice came into operation so late as the year 1853, when an Amendment to a Bill relating to the procedure in the Sheriff Courts was carried, and altered the previous law, which had been in existence for 300 years, giving the tenants a longer notice. He said a longer notice, because the Act of 1555 required that the notice should be given 40 days before the Whitsunday of the year in which the lease expired—so that if a tenant's lease expired at Martinmas (in November), he required to have notice 40 days before the Whitsunday of that year. That gave him six months' and 40 days' notice; and so if the lease terminated at any period between terms he had the period after Whitsunday, whatever it was, added to the 40 days. The alteration was made without any discussion in that House as to the reasons why it should be made. Probably at 2 o'clock in the morning, when, formerly, Scotch Business was conducted, some hon. Member moved an Amendment in the interest of owners of land, and it was passed without discussion. The hard operation of the present law was this. The landlord had his tenant under his observation for 18 years and a-half, and he might be a good tenant and might wish to remain; but the landlord had it in his power to hold back information as to whether the tenant might continue in the farm for the term of another lease until 40 days before the lease expired. He had known cases where that had been done, and no doubt other Members acquainted with agricultural matters in Scotland could adduce other instances. Forty days was too short a period for the farmer to make his arrangements for taking a new farm, with the competition there was at present. Two years was the very shortest time a man ought to have to clear out of one farm and make arrangements for getting into another. When they considered the present change in the law was made in 1853, it was rather a reflection on this generation to find that they were so much less liberal and less considerate to their tenants than their ancestors were 330 years ago. He, therefore, hoped the House would be of a more liberal disposition and return to the practice of their ancestors. To show how this question was adopted throughout Scotland, and he might say in England also, he would read a clause in the Bill that had been brought before the country by the Scottish Chamber of Agriculture upon this subject. That was a Bill which had been discussed throughout the whole length and breadth of Scotland, and he had not heard of a single dissentient voice against the adoption of this clause, which ran as follows:—

“Where in any proceedings relating to the removal or ejection of a tenant, under a contract of tenancy, an interval of 40 days is by law necessary and sufficient between the giving of warning or notice to remove, or the execution of a summons of removing and the term of removal, two years interval shall, by virtue of this Act, be necessary and sufficient for the same.”

That was a clause which had been accepted by the great majority of the farmers of Scotland as one which they desired to have passed; and not only was there that expression of opinion, but he found that most—he believed he might say all—certainly most—of the leases of large landowners which had been drawn up within the last two or three years, adopted the two years' notice of removal. He had in his hand what was known as Lord Dalhousie's lease. That noble Lord stipulated—

“That the tenancy should not come to an end until after expiry of three years' notice given by either party to the other of his intention to bring the tenancy to an end.”

And three years' notice was certainly better than two; but he (Sir Alexander Gordon) thought two years was sufficient to be made compulsory by legislation, and any party could add a year or any number of years, but could not reduce it. Another large owner—Lord Aberdeen—bound himself

“And his successors to give two years' notice before the determination of the lease to the tenant thereof, whether the said lease was to be renewed to him; and, if so, on what condition.”

Lord Kintore's lease stipulated—

“That if neither the proprietor nor the tenant should give the other notice three years before Whit Sunday of his intention to terminate such lease at its natural expiry, such lease should be held to be renewed on the same conditions and at the same rent for an additional year, and so on for as many additional years as might be allowed by the parties to elapse without giving notice, so that the proprietor and the tenant should always have three years' notice of an intention to terminate the lease.”

Lord Seafield's lease contained the following provision :—

“With the view of encouraging the tenant to keep up the farm and maintain its fertility, towards the end of the lease, the proprietor will be prepared, except in cases where he may consider it inexpedient, to enter into negotiations with the tenant for the renewal of the lease two years before the expiry thereof.”

And, lastly, let him quote a landowner whose opinion would, he was sure, carry weight on the other side of the House—he meant the Duke of Richmond, who was so well known to take an interest in, and to understand, agricultural matters so well. He stipulated that—

“New leases should be entered into two years before the expiry of the old leases, and two years' notice of intention to remove should be given on either side.”

He thought that showed that the measure he adopted was popular with landowners, whose experience and opinion the House had a right to consider, as well as with the tenant farmers. He should like to show the House the contrary of that, where landlords did not give notice. He had before him a clause in a lease—he would not mention the name, because it would be invidious to do so—but it was very similar to clauses which they found in many of the standard leases of Scotland, some of which were held to be models of propriety. It ran in this way—

“The tenant will be bound to remove at the expiry of his lease without any warning or legal procedure, failing which he will be liable in twice the stipulated rent of each year during which he shall continue in possession after such expiry.”

He hoped that clause was not often put into operation; but the law allowed a landlord to do so, and, consequently, it acted disadvantageously to the farmer. He would also quote another Bill which had been discussed throughout the country very widely, and accepted by the tenant farmers of England—he meant the Farmers' Alliance Land Bill for England. One clause of that Bill—Clause 12—provided—

“That where the tenant held from year to year, or at will, the tenancy should not be terminated, except by a notice in writing by the landlord to the tenant, or by the tenant to the landlord, two years at least before the time specified in such notice for the termination of the tenancy.”

That was an indication of the wish of the tenant farmers of England; and he believed that already, in practice, contracts of tenancy in England usually included two years' notice of removal. So necessary was it under the present conditions of agriculture that tenants should have time to make their arrangements that notice of two or three years was practically coming into operation, and he wished to assist the introduction of that system by making it law. He would also remind hon. Members, and especially hon. Members opposite—if there were any who objected to the principle of the Bill—that the late Lord Beaconsfield had adopted that principle of two years' notice. He was sorry to say that, although there had been no opposition to this Bill from the tenant farmer class in Scotland, there had been some cases of opposition from the landowning class and from the factors who acted for them. There were two or three Petitions from them; but he was happy to say it was quite the reverse in the country to which he belonged, and part of which he had the honour to represent. These agricultural matters had been discussed lately in a very keen manner. The Commissioners of Supply for the County of Aberdeen, when the question of two years' notice came before them at a special meeting, agreed last year that—

“ The Bill seemed to be conceived with a desire to promote the coming to an understanding as to renewal (of lease) a considerable period before the expiry of the existing lease, and in principle, therefore, it deserves a general approval.”

That was the opinion of the landlords of Aberdeenshire, who, he was glad to say, sympathized with their tenants in their desire to have sufficient notice of removal. There was also a Petition from the Society of Advocates of Aberdeen, who were mostly the Commissioners' land agents, in favour of the Bill. They wished one or two little changes, which he was quite aware would be of advantage. They wished the operation of the Bill to be restricted to occupiers of five acres of arable land, and more. It was an oversight of his that that had been omitted from the Bill, which would only apply to occupiers of holdings containing five acres and more of arable land. He would also remind the House that in the English Agricultural Holdings Bill of 1875, two years was specified as the period for the exhaustion of manures of the third class. The third class of improvements in that Act gave the tenant two years for these manures, as did also the Scotch Agricultural Bill brought in by the late Government two years in succession—1875 and 1876. In the corresponding clause, two years was held to be the time that the third class of manures should require for exhaustion. He might also remark that, with regard to Ireland, so lately as 1876, Parliament had passed an Act specially to extend the time of notice from six months to one year, though the custom of that country was that tenancies were held from year to year. If Parliament had passed a special Act to give that benefit to Ireland, he did not see why they should not do the same with regard to Scotland. It should be borne in mind that Scotch leases, he might say universally, were for 19 years. And, again, in 1875, the Agricultural Holdings Act had extended the time of notice in England from six to 12 months, unless the tenant contracted himself out of the Act. The law as it stood in England was 12 months' notice, even for a yearly tenancy; and how much more were Scotch tenants entitled to two years? He had put in the Bill a Proviso that the lease should be seven years or more, because he thought five years was quite sufficient time for the landowner to become acquainted with his tenant, and to know whether he would retain him. But, practically, there was no such thing as seven years' leases in Scotland. He would remind the House that the Prime Minister, when in Mid Lothian, had held out to the Scotch farmers that his view of the matter was that longer notices should be given. The right hon. Gentleman referred to what was called the Leicestershire custom, where, after 17 years, the farmer had to state to his landlord whether he wished to remain in the farm, and the landlord and he had to agree with regard to the new lease. If a new lease was agreed to, the farmer was at liberty to go on, and cultivate the land as he thought proper, as long as he did not abuse it. If they did not come to terms, then the land was put under a course such as would insure the landlord that the land would go over to him in good condition. He had that morning received a copy of The Agricultural Gazette of England, and he found in that a report of a meeting of the Sevenoaks Farmers' Club, at which Professor Wrightson had read a paper on Legislative Remedies for Agricultural Depression, in the course of which he said—

“ According to the present law, most farmers are subject to a six months' notice to quit. Nothing can be more arbitrary, and it must act as a severe check upon the outlay of capital, or, if it does not, it ought to so act. What a dependent position a capitalist must occupy who may on Michaelmas or Lady-day receive a six months' notice to quit. It is a humiliating position, and decidedly unfair. I maintain that the general status of agricultural tenants has been depressed by this law—socially, politically, and financially. Farming is a very agreeable occupation; but the risk of a six months' notice to quit, possibly brought about by a petty misunderstanding, game difficulty, or political divergence of opinion, is too great a contingency. . . . Two years' notice to quit would be none too long. I must confess that, for my part, I should like to know at least two years before leaving my farm, especially if—as I hope I am—I was farming in a liberal manner.”

In the discussion which ensued on the reading of the above paper, Mr. Cawston, an agriculturist of the district, made the following remark:—

“ He fully agreed that the time a tenant had for leaving his farm should be longer. If a man had to give up his farm at six months' notice, it was impossible for him to farm in such a way as to do justice either to himself, the land, or to his landlord.”

Professor Wrightson, after replying to the various views put forward by different speakers, concluded his remarks with the following suggestion :—

“That there should be a legislative enactment providing that, say, five years before the end of the lease, the parties should agree what they would do with regard to the renewal of the lease or otherwise.”

In the same publication he also found an extract from a discussion following a recent paper by Mr. R. Michell on the Probabilities of Agricultural Legislation, read before the Swindon Farmers' Club, and reprinted from The Wilts and Gloucester Standard. Mr. T. Arkell, an eminent agriculturist of East Gloucestershire, who spoke during the discussion, said as follows :—

“He believed if the Agricultural Holdings Act were made compulsory, together with a two years' notice to quit, there would be little more required from legislation.”

His (Sir Alexander Gordon's) object to-day was to ask the House to increase the 40 days' notice to two years, and it was with that view that he moved the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(Sir Alexander Gordon.)

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he understood the object of the Bill was to improve the condition of agriculturists in Scotland. He had only looked at the Bill that morning, and had not had an opportunity of consulting his friends, either there or in Scotland, on the subject. He might say that he fully sympathized with the object which the hon. and gallant Baronet had professed—namely, to improve the position of the tenant farmer, and give him greater security in his occupation and in the outlay of his capital; but he was not able to gather from the provisions of the Bill any prospect of his position being improved in any one respect. The hon. and gallant Baronet had quoted Lord Beaconsfield on a somewhat similar measure, and he quite agreed with him that there was nothing in the Bill that could be regarded as revolutionary. Supposing it became law to-morrow, he did not see that it would alter the relations of landlord and tenant in Scotland one bit; but he did consider it an unnecessary interference. He knew that at first sight it would appear in Scotland, and would be discussed among the farmers as one favourable to what they desired; but he did not think the Bill was what they were asking for at all. He had not heard the slightest expression in favour of a Bill or legislation going no further than the provisions contained in this Bill. He had often heard of a demand for a new lease to be entered into two or three years before the termination of the old one—that was to say, that the provisions of a new lease should be agreed upon before the termination of the old one; but there was no provision that would carry out that result in this Bill. The terms of the new lease were not to be defined, and what would happen in the majority of cases? The landlord, in order to safeguard himself against being committed to the terms of a new lease at a time when he might not be able to arrange those terms, might cause a circular letter to be sent to his tenants, whose leases were approaching to within two years of their termination, to say that their leases would not be renewed. That would put him in the position of being able to terminate the lease at the time if he wished to do so. An understanding which, at all events, in his part of the country was very general between landlords and tenants enabled the landlord and tenant to enter into such explanations as would, to a certain extent, counteract the effect of such a circular letter. That was to say, the tenant would come to learn that it was merely formal, in order to put the landlord in a position to terminate the lease, and give a new one if so disposed. The hon. and gallant Baronet had said that instances had come under his experience in which the lease had been allowed to run to within 40 days of its termination without notice being given to the tenant. Well, the hon. and gallant Baronet's experience was, doubtless, longer and more extensive than his; but he could say for himself that no such instance had he ever known or heard of; and he thought that if the tenant were to be allowed to run to within six weeks of the termination of his lease without any intimation, in the first place, that tenant would receive a very broad hint that he was not to obtain a renewal of his lease, and he would see that the sooner he looked out for a new landlord who would deal with him more generously, and in a more customary manner, the better. He thought 40 days' notice was more honoured in the breach than in the observance, as would also be the provision for two years' notice. He was not going to move the rejection of this Bill. He considered it would be absolutely inoperative. He did not see how it was to alter the position of matters at all. If it was to become law, he would suggest to the hon. and gallant Baronet that he should add to Clause 3 a provision such as he had already told them was contained in the English Farmers' Alliance Bill—that the notice should come from the tenant of his desire to renew the lease, and not only from the landlord. He would suggest that there be added to Clause 3 the following words, or words to that effect:—

“And provided the tenant shall have given notice in writing to the landlord or the factor, within not less than two years of the termination of the lease, of his intention to apply for a renewal of the lease.”

That would be carrying out the spirit of that legislation which the Prime Minister had alluded to in Mid Lothian as desirable. He thought it was only fair that the landlord should not be called upon to take measures for the renewal of the lease, unless the tenant had intimated his desire to remain. He thought that, so far from giving tenant farmers a sense of security in their holdings, this measure, if it became law, would rather tend the other way; because landlords, as he had already indicated, would give formal notices to quit at the two years' term, and the Act would not have any effect in giving the farmers a sense of security. He quite agreed with the hon. and gallant Baronet that it was most desirable that the spirit of the legislation indicated in this Bill should be carried out, as it very frequently was, by landlords in making leases with their tenants; but he did not think it was a subject for legislation. He trusted, if the House saw fit to agree to the second reading of the Bill, the hon. and gallant Baronet would consent to its amendment in Committee by the addition to Clause 3 of the words which he had read, or words to the same effect.

MR. J. W. BARCLAY supported the second reading of the Bill, and was very glad that the hon. Member opposite (Sir Herbert Maxwell) did not intend to oppose the measure. He thought it was decidedly a step in the right direction—one in the interest of the tenant farmers of Scotland, but quite as much in the interests of the proprietors. In fact, it was an attempt to impose upon all proprietors the course which the best and most enlightened landlords were adopting in practice. The hon. Member opposite thought that the Bill would not add to the feeling of security on the part of the tenant. He thought it would do so in a very considerable degree; because, two years before the end of the lease, the tenant would be aware whether he was going to remain longer in the farm, and whether he had a prospect of coming to an arrangement with his landlord. If he had failed to do by that time, he must make up his mind to go elsewhere. In almost every case, consideration was made as regarded the new lease about a twelvemonth in advance; but that had been found too short a period, and he thought the very minimum period ought to be two years. That necessitated negotiations being opened for the renewal of the lease about two and-a-half years before the expiry of the existing lease; and he thought that would be an arrangement which would be very much to the advantage of the landlords, as well as that of the tenants. Large outlays, necessary in good farming, had to be made a considerable period in advance of the time when the result could be hoped for; and the greater security a tenant had, the more interest he would have in endeavouring to improve his farm. The principle of the Bill was already adopted in legislation, and had been from time immemorial; and the real question before the House was this—“Was two years too long a period of notice to give, seeing it was held on all sides that notice should be given?” He thought it was the very shortest period that could be named. If they were going to legislate on the subject at all, he thought it ought to be two years. A good many landlords had voluntarily adopted a longer period, giving, in some cases, three years' notice. He had no doubt this notice was intended to urge upon the landlord and the tenant to come to an arrangement as to the conditions of the renewal of the leases some time before the expiry of their old one. He believed it would have that effect, and he did not think landlords would be guilty of sending out a circular letter, such as that to which the hon. Member for Wigtownshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had referred, because that would merely be keeping the tenant in a period of uncertainty; and if the landlord persisted in giving these notices to quit, it might be very well assumed that he did not wish the tenant to have the farm again. He hoped the House would pass the Bill with such Amendments as might be considered necessary in Committee. He did not think it at all necessary that the Amendment which the hon. Member opposite (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had suggested with regard to Clause 3 should be made; because the landlord or his agent could easily ascertain from his tenant whether he wished to remain. He not only thought the proposal an unnecessary one, but believed there would be disadvantages connected with it. What the tenants complained of was that they did not know till very soon before the expiry of the lease whether they were going to have the farm again or not; and it was impossible for them to find out on what terms they would get a renewal of the lease. He hoped the House would agree to the second reading of the Bill, as it would go very much to improve the position of the farmers in Scotland, and because it was a step in the right direction, and one which, at all events, would induce both landlords and tenants to endeavour to put the tenure of land in Scotland on a more satisfactory footing.

DR. FARQUHARSON said, he thought he might say, on behalf of his constituents, who adjoined those of the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Alexander Gordon), that they would gladly accept this Bill as an instalment of progress, because it really only touched the fringe of a question which must be considered ere long. Since they were not to have a Land Bill for Scotland introduced into the House this year, he was quite sure that the agriculturists of Scotland would meantime be glad to accept such small mercies as they could get. He was sure they would be very glad, indeed, to be told by this Bill that there was no longer a chance of their being turned out of their holdings at short notice. It was all very well to be told that few landlords did this at present; but if all the landlords were good they should have no need for legislation at all. It was conceivable that under the existing law oppression was possible; and they had been told by the hon. and gallant Baronet who proposed the second reading of the Bill that such cases had occurred in connection with the present arrangements. Under the new arrangement of two years' notice, facilities would be given to tenants and to the landlords to arrange between themselves for compensation for unexhausted manures, which, he thought, might be very well arranged in that way. He hoped that, as the hon. Member for Wigtownshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had only had an opportunity of seeing the Bill that morning, further consideration and study would enable him to alter his views as to its provisions.

MR. R. PRESTON BRUCE must say that he thought there was considerable force in some of the observations regarding this Bill made by the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Herbert Maxwell). He (Mr. Bruce) thought it was very doubtful whether the Bill, if passed, would succeed in producing the good results which were expected by the Mover. The idea of the Bill seemed to be that the giving to a tenant of this two years' notice would enable him to know whether he was going to get a new lease of his farm or not; but he failed to see how the mere notice would effect the purpose desired. The intimation which would be conveyed to the tenant would be this—that unless he made an agreement with his landlord within the two years he would be liable to have to quit his farm; but that was telling him something which he was perfectly well aware of. It was possible that the existence of a statutory notice of this kind might in some cases suggest to the two parties the propriety of negotiating rather earlier than they might otherwise do. If it operated in that way, he thought, so far, it would be beneficial; but he thought it was questionable whether that was sufficient reason for making a new law on the subject. It had sometimes appeared to him that a notice of this kind might be made really useful if it were combined with a simple and workable provision for compensation for unexhausted improvements. If, in the event of a new lease not being concluded within a certain time after the service of such a notice, then a statutory rate of compensation for artificial manures or feeding stuffs used or consumed on the farm should come into force—in that case he thought such an Act as this might really be operative and useful. A good deal of reference had been made to the law in England and Ireland as to notice to quit; but he must say it appeared to him that arguments drawn from the law affecting tenants from year to year, were totally beside the point. The law in England, he believed, was, that a tenant under a lease for 19 years, or for any other definite term, had no right to a notice to quit at all. That notice was only required in cases where the tenancies were indefinite in duration. In such cases the tenant was unaware when he might be called upon to quit his farm, and therefore the law rightly laid down that a certain notice should be given. He thought, if this Bill was to go on, it would be worth while for the learned Lord Advocate to examine the relation of this Bill to the present law in Scotland in regard to notice of removal. That law, he believed, as it stood, was somewhat complicated, and he feared the present Bill would introduce further complications and distinctions. He also believed that it was uncertain in this respect, as to how far the condition of lease by which the tenant undertook to remove without warning was operative or not. If legislation was to take place on this subject, it seemed to him that the opportunity might be taken to remedy any defects or ambiguity in the existing law.

MR. M'LAGAN said, the hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had told them that he had only read the Bill that morning, and had had no time to consult his friends. It was a great pity he had not read the Bill sooner, because he was sure they should have had a better opinion of the Bill from the hon. Member, and they should not have had such crude ideas as to the principle of the Bill. His hon. Friend who had just sat down (Mr. Bruce) had evidently intended to curse the Bill, and instead of that he had blessed it. He believed some of the remarks the hon. Member had made would make a waverer against the Bill be in favour of it. The hon. Member had said that the effect of this Bill would be to make proprietors and tenants endeavour, before the end of the lease, to come to terms as to the new lease. That was a most important consideration; and if the Bill had no other effect than that, it ought to be passed. In regard to other arguments which the hon. Member had put forward, he had to point out that the law had already given notice to quit in Scotland. It had acknowledged the principle by giving 40 days' notice to quit; and this Bill, therefore, was not introducing a new principle at all—it was simply extending a principle which was already acknowledged. As it had been very properly put by the hon. Member for Forfarshire (Mr. Barclay), if it was right to give a 40 days' notice where there was a lease at the present time, and to give a year's notice where there was no lease, surely it was far better and far more necessary to give a two years' notice where there was a 19 or 21 years' lease. The hon. Member for Wigtonshire could see no use for the Bill at all, though the hon. and gallant Baronet (Sir Alexander Gordon) had stated many instances in which the want of sufficient notice was a great hardship. He could corroborate the statement of his hon. and gallant Friend behind him (Sir Alexander Gordon), because he had known instances in which the landlord had not given notice to the tenant till it came within 40 days of the termination of the lease, and the tenant had been put to very great loss and inconvenience. The landlord had even come forward and told the tenant that he had no intention whatever of parting with him. When such insufficient notice was given the farmer might not be able to find a residence for his family, or a farm, and would be compelled to sell off his stock and implements at a great loss, besides being deprived of a home. This question of the tenant's residence was too much neglected, for where there was a demand for farms he might be left without a roof to cover himself and his family. He cordially agreed with his hon. Friend (Mr. Barclay) that if this Bill became law it would be a very good thing to join with it some system of compensation for unexhausted manures that might be made between the landlord and tenant. He would like very well if, instead of the notice extending to two years, it could be made four or five in certain cases. The logical conclusion to which they must come in this matter was that notice to quit should be given according to the rotation of crops. Where the course was five years the notice should be five years. Still, he did not wish to push legislation too far, and, of course, there were many instances in which the courses were not so long; but he agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire and his hon. Friend the Member for Forfarshire that the shortest notice that should be given was two years. He trusted the Government would support the Bill, and would carry it, as had been very properly said, only as an instalment of that large question which was before them—the reform of the Land Laws in Scotland. He had much pleasure in supporting the Bill.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL said, he was not opposed to the principle of the Bill, and he thought his hon. Friend the Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had said enough to show that he also recognized the object which the promoters had in view as a good one. It proposed, in fact, to legislate in favour of what had been the usual practice of landlords; but when they came to legislate on a practice, it was necessary that the legislation should be accompanied with proper safeguards, and his purpose in rising was to ask some explanation from the promoters of this Bill on that point. As the Bill stood, there were only two cases to which the proposed measure would not apply. These were the case of a tenant being sequestrated under the Bankruptcy Act, and the case when the tenant had renounced his lease, and the renunciation had been accepted by the landlord. There were, however, other cases where the application of such an Act as was proposed to be passed would interfere with existing contracts, and introduce considerable complication and difficulty. He would give one instance. Two years ago, an Act had been passed for the abolition of agricultural hypothec in Scotland, in which Act there was special provision made to enable landlords, after losing the right of hypothec, which they previously held, to get their land out of the hands of insolvent tenants in a more summary way than had been possible for them while they enjoyed the right of hypothec. Now, was it intended by this Bill to repeal those provisions? He hoped that on that point they would have some explanation. Perhaps there might be other questions of a similar nature; but he had great hopes that his learned Friend the Lord Advocate would indicate some improvements which he would recommend in this Bill, and with improvements he thought it might be made a useful measure.

SIR EDWARD COLEBROOKE thoroughly concurred as to the expediency of a long period of notice, because it was obviously right that the tenant should know whether or not he was going to have a renewal of his lease; but he had considerable doubt whether that object would be advanced in any perceptible degree by a compulsory measure like this, requiring landlords in all cases to give two years' notice. In his experience the difficulty often came from the side of the tenant, who, when a farm was likely to rise in value, was slow to make up his mind whether he would give an increased rental, and that led to uncertainty being prolonged until a few months before the lease actually expired. The general rule, according to his experience, was that a year before the lease expired the parties came to an understanding, and the lease was virtually renewed at the time. But he thought that if they attempted by law to compel a two years' notice, the results would be that a mere formal notice would be given, and the tenant would be no better off than he was now. Any attempt to force an earlier period than 12 months' notice would not fall in with the usual practice; and, therefore, he entertained great doubts as to its efficiency. At present the lease was a notice in itself; but, of course, it was most desirable that the parties should come to an agreement some time beforehand. That could be only arrived at by good sense and good feeling on each side; and the common interest of both was that the prolongation of the lease should not be put off indefinitely. It was well worth the consideration of the parties whether the law might not be extended to a notice of one year. That notice would not degenerate into a mere formality, and it might stimulate the parties to come to terms in good time before the expiration of the lease. He hoped that in Committee the desirability of substituting one year's notice would be considered.

SIR DONALD CURRIE said, he hoped the Government would support the Bill. He had known many cases in which the tenants were kept waiting until almost the end of the lease before notice was given; and he trusted the Government would accede to the proposal of the hon. and gallant Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon), and give the tenant farmers relief.

MR. ORR EWING said, this Bill would have been especially useful if brought forward a few years ago, when there was a great demand for farms. The Bill was entirely in the right direction, and he believed it would give great satisfaction if carried. It was conceived in the true interests of agriculture. A Bill of this kind was only necessary for a country like Scotland. In England, where the conditions as to leases were quite different, it would be unnecessary. At present a tenant was perfectly at a loss to know whether he was to be continued in his farm or not. The Bill tended to bring landlords and tenants together in order that they might make terms, and that was an object which he heartily supported. Nowadays a landlord was anxious to keep a good tenant and make terms with him.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL remarked that since his hon. Friend the Member for Fifeshire (Mr. Bruce), who had given much attention to the subject, expressed some disappointment with the Bill, it might be well that a Fifeshire man and a Fifeshire Member should express his approval. They did not expect too much from the Bill; but it seemed to him that the passing of a law of this kind would certainly do good by introducing a practice into Scotland of making renewals of leases a considerable time before their termination. He thought the measure would be an advantage to the farmers, and would do no harm to the landlords.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he had much pleasure, on the part of the Government, in assenting to the second reading of the Bill. As he understood the Bill, the object of it was to fix the period at which, if a landlord did not give notice that he intended that the lease should come to an end, what would be termed in the law of Scotland "tacit re-location"—that was, "tacit re-letting"—would take place, or, in other words, that the lease would run on for another year. It had been said by one or two hon. Members that that was not necessary. He could hardly agree in that view. His hon. Friends the Members for Fifeshire (Mr. Bruce) and North Lanarkshire (Sir Edward Colebrooke) both seemed to think that such a notice would be telling the tenant what he knew already, and that the tenant had sufficient notice in his lease. That was not quite correct, because even by the present law 40 days' notice was necessary in order to prevent tacit re-location from taking effect. So that, he took it, the question really came to be whether the 40 days' notice which now was required by the law was adequate or not. He thought he might say that there was practically a consensus of opinion in Scotland that that period was too short; and he might very well appeal to what his hon. Friend the Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell) said in support of that view, because he observed that if the landlord had not made any approach to the tenant a considerable time before the expiring of the lease, the tenant might understand from that silence that he had already notice to quit. He thought that was testimony to the effect that 40 days' notice was not enough to enable new arrangements to be made on either side, under the conditions of modern agriculture. It had been said that the Bill probably would not be of any great importance. No doubt, it was not a large measure; but so far as it went it was entirely in the right direction. The hon. Member for Dumbartonshire (Mr. Orr Ewing) remarked that if it had been enacted some years ago, in a time of greater prosperity, when there was a great demand for farms, it might have been of greater value. He (the Lord Advocate) hoped they should soon see a return to that time of prosperity in Scottish agriculture which would give that vitality to the Bill. It would be, of course, entirely open to the Committee to consider the period at which notice should be given. Some Members thought one year enough, and, of course, a matter of that sort would be duly considered in Committee. With respect to what had been said by the hon. Member for the Universities of Glasgow and Aberdeen (Mr. Campbell), he might remark that he had already called the attention of his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for East Aberdeenshire (Sir Alexander Gordon) to that matter. It was quite plain that there were various particulars in regard to which it would be necessary, in order to make the Bill a workable measure, to introduce additional provisions. For example, the Bill as it stood might possibly be held to override or overrule various conditions under which a tenancy might come to an end—as by a failure to fulfil the conditions of the lease, or by the operation of so much of the Law of Hypothec as still survived, or the compensatory remedies given to the landlord for its abolition by the Act of 1880. But his hon. and gallant Friend the Mover of the Bill at once indicated his readiness to assent to any Amendments in that direction. He did not think it necessary to detain the House by going into matters of detail; because he was quite sure, from the attention that had been given to the Bill on both sides of the House, that it would be put into such a shape in Committee as would give it the maximum utility and value.

Motion agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed for Monday next.

(Dr. Cameron, Mr. Ramsay, Mr. Fraser Mackintosh.)

DR. CAMERON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he had introduced in 1880 a Bill, which was passed in that year, and which abolished imprisonment in Scotland in cases of ordinary debts. He had the honour of presiding over the Select Committee which sat to consider the subject at that time. In the course of their investigations, the Committee received a considerable amount of evidence regarding civil imprisonment on other grounds than for ordinary debt; but they passed a Resolution declaring it to be inexpedient in that particular Bill to deal with those other matters. Since the passing of that Act he had had his attention drawn to the operation of the law in the excepted cases; and he would lay before the House what he thought was a case, if not for the passing of this Bill exactly as it stood, at least for a Select Committee to consider the matter with a view to reform. In the evidence which came before the Committee over which he presided, it transpired that very long periods of civil imprisonment were liable to be incurred; and in order to provide against such cruel prolongation of imprisonment in the excepted cases, a clause was inserted in the Bill, requiring all prisoners for debt to have their cases brought before the Sheriff once a month, and limiting the amount of imprisonment to one year. These provisions had turned out a dead letter. Although on one warrant there could not be more than one year's imprisonment, another warrant could be issued for another instalment due, which involved further imprisonment. That was a point which he hoped the House would carefully consider. In order to show the difference between the old and new systems, he last Session moved for a Return of the number of civil prisoners in the various prisons in Scotland, and various particulars concerning them. He found by that Return that the Act of 1880 had had the effect of reducing the number of civil prisoners in Scotch gaols, in round numbers, by two-thirds; and that the large majority of prisoners still remaining were cases of alimentary debts—that was, orders upon putative fathers for the maintenance of illegitimate children. So much was that the case, that out of a total of 47 prisoners in Scotch prisons on the 30th of March and of June last, no fewer than 38 were alimentary cases, where persons had been imprisoned for the support of illegitimate children, two for the support of wives, and four as being in meditatione fægu, two for non-payment of rates, and one ad factam prestandam. He knew that the question of doing anything for the prisoners in gaol for the non-payment of alimentary debts was unsavoury; and he should certainly not have taken it in hand had it not been for the manner in which he was connected with the Scotch Act of 1880. His connection with that Act, however, had brought under his attention a state of things which placed him in this position—that, however unpleasant and however unsavoury it might be, he could not conscientiously sit still without doing something on his part to remedy a state of things which urgently required reform. Previous reforms had been effected in the Scotch law regarding the treatment of civil prisoners; but in these reforms the persons imprisoned for alimentary debts had been overlooked. In 1875, imprisonment for debt in Scotland was abolished for all debts under £8 6s. 8d.; but an exception was made against alimentary debts. A few years ago, his hon. Colleague (Mr. Anderson) passed a Bill, the effect of which was to abolish the arrestment of wages when they did not exceed £1 per week. Again, in that Bill, an exception was made against alimentary debts; and, lastly, the Debtors Act of 1880 made a similar exception. On the other hand, during this whole period, Scotch Judges had been pushing legal presumptions against the unfortunate alimentary debtor with more and more severity, until now they had arrived at such a position as he did not hesitate to say was a disgrace to the Scotch law. Now, he had not the slightest desire to deprive the mothers in any such case of any legitimate remedy which could be placed in their hands; but for alimentary debts, from all he could learn, civil prosecution was no remedy. As the law at present stood, if a man had any means, by the process known as cessio he could be deprived of his means by his creditor. Amongst the witnesses examined by the Select Committee was a local Judge of great experience — Sheriff Clark of Glasgow—and he said that he never knew a case of alimentary debt in which imprisonment was resorted to in which it was effectual, except so far as it had been the means of inducing the friends of the prisoner to advance the funds required to obtain his liberation. He (Dr. Cameron) knew it had been argued that imprisonment for such debt was a fitting punishment for immorality. Now, it was no punishment for immorality. The rich seducer, who was by far the most immoral, was not punished at all, but, of course, paid the aliment, and took good care that the case never came before the Sheriff Court. The present law afforded no protection to the poor, because a woman could not imprison a man for alimentary debt unless she was in a position to afford him aliment. For, as a matter of fact, if a woman was awarded aliment of 2s. 6d. a week, unless she could pay 3s. 6d. to 6s. a week she could not keep her debtor in prison. The absurdity of such a law was apparent. The process of cessio put into the hands of the creditor any means of which the debtor was possessed; and the creditor in alimentary cases was, as he had explained, entitled to arrest all the wages. But as long as the debtor was imprisoned his goods could not be taken to be applied to the payment of debts. During his incarceration the man could earn no wages, so that the woman was not only obliged to pay this 3s. 6d. or 6s. a week; but if he had effects they could not be seized, and though he was capable of earning wages no wages could be earned. If he were asked what substitute he proposed to provide for what he took away, he would answer that none was necessary. The Act of 1880 placed very summary powers in the hands of the creditors where there were effects; and where there were no effects, imprisonment could not enforce payment. If a prisoner were to attempt to fly he could be seized and imprisoned on a fagu warrant; and if he allowed his child to come upon the parish the parochial authorities would be entitled to proceed against him criminally as a rogue and vagabond. It must not be forgotten that there was another side of the question. The state of the affiliation law in Scotland was such that if a young man of the working classes courting a girl of the working classes discovered that she had been unfaithful to him and broke off the engagement, if that girl chose to swear that that man was the father of her child, hardly anything in the world—so he was informed—could save him from having the parentage established upon him. Under the English law an investigation took place in the absence of the putative father; but in Scotland a decree might be given in absence for inlying expenses and the first quarter's aliment, which brought the total up to £12 or £13, and unless the debtor paid that he might be imprisoned. If he chose to contest the case the expenses would be £20 or £30, and if he appealed they might amount to twice as much. He (Dr. Cameron) contended that though his friends through his imprisonment might be induced to pay the debt, that was not a healthy thing. There was no reason why the struggling mother of a man who had lived loosely should be compelled to pay his debts, and in many cases the power of imprisonment was used as a compulsion to induce the reputed father to marry the girl. If a man had no effects it was formerly held that it was absurd to detain him at the cost of the woman, who in that case must aliment him. This rule had been abolished, and a rule adopted in its place that the debtor should not be released from prison, and should not have the benefit of cassio, until he had given security for the debt. Civil prisoners were formerly careless, good-natured fellows. They clubbed together, and if one had no money he got assistance from his fellow-prisoners. But now a man might find himself in prison alone, absolutely without funds, in a very unpleasant position.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners ;—

The House went ;—and being returned ;—

Mr. Speaker reported the Royal Assent to three Bills.

DR. CAMERON said, that when interrupted he was directing attention to the case of the civil debtors in Scotland, whose condition had been growing worse and worse in recent years. He had mentioned that they were deprived of the rights they formerly possessed of obtaining liberation in cases where they had evidently no goods like other debtors ; and he had mentioned that in consequence of the general abolition of imprisonment considerable hardship had been entailed upon them. The prisoners had been compelled by circumstances to club together in numbers in order to live cheaply ; and when one of their number was without funds he received assistance from the others. Recently they had another grievance to complain of. Since the passing of the Prisons Act, a few years ago, it had seemed good to the Prisons Commissioners to charge these unfortunate prisoners 1*d.* a-day for the use of fire. Now, as the prisoners' allowances, in certain cases, did not exceed 4*d.* per day, and in the great majority of cases did not exceed 6*d.* per day, this docking off 1*d.* per day left them in such a position that they were certainly not likely to get fat. Perhaps the best way of showing the House the state of the law in Scotland would be to submit a few practical examples of cases which had absolutely occurred. The first case was that of a man named Walker, imprisoned in Ayr—and he might mention, in passing, that for some reason the county of Ayr seemed to be the great centre of these cases. Perhaps the magistrates in Ayrshire had some peculiar ideas on the subject ; but, at any rate, there were more cases of imprisonment for alimentary debts in Ayrshire than in any other county. One of the men imprisoned there for 19 months was named William Walker. Now, he did not want to say a word in Mr. Walker's defence ; he knew little about him, and, from anything he could learn, he was not a man whose habits and peculiarities were calculated to excite their sympathy. But his case spoke for itself. He was arrested on Saturday, August 21, 1880, and when apprehended he had a farthing in his pocket. On the same day he applied to the town clerk for aliment, as he had nothing to support himself. On the Sunday, Monday, and Tuesday following, he tasted nothing. On Wednesday an acquaintance called at the prison, and when going away left him 4*s.* The town clerk called on him towards the end of the week with a petition to the magistrate for aliment. The petition was signed by Walker. The town clerk informed Walker he would require to pay 7*s.* fees before any aliment could be granted. He was not able to pay the fees, and, consequently, he received no aliment until the beginning of October ; and he would not have got it even then had he not authorized the gaoler to keep the fees off the first of the aliment out of his allowance. The allowance was 7*d.* with 1*d.* deducted for the use of the fire. Before receiving the aliment he managed to live on a pittance received from a poor sister, who was the only support of his aged mother, and whose wages in the winter amounted to only 5*s.* a-week. Although fees had been twice abolished by Act of Parliament the practice still existed. Mr. Walker had anticipated that, under the Debtors Act of 1880, he would be entitled to release in the year 1881 ; but just as he was expecting to be released he was served with another warrant, and laid by the heels for another 12 months. He wrote to the Lord President of the Court of Session, who directed the case to be taken up by the law agent of the poor ; and, in the Outer House, Lord M'Laren, who was Lord Advocate when the Bill passed, held that the clear intention of the Legislature was that imprisonment in such cases were to be limited to one year, and that that intention would be defeated by the issue of new warrants, under which, as he pointed out, a debtor might be kept in gaol, when the payments were to be made annually, for 10 years, and in cases where the money was to be paid in quarterly instalments, for 40 years. The case was carried to the Inner House—a somewhat expensive luxury, as an appeal costs money—and it was there held that Lord M'Laren was mistaken. They admitted that a man imprisoned in this manner might be detained for life; but in that case they said the remedy for a prisoner, if he was an honest debtor, was to sue out for cessio—that was to say, to apply for liberation on making a declaration that he had handed over all his goods. This case was brought to his notice, and he (Dr. Cameron) instructed his agent to take up Walker's case, and to take what the Lord President of the Court of Session said was the true way to obtain liberation. Walker, accordingly, applied to the Sheriff Court in Ayr for cessio. His agent cited the old law on the subject, under which debtors were entitled to liberation on giving up all their goods; but the Sheriff intimated that that was not the law nowadays. Walker's aliment was 4s. 1d. per week, and his agent pointed out the folly on the part of the mother of the child of paying this allowance, while the aliment she was entitled to for her child was only 3s. 1d. The Sheriff refused the cessio, and said he had no sympathy with the prisoner, even should he be kept in prison all his life for not attempting to pay his debts. Walker offered to pay one-sixth of his wages, but he was asked for security; and as he failed to find security his offer was not accepted. An appeal was made to the Sheriff Principal, who confirmed the decision, and said he could not understand why the man's relatives would not become security. It might be a very inexplicable thing to a Judge; but the man's relatives knew that if, through sickness, Walker was unable to fulfil his obligations they might be called upon themselves to pay, or be sent to prison in default. At any rate, the Sheriff allowed Walker a fortnight to look for security; but he could not get any, and was liable to be sent back to prison whenever his creditor thought fit. He (Dr. Cameron) wanted to test if that was the law, and he instructed his agent to try the point in a second case. In May last another man, a travelling draper, was imprisoned in Ayr on a decree of aliment on the 12th of that month. He received a subsistence allowance of 6d. per day. He had a debt of £100 with a merchant. The merchant joined the prisoner in applying for a sequestration; but the man was still kept in prison. Lord Fraser refused to let him out. He offered to pay £1 a month towards aliment; but he could not find security, and that offer was refused. He was a bankrupt; every farthing was in the hands of his trustees. He (Dr. Cameron) accordingly instructed his agent to apply for a cessio for him. The Sheriff Substitute dismissed the application. If the man could not give security he must stay in prison. The Sheriff Principal, to whom the case was appealed by him (Dr. Cameron), confirmed the decision, and in a manner which was rather amusing. He was under the impression that the prisoner himself was paying the expenses of the application, instead of giving his money to the mother of the child of which he was the putative father, and this roused the indignation of the Sheriff Principal. Again, a married man in Glasgow had an action brought against him by the mother of twins. He protested he was innocent, and would not pay the aliment awarded, and was sent to prison. It was alleged that he was the proprietor of a shop and able to aliment himself, and the result was that he was refused aliment. On the other hand, his wife, naturally annoyed, refused to aliment him; and as the man was without support altogether, the gaoler had ultimately to aliment him, for fear of being held responsible for his death. Frank Cosgrove, now in prison at Edinburgh, was alleged to be the father of a child born in May, 1880. He went to Spain on the 15th of November, 1880. An action was raised against him in his absence, and when he returned he was put into prison. He received an allowance of 6s. per week. The aliment he should have paid for the child was 2s. 9d.; so that, for the sake of receiving this 2s. 9d. a week, the mother of the child was actually contributing 6s. per week. When the case was brought into Court, the amount due, including expenses, was put down at £12. He had not £12, and could not get security; so still remained in prison. Another man was imprisoned in respect of a child born when he was 15 years old. He got out of work, became unable to continue paying aliment, and was put in prison. He contended that if a debtor was in prison he could not be reached by cessio. If the woman was poor she could not aliment him and keep him in prison; and therefore the law, as it presently stood, was no remedy for the poor woman. If the woman had friends who were rich enough to pay 3s. 6d. a week for the purpose of keeping a man in prison, and the prisoner had no friends to become security for him, he might be kept in prison his whole life, and be kept there, not because of any immoral act, not because he was unwilling to pay, but simply because he had no friends and could not find security. Now, it had been said if he took away, as he proposed, the power of imprisonment in such cases, he would strike a blow at Parochial Boards. He denied that altogether. As he had said, parochial authorities could prosecute a father as a rogue and a vagabond for neglecting his child, and punish him with a definite amount of hard labour as a criminal. He had nothing to say against such a punishment as that. What he objected to was the indefinite imprisonment at the hands of an irresponsible party actuated by vindictive motives, whose character, by the very fact of her position, was not of the best. He wished to abolish this sort of imprisonment altogether. The details could be considered by a Select Committee. The next question dealt with in the Bill was that of rates. He proposed to limit the imprisonment to one month. It might be necessary to have a compulsitor; but that compulsitor should be reasonably equivalent for any rates that could be left unpaid by persons whose effects were not more than sufficient to cover the hypothec. The Act of 1880 modified the law as to fuga; but these warrants were of little or no use now for their purpose. He proposed to modify it, so at once to mitigate its severity and restore its usefulness. He also proposed to abolish the Law of Lawburrows, which was an utterly effete process of Scotch law, which was not needed nowadays, but which had been grossly abused, and which consisted in allowing any person who had a grudge against any other person, and who chose to go before a magistrate and swear that he was in fear of the action of another person, to obtain a warrant against that person, who, if he did not within 48 hours produce security against any breach of the peace, would be sent to prison. In such a case a person might be kept in prison for years. Sheriff Barclay was the greatest authority in Scotland on this subject; and in a paper which he read at the Social Science Congress at Aberdeen he expressed a decided opinion that something must be done by legislation to prevent the iniquitous effects of this system. He mentioned the case of a woman who had been kept in prison for five years under Lawburrows until she became insane. No proof was required of reasonable grounds for the fear entertained. The only means of checkmating the operation of the law was for the accused to make a similar complaint against the accuser. In Sheriff Barclay's opinion the law was a blot on the Statute Book, and the sooner it was wiped out the better. He (Dr. Cameron) proposed no substitute, because by the law of Scotland it was a crime to threaten, and he did not think any additional powers were required by the authorities. Another change which his Bill contemplated related to the law of imprisonment ad factam prestandam. If a man was ordered to produce or sign a certain document, and refused to do so, he was committed to prison for contempt as it was called in England—ad factam prestandam, as it was called in Scotland. He proposed that where a man refused to sign a document, the Court should have power to order the Clerk of Court to sign it, and that the signature should be held valid for all legal purposes. These were the details of his Bill; but as it dealt with complicated and technical matters, he was not wedded to them. He thought he had shown to the House that there was need for reform, and that he had made out a distinct case for reading the Bill a second time. If that were done, he should propose the reference of the measure to a Select Committee. In conclusion, he had to thank the House for the patient and attentive hearing which it had so kindly given him.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Dr. Cameron.)

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL, after expressing regret for the absence of Scottish Members who sat on his (the Conservative) side of the House, admitted that the hon. Member for Glasgow had shown considerable grounds for an alteration of the law—perhaps not to the extent he proposed; but, at all events, for a modification of the existing law. It was his intention on reading the Bill to have moved its rejection; because, while it proposed to remedy certain existing abuses, it did not seem to him to afford any adequate safeguard against other abuses. He was a Member of the Committee two years ago, presided over by the hon. Member for Glasgow, and the question of imprisonment for alimentary debts was considered. That Committee, by 8 votes to 3, resolved to retain the power of imprisonment for such debts.

DR. CAMERON: The Committee resolved that it was not expedient to abolish the power of imprisonment in the Bill which was then before them.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, that that was no doubt so; but, at the same time, his recollection of what took place was that the sense of the Committee was decidedly against any alteration of the power of imprisonment for alimentary debts. He quite admitted, however, that the hon. Member for Glasgow had made out a very strong case; and he would be able to agree to the second reading of the Bill on the condition, which he understood would be accepted by the Government, that it would be referred to a Select Committee. He therefore withdrew his opposition to the Bill.

DR. WEBSTER said, he was glad to find that there was no opposition to the second reading, on the understanding that the Bill was to be referred to a Select Committee. He confessed that but for that assurance, he should have found some difficulty in agreeing to the second reading. It was true that almost all the questions—there was scarcely an exception—brought forward in the present Bill were before a Select Committee only two years ago. That Committee deliberately considered every point but one that was embraced in the present Bill. Still, there were differences of opinion in that Committee, and especially upon the point of aliment for the affiliation of natural children, and he thought a strong case had been stated by his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow on that point. In the appointment of a Committee to consider abuses in the law of Scotland imprisonment for aliment must deserve consideration. It would not have escaped the observation of the House that almost the whole statements and arguments of his hon. Friend were confined to arguments for the affiliation of illegitimate children. He proposed, however, to make the Bill go further than that. He proposed to repeal the imprisonment for aliment in all cases, which included also cases of aliment for which judgment was passed, against husbands for aliment to their wives and to their lawful children. That would deserve consideration. He did not know either that the hon. Member had made out a sufficient case with regard to other cases and matters included in the Bill. Full time and full opportunity would, no doubt, be afforded to the trading, commercial, and legal bodies in Scotland to consider the Bill, which was one in which he knew they felt considerable interest. It also deserved consideration on the part of the hon. Member, whether some information should not be obtained by the Committee in regard to the system of imprisonment for debt in England. That question was attracting a good deal of interest, and he saw there was set down for to-day a Bill dealing with the subject. It would deserve consideration by this Committee whether the practice of the law in England was not a matter which might require attention when considering civil imprisonment in Scotland. With these remarks he agreed to the second reading, on the understanding that the Bill was referred to a Select Committee.

MR. J. A. CAMPBELL said, he should have had considerable hesitation in consenting to the second reading unless the Bill were to be referred to a Select Committee. The hon. Member for Glasgow had made out a strong case in favour of considerable changes in the law. At the same time, the questions with which this Bill dealt were numerous and important. Important legal questions were dealt with, and it was necessary that they should be thoroughly considered. He agreed with the hon. Member for Aberdeen (Dr. Webster) that it was to be hoped that time would be given to hear the opinion of traders and legal gentlemen in Scotland who were in a position to judge of the necessities of the case. His objection to proceeding with the Bill now would have been that it was only distributed on Thursday last, so that there had been no opportunity afforded those in Scotland who were competent to do so to give an opinion on its merits. He had every confidence that, with the aid of a Select Committee, considerable improvements would be introduced in the law of imprisonment, and on that ground he agreed to the second reading.

MR. A. GRANT said, he was glad Her Majesty's Government intended to agree to the second reading of this Bill. No doubt some details of the Bill would require to be looked carefully into, and perhaps altered; but in Committee any changes for the better that were desirable would be made. The principal reform which the Bill proposed to deal with was the abolition of imprisonment for debts in alimentary cases. He was one of the Members of the Select Committee which, two years ago, sat on the abolition of debt in Scotland. He remembered very well the question of imprisonment in alimentary cases being before them, and the hon. Member for Wigtonshire (Sir Herbert Maxwell) had called attention to the fact that the Committee, by a majority, decided to introduce into their Report a recommendation that imprisonment for alimentary debts should not be exempted from the Bill. He (Mr. Grant) happened to have been one of the minority who objected to that; and his reasons were that he thought ample evidence had been placed before the Committee to the effect that no good whatever was done by imprisonment for neglect to pay aliment, especially in the case of illegitimate children. It was shown to them very clearly by the hon. Member for Glasgow that no good was done by such imprisonment. In the first place, no doubt the majority of the cases were due to the vindictiveness of the woman, and not to any real desire on her part to recover the money due as aliment. In many other cases, the imprisonment was resorted to in order to force the friends of the imprisoned person to pay the money; and that, of course, was not a legitimate object of imprisonment, and ought not to be encouraged. Then they had to consider that the men so imprisoned had usually no estate or property out of which they could pay the aliment, or, if they had, it might be taken from them by the ordinary diligence of the law. Imprisonment did not oblige them to give up their property; and, on the other hand, it deprived them of the means of earning wages or a salary out of which they might otherwise be able to pay the aliment demanded of them. On these grounds, he thought, in the case of alimentary debts, a very good case had been made out for the abolition of imprisonment. The Select Committee decided on the general principle that it was desirable to abolish imprisonment for debt. And now he thought that the feeling of the House would be in favour of the principle being extended to those few remaining cases which were exempted in the Bill two years ago.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) wished to suggest, on the part of the Government, that the Bill should be read a second time, upon the understanding that by agreeing to that course the House was not assenting to the principle of total abolition of imprisonment for alimentary debts; but, on the contrary, that the Bill should be sent before a Select Committee, and that it should be entirely open to that Committee, or to the House upon its Report, to consider that matter. There were various points in the Bill as to which he should suppose there would be a very general assent—various improvements upon some obscure and technical legal proceedings, which would be quite inappropriate for being discussed in the House, but which were well deserving of consideration in the Committee. But the main principle of the Bill was that imprisonment for alimentary debts should be abolished. While he was perfectly alive to the importance of much that had been urged on that point, and had, like his hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow, had occasion to become acquainted with cases of great hardship in the administration of the existing law, he should not, as at present advised, feel disposed to assent to the total abolition of imprisonment in cases of that particular kind. He thought one matter well deserving of the consideration of the Committee would be, whether somewhat of a middle course between indefinite imprisonment—imprisonment that might practically become perpetual—and total abolition might not be adopted. He found an example of such a course in the clause of the present Bill providing for imprisonment for four weeks for non-payment of rates, and it might very well be considered whether some similar provision might not be made for the case of alimentary debts. He was afraid it was true there were persons who incurred the liability for the aliment of illegitimate children who had not, perhaps, much property, but who, from some source or another, found means to pay their other debts, and whom they could not reach, to make them fulfil their obligations without some such compulsitor as imprisonment. But it might very well be that by an imprisonment, either limited in duration, proceeding upon the order of a Judge, not upon the option of the pursuer in the action, they might get rid of the evils of almost perpetual imprisonment, and, at the same time, preserve the compulsitor, which might be useful, and almost necessary. He did not propose to argue out the question now; but merely indicated that in assenting to the course of the Bill being read a second time he desired that all these questions should be kept perfectly open; and they were very much more appropriate for being discussed in the Committee than in the House.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, he was very glad to hear the hon. and learned Lord Advocate put in his caution; because if they were to assent to the principle that imprisonment was to be absolutely abolished, he thought the poor women, who were the chief sufferers in the cases alluded to, might very often not get the remedy they were entitled to, and some screw was necessary in order to protect their interests. He asked the Home Secretary whether he had looked at the Bill carefully, so as to see whether it affected the law of England?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was assured by his hon. and learned Friend the Lord Advocate that the Bill was entirely confined to Scotland—not that he himself desired to express any opinion adversely to the diminution, to a great extent, of imprisonment for debts in England.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS said, that what he wished to be assured upon was, that if they passed this Bill for Scotland it would not be looked upon as an argument in any way for a similar measure for England.

The Lord Advocate

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, that a measure for a particular country did not advance argument in respect of applying it to another country.

DR. CAMERON assured the right hon. Gentleman that the law of Scotland was perfectly different in respect of this subject from that of England; and the proposed reform of the law of Scotland would not in any way affect the law of England.

Question put, and agreed to.

COMMONABLE RIGHTS BILL.—[BILL 23.]

(Mr. Cheetham, Mr. Bryce, Mr. Buxton.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. CHEETHAM, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, that it dealt with the moneys paid by Railway Companies, &c., to Committees of the commoners. In the case of Tottenham Common, £6,000 was paid; but no one could make any use of the proceeds. A similar case occurred in regard to the Malvern Hills. The money paid was lying idle. The Bill proposed that it should be applied in improving the remainder of the common land, in defraying the expenses of proceedings for protection, management, regulation, and preservation of common land; in the purchase of additional land, or in the purchase of recreation ground. In order to ascertain the views of the commoners, it was provided that a meeting should be summoned on the application of a certain number of them, and the decision of the majority of those present should bind the minority and the absentees.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Cheetham.)

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he was very happy to support the Bill. He had consulted the Inclosure Commissioners, who said they were favourable to the Bill. But the Bill proposed to vest the land in the Inclosure Commissioners. The Inclosure Commissioners said they had never been incorporated for the purpose of holding land; and he would suggest to his hon. Friend that before he went further he should communicate with them upon the subject of vesting the land rather in some other Trustees than in the Inclosure Commissioners.

MR. MORGAN LLOYD stated that in Committee he should propose Amendments to meet certain cases in which the provisions of the Bill would work injustice to owners of sheep-walks with defined limits.

SIR WALTER B. BARTTELOT felt bound to say that the hon. Member who moved the second reading of the Bill (Mr. Cheetham) had made a statement that few in the House understood, and had neither shown the necessity for such a measure, or how the money was proposed to be applied. He referred the House to the provisions of the Bill without stating his views on them, and the reasons that induced him to put them in the Bill. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Home Secretary was quite pleased with the provisions of the Bill, with the exception of one clause; but he did not enlighten the House at all with regard to the provisions of the Bill. Now, it might or might not be important, and in many cases it might be of use, as in the case, the only case, the hon. Member mentioned—that of the Malvern Hills; but the Bill went a great deal further, and dealt with property in a summary and off-hand way. It provided that at a meeting called, a decision should be taken by the largest number of people there, though those people might be people who owned a very small portion of right in the common. Yet they were to bind what might possibly be the majority of copyholders of the common and the lord of the manor, whether they were the largest representatives of property or not. They were, however, to give a binding decision for all time. That provision was a great defect, and would require very careful handling in Committee. The hon. Gentleman did not say whether the Bill would apply to commonable as well as common land. He mixed the two together. Commonable land absolutely belonged only to a certain number of owners, and must be dealt with in an entirely different way from common land. He was not going to oppose the second reading; but he did not think the Bill was so small as the Home Secretary and the hon. Gentleman thought it was. He thought there was a great deal in the Bill which would require revision; and he hoped the Motion for going into Committee would be put down for some distant day, to enable those who were interested in these matters to consider the Bill.

Motion agreed to.

BURIAL FEES BILL. — [BILL 24.]

(Mr. Brinton, Sir Alexander Gordon.)

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. BRINTON, in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, explained that he should wish it to be referred to the Select Committee appointed on the previous evening to inquire into the mortuary fees. His Bill was not framed in the interest of any one class, either of Churchmen or Nonconformists; but was meant to promote the interests of the whole community by regulating, equalizing, and reducing those burial charges which, in many cases, were of a very onerous character. It would deal not only with the fees for interment in old parish churchyards, but also with fees for interment in public cemeteries. The Bill would affect the question of burial charges and the question of fees for monumental inscriptions. It, however, did not seek to deprive the clergy of their control over inscriptions, or to interfere with the rights of existing incumbents. It might be described as a fair corollary to the Burials Bill; and in it it was proposed that no fee should be exacted except for services actually rendered. When the clergyman's time was taken up it should be paid for; but where no service was rendered, though the church and churchyard should remain in the hands of the clergyman, he should not be allowed to obtain fees for matters that cost him personally nothing. Life interests would be reserved. Notification of the charges to be made should be put up in a suitable place where all persons applying for interments could see what they had to pay. Very often fees were exacted according to the supposed circumstances of the applicant. The status of non-parishioners was not to be altered by the Bill. After what he had said on the previous night, he would not unnecessarily occupy the time of the House. He hoped that no opposition would be shown to the Bill, and that it would be read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Brinton.)

MR. J. G. TALBOT, in moving that the Bill be read a second time upon that day six months, said the Bill was objectionable, because it was, in fact, a disturbance of a settlement arrived at some two years ago, and was a Bill which might be called a Bill for the partial disendowment of the Church of England. The Burials Act was passed in opposition to the feelings of a great number of Gentlemen on that side of the House; but the decision of the House having been arrived at, he thought they might have been allowed some respite before the question was brought before Parliament again. The effect of the measure would be that certain pecuniary rights would be taken away from the clergy of the Church of England, who were still the guardians of the freehold of the churchyards, and that their control over the churchyards would be done away with. The hon. Member who had moved the second reading tried to gild the pill which he asked the House to swallow by providing that the measure should not affect the position of existing incumbents. This, however, did not in the least diminish the force of the fact that the Bill was a disendowing Bill. It would come into operation whenever a vacancy should occur in any benefice, and would, therefore, ultimately diminish the incomes of the clergymen of the Church of England by interfering with the present practice in connection with fees. He thought the 2nd section of the Bill was very objectionable. It proposed to enact that the fee for reading the Church of England Burial Service, applicable to cases in which the corpse was taken into the church, should be 2s. 6d.; but that it should only be 1s. 6d. in cases in which the corpse was not taken to the church. Surely there seemed to be contemplated in that distinction a system of first and second class burials. It seemed a questionable kind of arrangement that a Service in the church should be dispensed with because a poor parishioner could not afford a slightly higher fee. There was this further objection—that such a provision would legalize "lawlessness" on the part of the clergy, for, by the directions of the Book of Common Prayer, the body of every person over whom the Burial Service was to be read was supposed to be taken into Church. Nothing could be more inconvenient to the incumbent of a parish than that a churchyard authority should have the power to fix for him a time for free burials; and he did not know what right people had to say that a clergyman should bury without the customary fee. Clause 6 appeared to give liberty to any persons to erect tablets, gravestones, monuments, or railings at their own will; and he had never known so sweeping a proposition made with so little ostentation. It was a matter affecting æsthetic considerations for churchyards, which had too often been neglected, and were now being turned into gardens and places of beauty. It would now be the more remarkable if gravestones and monuments were allowed to be erected without control. It would be a novelty in a churchyard to set up a board stating the fees, as required by Clause 7. Clause 9 introduced the odium theologicum, by providing that there should be no restriction to the free selection of a grave on account of the religious or other opinions of the deceased person. Had such a restriction ever been made? He never heard of Liberals being put in one part of a churchyard and Conservatives in another, or Dissenters in one part of a churchyard and Churchmen in another. It was one thing to appoint a Committee to inquire, as the House did last evening; but it was another thing to affirm the principle of a Bill by giving it a second reading, and to interfere in an uncalled-for way with existing arrangements as to churchyards.

COLONEL MAKINS, in seconding the Amendment, said, it was inconsistent to appoint a Committee of Inquiry, and then to attempt to legislate before that inquiry had been opened. The Bill had been described as a corollary to the Burials Act; but it seemed to him to go a great deal further than that Act. And, within two Sessions of the passing of that Act to remove grievances which some deemed imaginary, it was very early to bring in another Bill not dealing with difficulties of conscience, but touching the endowments of the Church

If it were anything at all the Bill was a Disendowment Bill, for although it preserved existing rights, it nevertheless cut off fees in future, which were an essential part of the clergyman's income where the endowment was small. There was no analogy between burial fees and baptismal fees, because the latter were payable in respect of a Sacrament of the Church of England, and, therefore, might be conscientiously objected to by Nonconformists. This was piecemeal disendowment. The question of the disendowment of the Church of England should be dealt with openly, and by means of a comprehensive scheme to be brought forward on the responsibility of the Government. Seeing that the whole subject of ecclesiastical fees had been referred to a Select Committee, he thought that the hon. Member should be content with the discussion that had taken place, and should withdraw his Bill.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."—(Mr. John Talbot.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. ILLINGWORTH remarked, that, after what had taken place in regard to the extension of public rights in these ecclesiastical matters, nothing could be clearer than this—that Parliament had made up its mind that no class of people in this country should be debarred of their civil rights on the ground of any ecclesiastical fancy or caprice. Although it might be admitted that in most cases clergymen were reasonable and considerate towards the poorer portion of the population, yet, unfortunately, there were many notorious cases in which clergymen had acted in a most inconsiderate manner, and, he would venture to say, in a wholly un-Christian spirit towards their parishioners, in order to exhibit that petty spirit of objection on ecclesiastical grounds which that House had so generally regarded as reprehensible. All the Bill did was to complete the work of the measure of his right hon. and learned Friend the Judge Advocate General (Mr. Osborne Morgan) of two years ago. Beyond question the tendency of public opinion in this country in regard to the Established Church was that the people's rights must be asserted and vindicated;

and it was too much to ask that in all the parishes of the country the parishioners should rest merely upon the goodwill of the clergyman. He was a public servant and State officer—[Mr. WARTON: No!—]—and nothing was more obvious than that public servants were subject to public and defined regulations. Therefore the clergyman, whatever had been his position in the State in the past, must take his account, with the certainty that Parliament would not hesitate to define his true and legal position, so that his assumed privileges might not interfere with the rights of the public. He pointed out that, unless the Bill were read a second time, it could not be referred to the Select Committee on Ecclesiastical and Mortuary Fees which within the last 24 hours had been agreed to by the House. If it were then shown that there were objectionable features in the Bill, the House would by no means be committed to its main proposals.

MR. SALT must acknowledge that he could not regard the question before the House as a very large question. It was simply this—should they read the Bill a second time and refer it to the Select Committee already appointed, or allow the matter to rest upon the Committee only? On the whole, he was disposed to agree with his hon. Friend who objected to the second reading of the Bill. He thought that hon. Members opposite should be content to wait until the Committee appointed to consider the question of Ecclesiastical Fees had made their Report before proceeding further in this direction. It was a most unusual course for any Party in that House to attempt to carry out their views at once by Resolution and by a Bill. He was not altogether sorry that a settlement of a vexed question had been arrived at by means of the Act of 1880; but he objected to the whole question being re-opened by a Bill like the present before two years had elapsed since the passing of that measure. There was a third reason why the Bill should not be read a second time, and that was that in reading it a second time the House committed itself to its principle. In a few years another Bill, a "corollary" of that Bill, might be brought forward, and the House told that in reading the Bill of 1882 a second time it had assented to the principle embodied in that future Bill. Besides, that Bill went beyond the scope of the Resolution agreed to on the previous night. The Select Committee then agreed to was—

“To inquire into the Law which authorises the demanding of Mortuary Fees, and into the Ecclesiastical Fees levied by Ministers of Religion upon the occasion of Burials and the erection of Monuments in Cemeteries and Parish Churchyards; and to report to the House whether any legislation is desirable with a view to their regulation or reduction.”

The Bill went into other questions than those into which the Select Committee was to inquire. It went into the question of the time of burial in the most awkward and difficult manner; and if he was to criticize the Bill, he should say that the clause relating to the time of burial was a very unfortunate, if not impracticable, clause. He thought the wisest course to adopt was to remain by the Committee which had already been appointed, and to put the Bill on one side, as he thought much good might come of the inquiry by the Committee. Before sitting down he would like to refer to two points. First, he objected to Clauses 6 and 9, which did away, if he read them correctly, with all the power of the authorities who had to deal with churchyards in respect to what monuments should be put in churchyards, where they should be placed, and what space they should occupy. Under those clauses someone who had no connection whatever with the parish—excepting parishioners' rights, which he fully acknowledged—might go in and say—“Please let me have three-quarters of the churchyard.” He thought that must have been an oversight on the part of the draftsman of the Bill. Whoever the churchyard belonged to—whether the clergyman, or parishioners, or anyone else—they must have some authority; and the clause, in its present form, would do away with all authority, and did not substitute a new authority. His second point was rather a peculiar one. He had noticed for some years that Bills which were suggested for consideration on Wednesday afternoons always did one of two things—they either desired to take away from somebody something that belonged to them, in order to hand it to someone else, or they proposed to lay additional burdens upon someone. After a fashion, it might be argued that this Bill indirectly did both. It was proposed to take away the fees very largely, and churchyards required to be supported. They had already taken away the church rates; so that if they took away the fees, one of two things must happen—either the churchyards must be entirely supported by the Church people for the benefit of others, or they must fall into disuse, and they must have parish cemeteries. But they could not create parish cemeteries without expense to the ratepayers; and if they were moving in that direction, then he would go further, and say that a great deal was to be said in favour of closing the churchyards and having parish cemeteries. But the great difficulty about it was the expense; and he would warn the House not to do that without knowing what they were about, and seeing where they were going to. Let them understand that in closing the churchyards more or less they had the sooner or later to go to the ratepayers. It might be perfectly right; but do not let them do it without distinctly saying and knowing that such a change was proposed.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, he was more disposed to agree with the earlier than the later remarks of his hon. Friend who had just spoken. His hon. Friend treated the matter at first as a small matter; but in his hands it soon became a burning question. He (Mr. Osborne Morgan) would call the attention of the House to the Resolution appointing the special Committee to which he assented on the previous evening, the words of which were that the Committee was to inquire whether any legislation was desirable, with a view to the regulation or reduction of ecclesiastical and mortuary fees. As a matter of fact, this Bill both regulated and reduced them. The ground on which his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon) proposed to do so, and on which he, on the part of the Government, agreed to the proposition, was the extreme uncertainty and the absolute want of uniformity which existed in regard to this question of mortuary and burial fees. Burial fees were authorized neither by the Common Law nor by the Canon Law. The clergyman must rest his payment upon the custom of the particular parish, and the result was that they had different fees for every parish, and different fees in some cases in the same parish. The Burials Acts introduced a second system, and an Act passed about three years ago another system, so that they had got confusion worse confounded. With regard to the Burials Amendment Act, 1880, he thought the right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Beresford Hope) would agree with him in saying that there was never an Act of Parliament which had so completely falsified the predictions made about it at the time it was passed. He believed that the admirable result of its working was due in a great measure to the excellent spirit in which it had been received by the clergy of the Church of England. But that excellent spirit had not been universally shown. When the amount of fees depended upon custom, and there was no fixed law, there were cases in which the clergyman charged whatever he liked or whatever the parishioners could pay. There had been cases since the Burials Act in which the clergyman had demanded one fee for the burial according to the Service of the Church of England, and another fee if the burial took place under the Amendment Act of 1880. That was what had prompted many persons to give their support to the present Bill. With this explanation, he came to the Bill itself; and it seemed to him that it did not, except in one respect, go beyond the Resolution passed for the appointment of a special Committee. This Bill both regulated and reduced the fees; but it did not take them away altogether. From his own experience the effect would be, in some cases, so far from reducing the incomes of the clergy, to very considerably increase them. There was no such thing as a burial fee which could be enforced in most parts of Wales. The custom there was to make an offering. There was one clause in the Bill which certainly did travel beyond the limits of the Resolution passed the previous evening, and that was the 9th clause. That clause had reference to the kind of religious service to be held at burials. But a provision of that kind had become absolutely necessary. His hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. J. G. Talbot) had said that he never heard of a case where a clergyman was influenced in his conduct by the religious opinions of the deceased or his relatives. But everyone knew of a recent case in which the clergyman refused to allow a Dissenter to be buried by the side of his deceased wife, who had been a Churchwoman, simply because he had been a Dissenter. With regard to this Bill, he wished to point out that it could not be referred to a Select Committee unless it was read a second time. The reasonable thing was to read the Bill a second time, and then allow it to go before the Select Committee which had charge of the subject.

MR. BERESFORD HOPE felt obliged to refer to the good-humoured manner in which his right hon. and learned Friend (Mr. Osborne Morgan) had referred to the operation of the Act of 1880. He was not to be drawn out into expressing an opinion as to the failure or success of that Act. But assuming that all the prophecies about the Act had failed—which, however, was only a supposition—he had always contended, and would contend, that it was the pertinacious and unswerving resistance to that Act which took away its fangs. If the opponents of that measure had allowed themselves to have been won over by the dulcet notes of his right hon. and learned Friend, the Church would at the present time have been in a highly disturbed state. He had seen many curious situations in that House; but never a more curious one than had that day presented itself. The night before a Select Committee on the question had been agreed upon without prejudice to future action, and within 24 hours a Bill was brought on for a second reading which proposed to solve the question in a particular way, making particular and detailed provisions in respect of fees and other matters. Of all the corrupt practices in respect of legislation which had come into use of late years in that House, he thought the practice on that occasion was the most corrupt. Nothing could be more indefensible than the growing practice of bringing the second reading of a Bill into the category of things indifferent, and thus encouraging crude attempts at legislation by private Members. It was an extraordinary thing that the name of the Mover of the Resolution was the second name on the back of the Bill, while the Secunder of the Resolution was the same person who moved the second reading of the Bill, so that they reminded him of a firm which should be known in town as Dodson and Fogg, and at Liverpool as Fogg and Dodson.

The Bill would make a clean sweep of the right of the parishioner to interment in the parish churchyard, because it would introduce uniform fees for all, which would destroy the special rights of the parishioner. [Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN: The Bill does not touch the right of burial.] His right hon. and learned Friend could hardly have read the Bill when he contended that it made a difference between a funeral conducted by a clergyman and one by any other person, interring one at 2s. 6d., and the other at 1s. What it said was that the fee for the full service—including bringing the body into church—was to be 2s. 6d.; and that for the mutilated service only in the churchyard—a bad legacy of an age of indifference—was to be 1s. 6d. He could not too strongly protest against the encouragement given to the latter corruption. As to the provision for doing away with the clergyman's fees on monuments, it was the exacting of high fees that had operated as a check upon the introduction into churchyards of unsightly monuments; and if that check were removed they would have an increase of offensive constructions and inscriptions. Everything that could fairly be asked had been conceded by the appointment of the Committee; and he, therefore, trusted the House would not assent to the second reading.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, no reason at all had been shown why the Bill should not be sent to the Select Committee. The House had determined that the subject deserved inquiry; that was an expression of opinion that there was a grievance, and it would assist the Committee to have before it the method proposed for redressing the grievance. It was quite in accordance with Parliamentary practice to read a Bill a second time for the purpose of referring it to a Select Committee, and this was substantially what would be done on the subject of the Law of Distress; a Committee had been appointed, and there would be referred to it two Bills, one proposing abolition and another submitting an alternative scheme. There was no ground for the notion that they prejudiced a case by sending to a Committee a scheme for dealing with a practical grievance. He would say nothing of the merits of the Bill; but would leave the Committee to judge of them. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr.

Beresford Hope) said that the reason why the Burials Act had not done harm was because it had been resisted so long. No doubt it did take a long time to remove the alarm of the right hon. Gentleman and those whom he represented. After declaring for 10 or 12 years that the Church would be destroyed, the thing was done, and the Church had not been destroyed at all. They had to be treated like horses of uncertain disposition and temper, which felt great alarm at the first sight of a strange object; but which, having been frequently taken up to it, and having by degrees found that it was not mischievous, entirely overcame their first alarm, and became as good tempered as the right hon. Gentleman always was.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY contended that the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary were irreconcilable with each other. It was undoubtedly in accordance with Parliamentary practice to read a Bill a second time for the purpose of referring it to a Committee. But that was precisely what had not been done in the case cited by the right hon. Gentleman. A Committee had been appointed on the Law of Distress. The House had two Bills before it—one had not been read a second time, and was never likely to reach that stage; the other had been read a second time, but was not referred to the Committee. He thought that the House had great reason to complain of the conduct of the Government in this matter. Most sincerely and cordially he wished to recognize the conciliatory and able manner in which the Judge Advocate General (Mr. Osborne Morgan) conducted the Burials Act in its passage through the House; but he also claimed credit for the loyal way in which the clergy of the Church of England had accepted it. With every disposition on the part of the Nonconformist papers to make up grievances there was not one case in 1,000—not 15 in all England and Wales—where any real ground of complaint against the conduct of clergymen with reference to this Act could be shown. After a Committee had been appointed last night without objection on that side of the House, it was not fair to come down that day and insist upon the second reading of this Bill. Everything that could with fairness be asked had been attained by the appointment of a Committee, and this Bill could only be necessary as an instalment—a first step in what had been called a burning question—the disendowment of the Church of England. He could not conceive a more offensive term by which to designate a clergyman than that used by an hon. Member below the Gangway (Mr. Illingworth)—namely, a “State official.” The clergy were in no sense “State officials.” They did not derive their order from the State; they were neither appointed by nor were they paid by the State. When they heard language of that sort used in favour of the Bill, coupled with the fact that those who supported it had already obtained all they could fairly desire, he considered that pressing the Bill to a second reading was nothing more than simple tyranny and insult to the Church of England.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY said, that the right hon. Gentleman (Sir John Mowbray) was singularly unfortunate in maintaining that the clergy were not State officials, when they had seen within a week reports in the newspapers of a clergyman in Derbyshire who had been compelled, by a peremptory mandamus, to register the burial of a Nonconformist in his parish after having tried every means in his power to defeat the law imposed upon him as a State official. The clergyman was distinctly a State official; therefore, liable to the most severe penalties if he made false entries in his registers, and as long as the Church of England remained an Established Church he would remain an official of the State. There had been several discoveries made of mistakes in this Bill which had no foundation, and among them was pointed out the case of hideous monuments. Now, there was nothing in the Bill for permitting any monuments. All that was done in the Bill was the abolition of the right to receive a fee for the erection of a monument. The legal course was to obtain a faculty for the erection of a monument. The clergyman himself had no right to grant permission for the erection of a monument; he might, by custom, have power to receive a certain fee. The Ordinary could grant a faculty in the teeth of any opposition. He would put it to the House whether it was more likely that under the Bill there would be more chance of having the churchyards disfigured with large, sprawling, vulgar monuments than there was now? At present 99 out of 100 of the monuments were erected without any faculty at all. It was done by an agreement with the clergyman; and the more liberal the donation the more likely was the clergyman to acquiesce in the erection of the monument. It was necessary, as this Bill proposed, that there should be some check upon the discretion of the clergyman in allotting places for burials. When they were told that there were no grievances it was remarkable that there should be two such cases as that in Derbyshire, and the case of the incumbent at Helmsley, who not only refused to bury a Nonconformist by the side of his wife in consecrated ground, but went so far as to force the mourners with the body to enter by a side gate, because, he said, the feelings of the Church of England people would be outraged by the body of a Dissenter passing over the consecrated ground. But there were, no doubt, many other cases of oppression and submission which had not come to light; because the Dissenters, being of comparatively humble station, were not in a position to quarrel with the parson and the squire. It was necessary, therefore, to have some protection in those cases. The Burials Act recognized the right of every parishioner to be buried in his own churchyard; and this Bill was consequent upon it, and it would be necessary to vest the management of the churchyard in impartial hands. It was quite true that a great many of the clergy had honourably acquiesced in the new state of things, yet there had been no measure the opposition to which was more distinctly ecclesiastical than the Burials Act. If they wanted to get rid of the bickerings of parochial jealousy these matters should be taken out of the control of the clergy, who had imported so much bad feeling into their opposition.

MR. STUART-WORTLEY reminded the hon. Gentleman that the Burials Act was first passed in the House of Lords by a majority of the occupants of the Episcopal Bench. If the House of Commons in 1880 had expected that the Burials Act would be followed by such a “corollary” as this it would not have given its assent to it. In being invited as a matter of Parliamentary precedent to consent to the second reading of this.

harmless little Bill, they were asked to consent to a larger measure of disendowment than its advocates seemed to realize. The Home Secretary said they ought to read the Bill a second time because it was the Parliamentary custom to do so; but this was one of the instances which proved that there were cases in which even a Parliamentary custom might have inconveniences. If a Select Committee was to examine the Bill hon. Members who supported it would have an ample opportunity of proposing it as a draft Report; and if the Committee accepted it verbatim et literatim that Report would come to the House, and the House could give to the principle a consent which had not been obtained for it in the dark. He used that expression advisedly; because, as he remarked last night, the speeches which had been made only dealt with one side of the subject, and there was a strong probability that material facts on the other side would be elicited by the inquiry. He therefore opposed the second reading.

MR. THOMAS COLLINS said, that no doubt the clergy were State officials; though it was, perhaps, an offensive way of speaking of their position. In the main, they were like the ministers of any other denomination—a religious body—and accidentally they fulfilled certain functions cast upon them by the State. But what they had to consider was this Bill, and he maintained that the Committee appointed on Tuesday night had the amplest powers to consider the best mode of regulating burial fees. He thought many of the clauses of the Bill went in an entirely wrong direction. For instance, he thought no provision should be made whereby 2s. 6d. could be paid for a first-class funeral with a full service, and 1s. 6d. for a second-class funeral with a mutilated service. The Bill, being full of demerits, on what ground should it be read a second time and sent to the Committee, whom it must bias in a wrong sense?

It being a quarter of an hour before Six of the clock, the Debate stood adjourned till To-morrow.

QUESTION.

VISCOUNT BURY: Seeing my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies in his place, I wish to ask whether he has received any confirmation of the telegram which has appeared in the morning papers?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, in reply to the Question asked by my noble Friend opposite, I have to say that Her Majesty's Government have received intelligence on the subject. I will read a telegram received at the Colonial Office from Sir Hercules Robinson, dated the 28th of March. It is as follows:—

"The Premier announced last night in House Basuto policy determined on by Government. It is briefly this :—That there shall be no abandonment under any circumstances; that there shall be no renewal of the war, nor confiscation, except as a last resource; that the disarmament proclamation shall be forthwith repealed; and that a Commission shall be appointed to assess the injury done to loyals and traders, and to pay for it in money; that Commission will also inquire into and report on the advisability of establishing local self-government, and as to propriety of giving the people some measure of representation in Parliament. With these concessions, and an efficient police, it is hoped disaffection may be subdued and law and order gradually re-established throughout the whole of Basutoland."

I have to add that Her Majesty's Government have received with much satisfaction this intelligence, in the hope that it will put an end to the difficulties in that country.

POLICE PROTECTION (IRELAND).

MOTION FOR PAPERS.

THE EARL OF COURTOWN, in rising to move for the Correspondence between the Irish Executive and the Director of the Property Defence Association on the subject of police protection to caretakers, said, in moving for these Papers, his main object was to justify the Property Defence Association publicly in the steps which they had taken. He thought this was more especially necessary if it should turn out, as he thought very likely, seeing that many of the peasantry were armed, that some of the men employed by the Property Defence Association should lose their lives in the discharge of their duty. Some time ago, when the Property Defence Association asked for protection, the Government not only granted it, but promised to give them full protection, and even tried to persuade them from arming their men with pistols; but now, as the Correspondence would show, they were encouraged to arm their men, and, of course, arming men meant that they were to use their arms. Captain Maxwell, the Director of the Association, had solemnly warned the Government of the responsibility they would incur should a collision arise between the men in their employment and the inhabitants of the districts in which they were called upon to perform, not only the simple duty of caretakers, but also to use firearms in case of need. On a former occasion he (the Earl of Courtown) had expressed strongly his sense of the responsibility that devolved upon the Property Defence Association in consequence of that policy of the Government. However, he was glad to see that since the intention to remove police protection from caretakers and houses was first announced, that intention had been to a certain extent modified, and that protection would be afforded in certain cases. An understanding had been arrived at that should protection be withdrawn from houses a notice would be given to the Director of the Property Defence Association. But that arrangement did not always work satisfactorily, for information had lately reached him that in one case where notice was served that the police protection of a house would be removed, the County Inspector would not wait for an additional number of caretakers to be sent, but withdrew the police on the 20th of last month, and on the night of the 24th the house was burnt. The Property Defence Association had heretofore chosen trustworthy men as caretakers; but now they had to look out for men who had the additional qualifications of discretion, judgment, and experience in the use of firearms. They were told it was justifiable, in certain circumstances, to repel force by force, and, if occasion required, even to take life; but they all knew that magistrates had made mistakes in that matter, and that where police officers had fired on a mob it had been afterwards decided that they were not justified in doing so. How much more likely was that to happen with caretakers? It was a very nice point for those men to say how far the circumstances of the case would justify the taking of life. It was said they might obtain additional protection from police patrols; but that very much depended upon how the patrolling was carried out, and on the number of men employed. The mere perfunctorily marching along one road at a stated hour, and returning by another, might easily be evaded by the strategy of lawless men. He, therefore, hoped that the officers in command of stations would be men who were capable of meeting strategy by strategy. The question of police protection to caretakers was daily acquiring increased importance from the policy of the Land League. Last year tenants were told by the agents of the Land League that if the landlords chose to evict them, let them—that they would find no one to take their land. That was found to be true; for when landlords had evicted they had barely found tenants to take their land. Even when the farms were taken by the landlords, the tenants, even when they had the money, had allowed the interest of their farms to go for a merely nominal price. One would have supposed that they would have strained every nerve to retain their farms; but, on the contrary, they allowed them to go in the most careless way. He had known cases in which the tenant's interest had been sold for £5. It was very hard to see what would be the result of this kind of policy; but it certainly caused the landlords great inconvenience. Some active young ladies were going about the country advising tenants not to pay their rents, and they would see that themselves and their families would be well taken care of. These people were causing a great deal of harm. He believed these associations, of which these young ladies were the agents, were very liberal in their dealings towards themselves, and were making a good living out of it; but that their payments to the labourer or the farmer were most parsimonious. It was to be expected that an increasing number of farms would fall into the hands of the landlords, or of the Defence Association as trustees. Those farms might ultimately be taken by tenants; but, in the first instance, they must be occupied by caretakers. In those circumstances, he trusted that the Government would be able to afford protection to caretakers and houses. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had, he observed, in the other House, the other night, described the state of things in that country as a terrible state of things, and spoke of the great struggle now going on between lawlessness and order. The Property Defence Association were prepared to bear their part in that struggle. They hoped that what they had done in the past had not been without effect, and they proposed to carry it further. He did not charge the Government with acting in a hostile manner towards the Association in withdrawing police protection; but, undoubtedly, their course had had the effect of increasing the expenses of that body, and also embarrassed its operations. He hoped that the Association would be able to give support to law and order; and he thought that as long as they did it in the manner they had done it in the past they had a right to count upon the support of the Government, and there was very little doubt they could count upon the support of the public feeling of the country.

Moved for, "Correspondence between the Irish Executive and the Director of the Property Defence Association on the subject of police protection to caretakers."—(The Earl of Courtown.)

LORD CARLINGFORD: I have listened with pleasure to the very fair and interesting speech of the noble Earl on behalf of the Property Defence Association, especially as he has expressed a desire not to make any charge against the Government in the matter. I can only say that the Irish Government had, and still have, a very strong opinion, founded upon the best possible information at their disposal, that it was their duty to make the change referred to, and to employ a number of police, who had been told off in small bodies, for the personal and immediate protection of caretakers for other duties—patrolling and other things—in the disturbed districts, in the performance of which they believed the police would render more effectual assistance in carrying on that struggle of law and order against crime and outrage of which the Chief Secretary for Ireland spoke in such strong terms the other night. I may add, with respect to this change of system, that the Government have been in full consultation with the special resident magistrates who are in charge of the most disturbed districts in Ireland, and their opinion has been most strongly given in favour of that change. It is also their hope and belief that they will be able by other means—means less direct, but they hope not less effectual—to give that protection to caretakers which the noble Earl and the Property Defence Association naturally and properly look for.

The Irish Government is very sensible of the valuable services rendered by the Association with which the noble Earl is connected. There have been services performed, and work done by it, which, on the one hand, could not be done in many cases by individuals, and which was, on the other hand, beyond the power and duties of Her Majesty's Government. In the feeling of gratitude we owe to the Association I heartily concur.

Motion agreed to.

PRECOGNITIONS (SCOTLAND).

QUESTION. OBSERVATIONS.

THE EARL OF MINTO rose to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether any instructions have been given, in conformity with their intentions as expressed in the House of Lords on the 8th of last July, relative to the periodical production by the authorities of the Crown Office in Scotland of the number of investigations by procurators fiscal in each county of Scotland into cases of sudden death and death under suspicious circumstances, with the result of each inquiry; also of investigations in cases of accident and of incendiarism? The noble Earl said, there were very serious cases constantly occurring, and he thought it not only desirable, but necessary, that some such proposal as he had indicated should be carried into effect. He complained that hitherto the public had been kept in ignorance, in many cases, of the investigations which had been made in various parts of the country as to suspicious and other deaths. He contended that in all such instances there should be prompt communication made to the chief officials of the county in which a death took place, and that every facility should be given to enable the public to acquire full information with regard to it. He had before now stated that he was in favour of the names of the deceased persons being published officially; but he learnt that the Government did not approve the adoption of such a course, on the ground that pain and annoyance would be caused to the surviving relatives of dead persons. He had, therefore, relinquished that part of his proposition; but he could not impress too strongly upon the House the vital importance of taking immediate steps in reference to this matter, which he conceived to be of immediate consequence. What he mainly desired to insist upon was, that the chief officials in each county should be instantly apprised of all investigations taking place in such county, and that the public at large should be placed in such a position that they might have full opportunity for the acquisition of information on matters which, to many of them, were of serious and grave moment. He had on a former occasion, as their Lordships knew, brought this question before the House; but the answer he received upon that occasion was, he was afraid, not so satisfactory as he could have wished. He hoped that the answer he might now receive would be a satisfactory one; and that whatever action was taken would be taken promptly and without delay.

THE EARL OF ROSEBERY: I am sure everybody is extremely indebted to the noble Earl for the trouble he has taken with reference to this subject, and the means he has taken, both inside and outside the House, to bring his exertions to a satisfactory conclusion. I think my noble Friend will consider that the answer I have to give him to-night is a satisfactory conclusion to the exertions he has made. Instructions have been given to the Crown Agents and the Sheriff Clerks in counties, and to Town Clerks in burghs, to make a Return of the cases reported to them under the heads—first, of sudden deaths and deaths under suspicious circumstances; second, fires and explosions; and third, accidents. They are also to specify those cases in which there is reason to suspect crime and culpability, and to state the number in each county. These Returns will be open to public inspection, and care will be taken that they shall be brought under the notice of parties who may be supposed to be more immediately interested. As regards the question of names, the noble Earl has correctly stated the reasons which disincline the Government to publish them; and, as regards the promptitude with which these measures I have indicated will be carried out, I can assure him that the arrangements made will insure their being carried into effect without any delay.

TURKEY — PASSAGE IN THE BOSPHORUS—RUSSIAN ARMED SHIPS.

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL: The statements I refer to in the Question I am about to ask Her Majesty's Government have proceeded from the Constantinople Correspondents of The Times and The Standard, March 11, from the Constantinople Correspondents of The Times and The Standard, March 24, and from the Constantinople Correspondent of The Times, March 27. The most important of them is that the Porte had entered a formal protest against the passage of the Moskova with 700 soldiers on board through the Bosphorus. The Moskova is described as one of the Volunteer Fleet, used in time of peace as a merchantman. She was bound from Nicolaieff, the naval arsenal in the Black Sea, to Vladivostock, on the East Coast of Siberia. There is a statement with regard to another vessel for which a Firman had been asked for and conceded. The necessity of maintaining the Bosphorus and Dardanelles against ships of war has been recognized in many Treaties. It is specifically laid down in the 1st Article of the Treaty of 1841, by which the Egyptian difficulty of that period was settled. No doubt the Black Sea Conference of 1871 enabled ships of war to ascend the Bosphorus and Dardanelles, but only at the desire of the Sultan. The allegations I have mentioned may be perfectly unfounded; but, if correct, ought not to be entirely passed over. The circumstances of the late war; the particular relations of the Treaty of San Stefano to the Congress of Berlin; the mysterious accession of the First Lord of the Treasury to the Offices he holds, create in Russia a not unnatural desire to surmount the barriers which, speaking roughly, guard the Mediterranean from the Black Sea, and which a few years back had nearly vanished altogether. A merchantman develops into a ship of war by easy stages. Whatever goes through the Bosphorus may possibly remain there for a considerable period. In this way, a naval occupation may be silently effected so as to add no little force to the Embassy with which it is connected. I have but one more remark to offer. Of all the fallacies the Eastern Question has created, possibly the greatest lies in the assumption that whatever the Sublime Porte is led to ratify should cease to be an object of distrust among the Powers which maintain its independence. Those Powers maintain its independence not for Ottoman, but European interests and objects. There are many instances in which the diplomatic influence of Russia may lead the Porte to ratify what it is anxious to oppose, and what, at least, ought not to be conceded. In the Treaty of Unkiar Skelessi, by which, in 1833, Russia and the Porte were bound for eight years to defend one another—a Treaty which drew forth a protest from France and Great Britain—this truth received a well-known illustration. But I will add no further preface to the Question. I have to ask Her Majesty's Government, Whether they are prepared to give any information as to the alleged passage of Russian ships with armed men through the Bosphorus and Dardanelles?

EARL GRANVILLE: We are informed that a Russian transport called the Moskova anchored at the beginning of the month of March in the Bosphorus with 700 soldiers on board, whom she was transporting from Nicolaieff, in the Black Sea, to Vladivostock, on the Eastern Coast of Siberia. This arrival, without previous communication with the Porte, caused considerable dissatisfaction to the Sultan, and the Moskova was requested immediately to proceed upon her voyage. She had, however, started before the order reached her. The Russian Embassy contended that the soldiers were passengers and unarmed, and that it was, therefore, not necessary to obtain the previous assent of the Turkish Government to the anchorage of the vessel. An application was subsequently made to the Ottoman Government from the Russian Government for permission for another ship to pass through with exiles destined for the Pacific Coast in charge of a military guard. The Foreign Minister objected. We have not yet heard officially how the matter has been decided. There is no doubt whatever that with regard to men-of-war and to merchant vessels containing armed men the permission of the Ottoman Government would have to be obtained. I should not like to give off-hand an opinion with regard to Government vessels, which do not answer exactly to the description of the above-mentioned vessels, without knowing all the facts of each case.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY: Are we to understand that the question whether any communications will be addressed to the Russian Government is under the consideration of Her Majesty's Government?

EARL GRANVILLE: We must obtain further information before we decide whether we shall send any further communications or not.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN asked Her Majesty's Government, Whether the Roehampton Gate of Richmond Park is barred to the public by a barrier across the road, within a few yards of the gate; and, if so, whether it is not advisable to close the Roehampton Gate until such time as the public are allowed access to that gate?

LORD SUDELEY: I am sorry that I am unable to give the noble Earl much information on this subject at present. It is quite true that a barrier has been placed across the lane by Mrs. Prescott, the lady who owns that property, thus preventing the public having access to the Roehampton Gate. The First Commissioner of Works is in communication with His Royal Highness the Ranger, and the whole matter is now under consideration.

LORD ORANMORE AND BROWNE said, he thought that the public would be glad to buy up the lady's rights if she were willing to sell them. He understood that a few years back she would have accepted £2,000—a small sum, considering that the Roehampton Gate gave an access to Richmond Park two miles nearer than any other gate. Besides that, it was within half a mile of a railway station at Barnes Common. He was sure that the opening of the gate would be a great boon to every class of the public.

STATIONERY OFFICE (CONTROLLER'S REPORT).—RESOLUTIONS.

LORD THURLOW, in asking the House to concur in the Resolutions embodying the recommendations of the Joint Committee of both Houses of Parliament which sat last Session to consider the first Report of the Controller of Her Majesty's Stationery Office, said, that they were brief but important. The Treasury and the Stationery Office considered that, if carried out, they would not only lead to considerable economies being effected, but would also expedite and simplify all matters connected with the printing, storage, and distribution of Parliamentary Papers. There was only one other point to which he should allude—it was the promulgation list, to which a noble Lord (Lord Monteagle) referred last year. This list was now under revision by the Home Office and Treasury; and when it emerged from that process it would be found that the names of obsolete Offices and officials supposed to be supplied with copies of the Statutes had been expunged. He would only add that these Resolutions had already received the approval of the other House of Parliament, and he trusted their Lordships would agree to them. He begged to move the following Resolutions:—

"(1.) That the present system, under which this House employs for its ordinary work a separate printer, working independently of, and without reference to, other Government contracts, is inexpedient, and be at the first convenient opportunity discontinued:

"(2.) That the Lords Commissioners of Her Majesty's Treasury be authorised to make preliminary arrangements, and at the proper time to lay open to public competition, and enter into contracts to provide, in such manner as they may think best, for all the printing of this House, other than the printing of the Minutes of Proceedings and Journals; provided that such contracts made, either separately or in connexion with other printing for the Public Service, shall be laid before the House not less than forty days, and shall then take effect, unless disapproved by the House:

"(3.) That all Papers printed by order of this House, or presented by Command of Her Majesty, other than those required for the use of Lords or officers of this House, be placed under the custody of the Stationery Office; all such Papers to be as far as possible made easily accessible to the public by purchase, and the proceeds to be paid into the Exchequer."

Resolutions agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

LAW AND POLICE (METROPOLIS)— ALLEGED DETECTIVE CONSPIRACY.

MR. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the case of alleged conspiracy on the part of several officers of the Westminster detective police force to deprive a man named William Cook of his liberty; to a statement made by a convict named Laurence (alias Briggs) at the Surrey Sessions on the 8th of April 1881, and repeated subsequently to a solicitor employed by the Police Commissioners; to a letter from one of Her Majesty's Colonies purporting to be signed by a late officer of the Westminster detective police; and also to a statement made by the wife of the last-mentioned detective, all making serious charges against the detective police; whether, after investigation, one of the detective officers in question has been dismissed from the force without a pension, and another removed to a different district; and, whether, if the facts be as alleged, he will institute a public inquiry or prosecute the offenders?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, this matter has been carefully investigated by me, and I have come to the conclusion that there is no evidence to show that this is a case of conspiracy which could properly be the subject of a criminal prosecution. I have also come to the conclusion that there has been carelessness amounting to recklessness in proceeding upon evidence of an unreliable character. The parties have committed a most serious offence, and have been severely punished.

ARMY ORGANIZATION (AUXILIARY FORCES)—MILITIA UNIFORMS.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY asked the Secretary of State for War, How many Militia Battalions have to adopt an entire change of uniform this year, and what is the total estimated amount of compensation to the officers of those Battalions at twenty-five pounds each?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Baronet, I have to state that the total number of Militia battalions which will be compelled to change to or from red, green, and Highland uniforms is 31. Of these I am not certain whether more than 24 will have to change during the next financial year. If 31 change, the allowance to be paid to officers will be £15,175. If 24 only change it will be £12,475.

THE IRISH LAND COMMISSION—THE APPEAL COURT.

MR. MACARTNEY asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether, considering the great inconvenience and expense incurred by Irish landlords and tenants in attending at the towns where the Court of Appeal of Irish Land Commission at present hold their sittings for the purpose of hearing appeals from the decisions of the Sub-Commissions, arrangements cannot be made for holding sittings of the appeal court in the assize town of each county, so as to diminish as much as possible that inconvenience and expense which is now seriously felt by landlords, tenants, witnesses, counsel, and solicitors?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, I am informed by the Secretary to the Land Commission that, looking at the time at the disposal of the Commission, it is absolutely impracticable for them to hold sittings in every Assize town to hear appeals.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—PERSONS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he can state the total number of persons arrested in 1866, and the total number of persons from the date of the first arrest in 1881, to the corresponding date in 1882?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he was not able to give the exact number of arrests in 1866; but, as he supposed the object of the hon. Member was to compare the number of that year with that of the past year, he could give him some information which would assist him. From the 19th of February, 1866, to the 1st of March, 1867, the arrests were 961. Between the same dates in 1881 and 1882 respectively the number was 858, 15 of which were re-arrests, making a net total of 843.

MR. HEALY asked when the Return he had moved for, and which had been promised by the right hon. Gentleman, would be forthcoming?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not remember the promise; but he would refer to the Motion of the hon. Member.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked if the occupation of the "suspects" would be stated in the Return?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that would be by no means an easy Return to make.

STATE OF IRELAND—COMPENSATION FOR MALICIOUS INJURIES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What amount has been levied by the Grand Juries at last Winter and Spring Assizes in Limerick and Tipperary counties for arson and malicious injuries; and what number of persons have been brought to trial or arrested on reasonable suspicion of having caused the same?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, "levied" was not the correct expression, because the Grand Juries at present did not levy these sums. The amounts in which the Grand Juries at the Winter and Spring Assizes had condemned the counties of Limerick and Tipperary were £3,238 and £2,013, respectively. At Limerick three persons, and at Tipperary two persons, were arrested on suspicion of having committed the crimes of arson and malicious injury to property. In neither case were any brought to trial.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—TREATMENT OF PRISONERS UNDER THE ACT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, upon Catholic holidays, visits have been stopped to the suspects in Clonmel Gaol; whether he is aware that the suspects are not allowed to dine together, although they allege that the expense would be diminished by one-half, and the meals much more comfortably served, if this were allowed; and, whether it is a fact that, in the association room, out of 107 suspects, chairs are only provided for 20, and that, for the same number of suspects, the total number of visits per day is limited to 28?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he found that visits had been stopped on Catholic holidays in Clonmel Gaol owing to a misrepresentation of the rules by the Governor; but the matter had been put right, and would not occur again. The "suspects" did not take their dinner together in any prison, and no complaint on the subject had been received, except from one prisoner. There were 91 "suspects" now in the prison at Clonmel. There were 39 chairs and some forms in the association rooms. As many were admitted to the visiting rooms as could be accommodated each day, and an additional room was being got ready.

MR. HEALY asked if the right hon. Gentleman would give directions that in future "suspects" should not be confined in any prison which did not afford sufficient room for the accommodation of visitors and for the prisoners during the hours of association?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could only repeat that he had been endeavouring, and should endeavour, to carry out the rules as much as could be done in accordance with good discipline and the safety of the prisoners.

MR. REDMOND asked if it was true that in Kilmainham the time spent in religious exercises was deducted from the hours of association?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he believed that was not so; but if it were, the matter would be set right.

MR. HEALY: I am informed the right hon. Gentleman — [Cries of "Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Gentleman has put a Question, and has received an answer, and is not entitled to speak now.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether two brothers named Daniel and Edward Flanagan were, upon the evidence of one Molloy, a farm-servant about sixteen years old, convicted in January last, at the Munster Winter Assizes, of having fired into the house of one James Moloney, and were sentenced by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald to seven and five years' penal servitude respectively; whether the learned Judge in charging the jury warned them that the case was one "requiring considerable caution" on their part; that "the whole case rested upon the evidence of Molloy;" and, that "it was for the jury to examine, with suspicion, with careful scrutiny, the statements" he had made; whether the said Molloy, since the trial, has been living in the Ennis Police Barrack; and, whether, a few days since, he was accused of stealing a silver watch from a constable, and of representing to a local watchmaker that he had won it at a raffle, and of obtaining another watch in exchange; and, whether the Government will examine the charge against Molloy, and review the evidence, verdict, and sentence in the case of the brothers Flanagan?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the Flanagans, who were brothers, were convicted at the Winter Assizes at Cork of having fired into the house of a man named Moloney in Clare. Molloy was not the only witness examined for the Crown, and no witness appeared to have been examined for the defence. It was a fact that the learned Judge was reported to have made use of the words attributed to him by the hon. Member; but after the prisoners were convicted he not only expressed his approval of the verdict, but he was reported to have said that the indictment against Daniel Flanagan could have been for the higher crime of shooting with intent to murder his father-in-law. It was true that the lad Molloy had since been accused of stealing a silver watch from a constable; but as there were other witnesses against the Flanagans, he saw no reason for reconsidering the case.

MR. SEXTON asked if it was not true that Molloy had since restored the watch to the constable?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he had not heard that.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Martin O'Sullivan, who was arrested on the 23rd June 1881, was deprived by the Governor of Limerick Gaol of his neck-tie; whether, although Mr. O'Sullivan demanded it several times, the Governor refused to give it up; whether it is true that the flags in one of the yards in Limerick Prison on a wet day are so covered with water that the yard cannot be exercised in, and that in another yard there is a closet which sometimes emits such an odour as to prevent the suspects from going within a long distance of it; whether it is a fact that, when letters are stopped by the Governor of Limerick Gaol, he will not return to the suspects the penny stamps on the back of the envelopes; and, whether it is true that, in this and other gaols, suspects are charged for having their cells cleaned?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had directed a report to be made upon this matter.

Mr. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Thomas R. M'Carthy, formerly a monitor in the Millstreet Male National School, was arrested under the Coercion Act on the 21st November last, and is still detained a prisoner in Clonmel Gaol; whether it is the fact that Mr. M'Carthy, on concluding his term of three years as monitor, obtained from the National Education Board a classification as third-class teacher, and was thereby deprived of his employment in the Millstreet National School, because the principal of the school was only a third-class teacher, and a rule of the Board forbade the employment under him of a teacher of the same grade; whether Mr. M'Carthy, having a family of three dependent upon him, and having remained a year and a-half without employment, opened a private school at Millstreet in April of last year, the result being a large and constant attendance of pupils, and the almost complete desertion of the Millstreet National School; whether, in November last, the Hon. Captain Plunkett, R.M. of the Millstreet District, sent for Mr. M'Carthy, informed him that he was doing an illegal act in teaching a private school, and threatened, unless he gave it up, to have him arrested under the Coercion Act, at the same time refusing to give any further explanation; whether Mr. M'Carthy, having continued to teach his school, the local sub-inspector and police dispersed the children on several successive days from the school, and subsequently from Mr. M'Carthy's private residence, where he endeavoured, when harassed by the police, to conduct the work of teaching; and, whether, about a fortnight after the intimation by Captain Plunkett, Mr. M'Carthy's school was finally broken up by his arrest under the Coercion Act; whether it is an illegal act to teach a private school in Ireland; and, whether the Government will now order the release of Mr. M'Carthy?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that Mr. Thomas R. M'Carthy was arrested on the 21st of November last. He was a teacher in the lower division of the third class. In the examination his answers were very poor, and did not entitle him to promotion; but he was not precluded from obtaining employment in national schools. M'Carthy being out of employment, having left the Millstreet National School, opened a school in Mill Street. To the best of the Chief Secretary's belief, he intimidated not only children, but parents into leaving the Millstreet National School and attending his own school. M'Carthy's school was a Land League school, and Land League doctrines were taught in it. Captain Plunkett sent for him, and warned him that if he persisted in these illegal practices he was liable to prosecution. Notwithstanding this, he continued to hold what were practically Land League meetings in the rooms of the Land League in Millstreet, and eventually he was arrested. The question of his release was now under consideration. He need not say that it was a perfectly legal act to teach a private school in Ireland.

Mr. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will now consider the advisability of recommending the release of Messrs. Thomas Lydon, John Sheridan, Patrick J. Craig, and Thomas Dunleavy, all of Kilmonee, county of Mayo, and now detained as suspects in Galway Gaol, the district to which they belong being in its usual state of tranquillity?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the question of the release of the prisoners mentioned in the first part of the Question was under the consideration of the Lord Lieutenant and himself. They had consented to the release of the gentlemen referred to in the second part of the Question.

Mr. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that Mr. Abraham, at present a suspect in Kilmainham Gaol, complains that, on being first arrested and conveyed to Limerick Gaol, he was placed in a dark cell, where he had to sleep on a filthy mattress, which in the morning was found covered with vermin; and, whether an inquiry into this matter will be granted?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the statement in the Question was not true. There was no dark cell in Limerick Prison, and Mr. Abraham had a mattress supplied by his friends, and, when visited by a member of the Prisons Board, made no complaint of his treatment.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a further letter from Mr. Nicholas H. Devine, recently released from Armagh Gaol, in which he asserts that the hospital in that gaol is occupied by the chief warder and is not available for use of the prisoners; and, whether proper hospital treatment is afforded to suspects who have become invalided?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had not seen the letter, but he had received a report from the Prisons Board on the subject, which stated that the hospital accommodation was ample.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he has received an affidavit sworn by Mr. James Dooley, a suspect in Clonmel Gaol, asserting his innocence of the charge upon which he was arrested; and, whether the district in which Mr. Dooley resides is in a peaceful condition; and, under these circumstances, whether he will order his release?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he had received from Mr. James Dooley a declaration to the effect stated in the Question. Mr. Dooley was released on parole on 25th of February. The district in which Mr. Dooley resided was quiet, and he was glad to say that Mr. Dooley had since received his order of discharge.

LAW AND JUSTICE—THE MAGISTRACY —NEWCASTLE-ON-TYNE—SEVERE SENTENCE.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether it is true, as stated in the "Newcastle Daily Chronicle" of the 22nd instant, that, at the Newcastle Police Court, Patrick Murray, a boy of 13, was, on the 21st instant, sentenced to receive twelve stripes of the birch for having stolen four scarfs, value one shilling and sixpence, from the door of a shop, the committing magistrate, Alderman Milvain, observing that the lad had been twice whipped before, and it was evident that he had not been whipped severely enough, or he would not have come back, and he therefore ordered the police to lay on the strokes till the blood should come from the boy's back?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he was in communication with the Newcastle magistrates on the subject.

NAVY—THE "SATELLITE" CLASS.

CAPTAIN PRICE asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, What is to be the speed of the vessels of the "Satellite" class now building, and for what purpose are they intended; and, have any of this class been tested for stability; and with what result?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the estimated speed of the Satellite class is 11 knots, and this they will doubtless realize. They were designed as an improvement on the Cormorant, in respect that they have much more accommodation and two more guns, and that they have a steel deck protecting their engines and boilers. No vessel of this class has yet been inclined; but there are no apprehensions as to their stability.

ARMY — RUMOURED ABOLITION OF CHELSEA HOSPITAL—ADMISSION OF THE PUBLIC TO THE GARDENS.

MR. FIRTH asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether there is any truth in a rumour current in Western London, and which has been recently made the subject of an official report to the Vestry of Chelsea, to the effect that it is in contemplation to remove or abolish Chelsea Hospital; and, if so, whether the hospital gardens will be preserved for the use and recreation of the public; whether, in order to such preservation, it will be needful for them to be purchased on behalf of the public; and, whether, in this latter event, a right of pre-emption will be accorded to any public authority willing to purchase?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that a Committee, of which Lord Morley is Chairman, and the Members of which I gave to the House on the 16th instant, is inquiring into the prospective effect of short service on the great pensioner establishments at Chelsea and Kilmainham and the two schools, the Duke of York's and the Hibernian, for soldiers' children. I have not limited their inquiry; but I cannot conceive that they will recommend any restriction on the present use by the public of the hospital grounds at Chelsea, and certainly I should not confirm any proposal to that effect.

MERCHANT SHIPPING ACTS — LODGING-HOUSE TOUTS AT QUEENSTOWN.

MR. A. MOORE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether his attention has been drawn to the violence and ill-treatment to which emigrants are subjected at Queenstown by runners and toutes belonging to the different lodging-houses; whether his attention has been more particularly directed to a recent case where the baggage of some young girls, who were desirous of spending the night at Miss O'Brien's Emigrant Home, was seized and detained until a sum of money was paid for its recovery, which, sooner than lose their passages, the emigrants were compelled to pay; and, whether the Board of Trade, in conjunction with the Irish Government, will take steps to prevent such violence and extortion in future?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, my attention has been drawn to the subject of this Question by letters from Miss O'Brien and in other ways, and I am afraid it is a fact that the conduct of runners and toutes belonging to the different lodging-houses in Queenstown has been extremely bad in some cases. I have communicated with the Irish Office, and I am informed that it is a fact that some young girls have been detained in the way mentioned by the hon. Member, and a charge of 5s. demanded. That sum was afterwards reduced to 2s., which was paid, but afterwards returned. The whole matter is under investigation.

METROPOLIS—THE THAMES EMBANKMENT.

MR. ALDERMAN W. LAWRENCE asked the First Commissioner of Works, Whether the land on the Embankment in front of Scotland Yard has been let; whether the plans and elevation of the proposed buildings have been submitted to him; and, whether the new street (projected by the late architect and surveyor, Mr. Pennethorne) from the Horse Guards to the Embankment has been definitely abandoned?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: Sir, the land in question forms part of the Crown Estates in charge of the Commissioner of Woods. Advertisements have recently been issued for proposals for building leases of it, and the replies are now under the consideration of the Office of Woods, who will report to the Treasury upon them. The formation, in 1873, of the public garden on that part of the Crown land which abuts on the Embankment involved the abandonment of Sir James Pennethorne's scheme of a street from the Horse Guards to the Embankment.

THE HALL OF SCIENCE, OLD STREET, E.C.—NOTICE OF MOTION.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR asked the honourable Member for Harwich, If he will take immediate steps to bring before the House his Motion relating to the Hall of Science, Old Street, or otherwise remove the same at once from amongst the Notices of Motions, seeing that the terms of the Notice contain grave insinuations against the characters of several persons, viz., Doctor Edward A. Aveling, Mrs. Besant, and the daughters of Charles Bradlaugh, esquire, junior Member for Northampton?

SIR HENRY TYLER: Sir, in reply to the former part of the hon. Member's Question, I beg to say that I have been waiting for an opportunity when the House shall be delivered from the obstructive Resolutions which are constantly before it, and shall have resumed its ordinary position. I do intend to bring forward the Motion of which I have given Notice after Easter, and to ballot for a day with that view. In reply to the latter part of the Question, I cannot admit that my Motion contains any insinuations to damage the characters of the individuals referred to compared with their own connection with an infamous and blasphemous publication which advocates, week by week, the abominable doctrines of Atheism and Malthusianism and the disloyal principle of Republicanism.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)—CASE OF ROBERT WEBSTER.

MR. REDMOND asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, in May last year, Robert Webster was summoned before the Gorey magistrates on a charge of intimidating men from bidding at an auction held upon his farm, from which he had been evicted; whether the case was sent for trial at the next sessions; whether, at the July Sessions, in spite of the objections raised by Webster's counsel, the hearing of the case was postponed to the Winter Assizes; whether the case was not called at the Winter Assizes; and, whether it is a fact that Webster has recently received notice that the prosecution has been abandoned; and, if so, if he would explain to the House what justification exists for a course which has entailed considerable loss and inconvenience to the defendant? He hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would answer the Question in English. ["Order!"]

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. W. M. JOHNSON): Sir, I am sure the House will not consider it necessary that I should notice the last observation of the hon. Member. In reply to his Question on the Paper, I have to state that in May last Webster was committed for trial by the Gorey Bench. At the instance of the then Attorney General, the case was sent on to the Summer Assize, 1881, where a true bill was found; but owing to the absence of some necessary documentary evidence the trial was postponed, and the Crown paid the costs of Webster's solicitor. The trial could not have taken place at the Winter Assize, inasmuch as County Wexford was not included in the Winter Assize Order. When, after this long interval, the case came before me as Attorney General for directions as to the Spring Assize, I found that Webster had not further interfered in reference to the farm in question, and had conducted himself peaceably since last summer. I therefore directed that he should not be further prosecuted, and should be informed of the reason for my decision. This was done, and, in my opinion, Mr. Webster has been very leniently dealt with, and has nothing to complain of.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—BOARD SCHOOL GRANTS.

MR. CHARLES PHIPPS asked the Vice President of the Council, If he can give any reason for retaining, now that the payment on result of examination is fully admitted, a rule which may prove so prejudicial to the continued development of good schools in rural districts as that by which the total annual grant, exclusive of any special grant, made in consequence of the smallness of the population, may not exceed a sum equal to 17s. 6d. for each unit of average attendance, or the total income of the school from all sources whatever other than the grant, and from any special grant made to pay the school fees for the year, of scholars holding honour certificates obtained before the 1st of January 1882?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the hon. Member asks me the reason for retaining the rule limiting the annual grant to 17s. 6d. per scholar in average attendance where the local managers are not called upon for a larger contribution. My answer is, that the restriction is not imposed by the Code, but by Section 19 of the Education Act of 1876.

CORRUPT PRACTICES AT ELECTIONS ACT — THE MAGISTRACY — MR. CHENEY GARFIT.

MR. LABOUCHERE asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he is aware that Mr. Cheney Garfit, whose name was removed from the Commission of the Peace for the division of Holland, on account of his connection with the bribery that took place at the last General Election, is still on the Commission of the Peace for the division of Lindsey?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, he was not aware that Mr. Cheney Garfit was still on the Commission of the Peace for the division of Lindsey. If he had not yet been removed it was through inadvertence. He would inquire into the matter.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether Mr. Robert William Staniland, holding the judicial office of registrar of the Boston County Court, was the same Mr. Staniland who was scheduled for bribery by the Boston Election Commissioners?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES), in reply, said, he had no knowledge of the matter except the similarity of names, which would lead him to the conclusion that Mr. Staniland who was scheduled for bribery was the registrar of the County Court. The matter was now, however, the subject of consideration.

Mr. Redmond

AND MUSIC HALLS (METROPOLIS)—
METROPOLITAN BUILDINGS ACT, 1878, SEC. 11.

MR. MACFARLANE asked the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works, If he can state why the appointment of persons to inspect and report upon the means of exit from theatres and other places of public amusement, in case of fire, was delayed from the 22nd July 1878, the date upon which the Act was passed, to the 13th January 1882?

SIR JAMES M'GAREL-HOGG : Sir, in answer to the hon. Member, I beg to state that in the first instance it was considered that the existing staff in the department of the Superintending Architect was sufficient for the gradual inspection of theatres and other places of public amusement ; but experience has shown the pressure to be so heavy that it has been necessary to employ the additional assistance referred to in the Question, with a view to obtaining reports on structural defects, which, in the words of the Act, can be remedied at a moderate expense.

MERCANTILE MARINE—PROPOSED SHIPPING COUNCIL.

MR. GOURLEY asked the President of the Board of Trade, If his attention has been called to a letter, which recently appeared in the "Times," from Mr. John Burns (Messrs. Cunard and Co.), of Glasgow, in which it is stated that a draft Bill, emanating from the Board of Trade, has been submitted to the consideration of the shipping interest throughout the Country, the object of which is to establish a Shipping Council to assist the Board of Trade in making new rules for the prevention of loss of life and property at sea, and in the carrying out of the rules already in existence ; if it is his intention to introduce such a Bill ; and, whether the constitution of the proposed Council is to be centralised, or otherwise, in its authority?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN : Sir, I have seen the letter from Mr. John Burns, and it is true that the heads of a Bill, having for its object the establishment of a Shipping Council, have been submitted by my direction to the Representatives of the shipping interest for their suggestions and criticisms, and whenever the state of Public Business permits I shall be glad to introduce such a Bill. At present, however, it cannot be considered that the details of the measure are finally settled.

MENTS.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he would have any objection to lay upon the Table a statement showing the increase in the establishments of the twelve battalions now at the head of the roster, and of the six battalions in the Mediterranean, from the 1st July last to the 1st March instant?

MR. CHILDERS : Sir, If the hon. Baronet will move for such a Return I shall be happy to give it.

POST OFFICE—THE PARCELS POST.

SIR MATTHEW WHITE RIDLEY asked the Postmaster General, If he has considered the necessity which will arise, should his scheme for a parcels post be carried out, for the provision of riding or driving, instead of walking, postmen, especially in rural districts where the distances are great ; and, whether such a provision will form a portion of his scheme?

MR. FAWCETT : Sir, in reply to the hon. Baronet, I have to state that the introduction of a parcels post will, in many instances, render it necessary to employ riding or driving postmen instead of foot postmen.

COLONEL MAKINS asked, whether it would be in the power of persons sending parcels to register them in the same way that letters were registered?

MR. FAWCETT : I would rather defer giving an answer to that Question.

DUBLIN—ALLEGED INTRUSION OF THE POLICE.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that, on the 25th instant, a body of policemen again forced themselves into the room where a meeting of the Young Ireland Society was being held in Dublin, and insisted upon obtaining the names of the persons present ; whether the Young Ireland Society is a purely literary one ; whether the police have general power to use their discretion to break into any meeting they please, no matter what its object may be; and, whether he will protect this Literary Society from interference?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the police had entered a meeting of the Young Ireland Society in Dublin because they had been informed that another meeting was to be held. They did not insist upon having the names of those present. It was impossible to know the nature of those meetings without making inquiries, and the police had confined themselves to making such inquiries in a civil manner.

MR. REDMOND: I feel bound, in consequence of the reply of the right hon. Gentleman, to give Notice that I shall advise members of the Young Ireland Society to forcibly resist in future any illegal entrances by the police.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—POLICE PROTECTION IN IRELAND.

MR. ION HAMILTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Tilson Shaen Carter did at any time apply for police protection for himself, or for any additional force of police to be located in his neighbourhood; and, if so, whether he will state the grounds upon which such application was refused?

MR. W. E. FORSTER replied, that he need not say how much he sympathized with the family of Mr. Carter. Mr. Carter did not apply for personal protection, but he advised the Government to have a police station placed in the locality, and that would have been done in November, 1880, had not Mr. Carter changed his mind, and said it would not be required. In November last, however, he made fresh representations to the Government on the subject, in consequence of which a police station with 10 men was formed there.

OFFICIAL APPOINTMENTS—PRIVATE SECRETARIES TO CABINET MINISTERS.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he has any objection to lay upon the Table of the House a Return showing the number and names of clerks in the Treasury, and of other gentlemen who have been private secretaries to Prime Ministers and to Chancellors of the Exchequer, who have, within the past fifteen years, been advanced to Commissionerships of Customs and of Inland Revenue, or other superior posts in Departments other than the Treasury?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I should object to lay on the Table the Return asked for by the hon. Member. I should object to the Return on account of its incompleteness and on the ground that it does not select a particular Department, but relates to the general subject of the promotion of private secretaries, which will be a fair question for the hon. Member to open if he pleases. Besides, such a Return would not notice by whom the offices had been conferred, so that supposing, for example, my Predecessor had an admirable private secretary, and that I promoted him to a high office without consultation with my right hon. Friend, the inference from the Return would be that my Predecessor made the appointment.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR gave Notice that on Monday he would ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether Mr. Herbert Murray, at one time clerk in the Treasury and private secretary to the Chancellor of the Exchequer, was appointed Assistant Paymaster General and Queen's Remembrancer in Ireland, and was now Secretary of Customs at a salary of £1,400; whether Mr. Algeron West, at one time private secretary to the present Prime Minister, was appointed Commissioner of Inland Revenue and recently promoted to be chairman of that Board, at a salary of £2,000 a-year; whether Mr. Charles G. Turner, a clerk in the Treasury, was appointed Accountant and Controller General of Inland Revenue, at a salary of £1,000; whether Mr. Stevenson Arthur Blackwood, clerk in the Treasury, was appointed Secretary to the General Post Office, at a salary of £2,000; whether Mr. Rivers Wilson, clerk in the Treasury and private secretary to Mr. Lowe, Chancellor of the Exchequer, was appointed Controller of the National Debt, at a salary of £1,800; and whether Mr. C. L. Ryan, clerk in the Treasury and private secretary to the present Prime Minister, was appointed Assistant Controller and Auditor General, at a salary of £1,500?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I am prepared to answer, at a moment's notice, the part of the Question dealing with the appointments for which I am personally responsible. It illustrates what I have just stated, that gentlemen who have been private secretaries to Ministers of one political Party, frequently have their merits recognized by the other political Party. Mr. Herbert Murray was, at one time, private secretary to Lord Derby, I believe; I am not quite sure, but he was private secretary to a Minister in the Party opposite; and he was appointed by me to a secretaryship in the Customs on account of his singular capacity and the great services which he had performed. Mr. West was my private secretary, and was appointed by me to be a Commissioner of Customs, and he was promoted by Lord Beaconsfield, for his merits, to be deputy chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue, and he has now again, upon a vacancy in the chairmanship, been appointed by me to be chairman, because he was the best man I could find. I will not go through the details of the other appointments; but it is within my knowledge that this is one of the series of answers which the hon. Gentleman will get if he puts his Question.

MR. O'DONNELL said, he had given Notice that he would ask the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether it is a fact that, for the past six months, during the absence of Mr. Smith, the late Secretary of Customs, on the ground of ill health, the duties of that post have been performed by Mr. F. G. Walpole, the assistant-secretary, to the satisfaction of the Board; whether it is not a fact that Mr. Walpole was recommended to the Prime Minister by Sir Charles DuCane, the Chairman of the Board of Customs, as the fittest person to succeed Mr. Smith; whether it is a fact that Mr. Herbert Murray, Assistant Paymaster General and Queen's Remembrancer in Ireland, has been appointed to the post of Secretary to the Board of Customs; and, if so, upon what ground, having regard to the special recommendation made to the Prime Minister by the Chairman of the Board of Customs in favour of Mr. Walpole; and, whether at any time Mr. Murray was a clerk in the Treasury? The Prime Minister had answered this Question when replying to the hon. Member for the Queen's County; but he wished to know if the facts as regarded the valuable services of Mr. Walpole were as he (Mr. O'Donnell) stated?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that Mr. Murray's appointment to the post of Secretary to the Board of Customs was due to his eminent qualifications for that post; but he ought to say that the appointment was a peculiar one, because important changes which were greatly desired by the mercantile community, and which lay quite outside the ordinary experience of the Customs Department, were either in progress or under consideration. That was the main reason why a person had been sought outside the Department. The Government highly appreciated the services of Mr. Walpole, who was a very valuable public officer, and they had thought it right, under the circumstances, that a Minute should be passed by the Treasury awarding him at once the maximum salary of £1,000 a-year, and a grant equal to the minimum salary of the Secretary to the Board during the time that he discharged the duties of that post in the absence of Mr. Smith, the late Secretary.

CLOTHING CONTRACTS (ARMY AND POST OFFICE).

MR. W. J. CORBET asked the Postmaster General, Whether, since the rule requiring the made-up clothing to be sent over here from Ireland for inspection and approval is no longer insisted on, the Contract recently entered into has been given to an Irish firm; and, if not, whether the rejection of all tenders from Irish firms is caused by the question raised as to the hardship of requiring the clothing to be sent to London for inspection?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, my right hon. Friend the Postmaster General has asked me to answer this Question, I presume because the War Department actually accepts these tenders in consultation with the Post Office. I must confess that I cannot understand the second half of the Question, which refers to the "hardship of requiring the clothing to be sent to London for inspection," inasmuch as the tender from the only Irish firm which desired inspection in Ireland was made on the basis of inspection in Dublin. This tender, however, was not accepted, because it was at the rate of above £700 a-year, or £2,200 in all above the tender actually accepted. I could not advise the Postmaster General to incur this extra expense merely for the sake of the work being done in Ireland.

INDIA—THE RAJPUTANA RAILWAY.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether it is true that Messrs. Rothschild have purchased the Rajputana Railway, reputed to be seven hundred miles in length; that they have paid £4,500,000; and, whether that sum is correctly stated to represent the total cost of the line up to the close of the official year 1879-80?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, it is not true that Messrs. Rothschild have purchased the Rajputana Railway. Negotiations have, however, been opened with the promoters of a Company for completing and working a system of railways in Rajputana of about 1,400 miles in length; but no arrangement will be come to until the Government of India have been consulted on the subject. The cost of these lines up to the close of the official year, 1880-1, may be taken at £8,000,000.

CONTAGIOUS DISEASES (ANIMALS) ACTS—THE CREWE CATTLE MARKET.

MR. KNOWLES asked the Vice President of the Council, with reference to the proposed cattle market and abattoirs at Crewe, Would the Privy Council refuse their sanction to cattle being sent to Crewe for sale or slaughter from any or all of the following places, viz., Canada, Ireland, Spain, France, Holland, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway, or from any other places that have power to send cattle for similar purposes to Salford, Wakefield, Islington, and all other inland markets; and if there is any reason to suppose that the proposed Crewe Cattle Market and Abattoirs Company, which is expected to confer a great boon on Cheshire and the surrounding counties, will be treated by the Privy Council in any way different to the places mentioned above and all all other similar places throughout the kingdom; and, will he answer the question as fully as he can, as the previous question and answer has created a good deal of false alarm and is prejudicing the proposed Company?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the former Question by the hon. Member for West Cheshire (Mr. H. Tollemache) referred to foreign animals only. The present relates to home and foreign animals together. Animals from Ireland are not under any restrictions excepting such as apply, for the time being, to home stock. Animals from Spain, France, and Holland can only be landed at a foreign animals' wharf, and cannot be moved therefrom alive, consequently they cannot be taken to Crewe for slaughter. Animals from Canada, Denmark, Sweden, and Norway can at present be landed at certain prescribed ports, and if passed as free from disease by the inspector of the port where they are landed, cease to be deemed foreign animals, and may be moved to any market in the same manner as home stock are moved. A market and abattoir at Crewe will not be treated on different principles from those which regulate the proceedings of the Privy Council in regard to other similar markets and slaughter-houses.

INDIA—BENGAL—MORTALITY IN PRISONS.

MR. O'DONNELL asked the Secretary of State for India, What steps he has taken, if any, to ascertain the responsible persons for the excess mortality in the Bengal Gaols during the year of reduced dietary; and, what steps, if any, he has taken to bring such persons to trial and punishment?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I have been in communication with the Government of India as to the causes of mortality in Indian gaols, and especially in those of Bengal during the year 1879, and despatches on the subject have recently been received from that Government, the latest having arrived by last mail. The Government of India appears to have inquired carefully into the question, and in their opinion, as stated in their Resolution of the 3rd of February last—

“There is no reason to believe that the prisoners anywhere died in excess numbers during 1879 because they were insufficiently fed.”

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—OPPOSITION TO MOTIONS.

MR. RYLANDS asked the honourable Member for Waterford, Whether, having regard to the serious inconvenience occasioned by the delay in the appointment of the Public Accounts Committee, he will withdraw his Notice of opposition to such appointment?

MR. R. POWER, in reply, said, that he would rather be excused answering that Question until he heard the reply of the hon. and gallant Member for Bath (Sir Arthur Hayter) with reference to a Question of a similar kind which he (Mr. R. Power) had put on the Paper.

Subsequently,

MR. R. POWER asked the honourable Member for Bath, Whether, having regard to the serious inconvenience caused by him in opposing the Motions regarding "The Grand Jury System (Ireland)," "The Protection of Persons and Property (Ireland) Act Arrests," "The conduct of the Police (Ballina)," "The Meath Sub-Commission," "The Munster Winter Assizes," he will withdraw his Notices of opposition to these Motions?

MR. W. E. FORSTER (for Sir ARTHUR HAYTER) said, that two of the Motions were put down for that evening and could scarcely be discussed after the Prime Minister's Resolution had been disposed of; and others were Motions for Returns, the granting of which was under consideration. On Monday he would be able to say whether they could be moved for as unopposed Returns. But with respect to the principal Question—the Protection of Persons and Property (Ireland) Arrests Bill—he did not think it would be reasonable or convenient that it should be withdrawn, as several hon. Gentlemen desired to take part in the discussion of it.

MR. R. POWER: My answer, then, to the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), in regard to the withdrawal of my Motion, will be the same as that just given to me by the Chief Secretary for Ireland.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—OMAGH GAOL.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, in view of the serious defect in the sanitary arrangements of Omagh Gaol, disclosed in the Report of Dr. Cruise, he will order an inspection to be made into the condition of all gaols where prisoners under the Coercion Act are at present detained in Ireland?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he had arranged for an inquiry to be made into the sanitary condition of all gaols in which prisoners were detained under the Coercion Act. Omagh Gaol was in a satisfactory state on the whole, but that was not the case as regards that part of the prison in which the "suspects" were confined.

STREET ACCIDENTS (METROPOLIS).

MR. GOURLEY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it be correct that the number of fatal accidents in the streets of the Metropolis amounted last year to two hundred and fifty-two; and, if so, what measures he intends to adopt in order that street traffic may be more efficiently regulated, and this enormous loss of life lessened?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that the Home Office had done all they could with the view of lessening the number of street accidents in the Metropolis, by sending Circulars on the subject to Vestries and other local authorities, and more or less good had resulted. The accidents were less in number than was the case some years ago in proportion to the population. It was absolutely impossible entirely to prevent these accidents; and he might remark that one-fourth of the accidents that did occur happened to the drivers of vehicles themselves and persons in charge of horses, and not to passengers.

INLAND REVENUE—DUTY ON SILVER PLATE.

SIR JOSEPH M'KENNA asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, with a view to the ultimate abolition of the Duty on silver plate and for the purpose of alleviating the present depression in the manufacturing trade in silver goods, he would take into consideration the expediency of permitting new silver plate to be "hall-marked" without Duty, on the defacement and reduction to the condition of bar silver of an equal weight of old hall-marked Duty-paid plate?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE), in reply, said, that the question of the abolition of the duty on silver plate was difficult and complicated. He could not say that he was prepared to adopt the suggestion of the hon. Member conveyed in the Question; but if the hon. Gentleman wished to have his views carefully considered, he would recommend him to send him a written statement, setting forth the recommendations he wished to make, and the reasons by which he supported them.

SOUTH WALES—ROAD ACTS—MAIN-TENANCE OF MAIN ROADS.

SIR JOSEPH BAILEY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, in relieving the ratepayers from the charge of maintaining main roads, it is his intention to include in such measure of relief the six counties of South Wales now administered under "The South Wales Roads Act, 1844," 7th and 8th Vic. c. 91?

MR. GLADSTONE, in reply, said, that the case of the six Welsh counties referred to by the hon. Member was peculiar, and would require special attention when the whole subject was considered.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE—THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME — CROWN RIGHTS TO THE FORESHORE.

MR. HICKS asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he will at once take steps to have the rights of the Crown to the foreshore at Dover decided by a Court of Law; and, whether he will apply for an injunction to restrain the persons, if any, who are making, or are about to make, a tunnel under such foreshore until the rights of the Crown shall have been determined?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, by the desire of the Prime Minister, and with the permission of the hon. Member, I will answer this Question. I have been in communication with the hon. Baronet the Member for Hythe and Chairman of the South-Eastern Railway Company (Sir Edward Watkin) with respect to this matter, and the hon. Baronet has very frankly offered to place at the disposal of the Government all the documents upon which he founds his claim to the foreshore. I have directed the legal advisers of the Board of Trade to confer with the solicitors of the hon. Baronet in the matter and to report upon the case. As soon as they have been able to do this the case will be submitted to the Law Officers of the Crown for their opinion. Until that opinion has been received I cannot say what course the Government will take in the matter; but, in the meantime, I may add that the hon. Baronet has been warned that the Government claim the bed of the sea below low water mark and for three miles beyond, and that they will hold themselves free to use any powers at their disposal in such a manner as Parliament may decide, or as the general interests of the country may seem to them to require.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE FINANCIAL STATEMENT—LOCAL TAXATION.

MR. PELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether any general statement of Local Taxation and Finance will be made this year in connection with the Budget, so as to bring before Parliament the entire amount of Taxation, Local and Imperial, now borne by the Country?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE), in reply, said, it would probably be his duty, when the time for the Financial Statement arrived, to refer to the subject of local expenditure; but he could not say that it would be convenient, or even possible, to convey to the House on that occasion any very full or particular view of the subject, which was extremely important, and would require special attention.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether or not the "Child's Class Book" will be required for examination up to April 1883?

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, that as soon as the New Code became law, which would be in a few days, the Department would not require the production of the Child's School Book as a condition of the payment of a grant.

ISLAND OF CYPRUS—ELECTION OF MEMBERS TO LEGISLATIVE ASSEMBLY.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he had received a telegram from the leading inhabitants of Cyprus asking him to obtain from the Colonial Office the postponement of the impending changes in regard to the election of Members to the Legislative Assembly of the Island, which were described as annihilating the rights of the Mohammedan inhabitants. They asked that the changes should be postponed till the arrival of Papers which were now on their way.

MR. COURTNEY, in reply, said, he could not give any promise as to the indefinite postponement of the question. It had been hanging fire for a long time; but any representation from the inhabitants of the Island would be carefully considered.

SOUTH AFRICA—STATE OF AFFAIRS IN BASUTOLAND.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON asked whether the Government had received any information as to the state of affairs in Basutoland?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, we have received by telegram from the Governor of the Cape the following summary of the statement of the Prime Minister in the Cape Parliament:—

“ That there shall be no abandonment under any circumstances; that there shall be no renewal of the war, nor confiscation, except as a last resource; that the disarmament proclamation shall be forthwith repealed; and that a Commission shall be appointed to assess the injury done to loyals and traders, and to pay for it in money; that Commission will also inquire into and report on the advisability of establishing local self-government, and as to propriety of giving the people some measure of representation in Parliament. With these concessions, and an efficient police, it is hoped disaffection may be subdued, and law and order gradually re-established throughout the whole of Basutoland.”

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE DEBATE OF TUESDAY LAST—PERSONAL EXPLANATIONS.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY asked the permission of the House to say a few words of personal explanation. The day before yesterday the hon. Member for Westmeath (Mr. T. D. Sullivan), in his speech, attempted to justify the practice of “Boycotting,” which, he thought, was a very cruel and wicked practice, and he took exception to it, saying that it should not be encouraged, and ought to be noticed by the House. He was reported by one of the Irish journals having a seat in the Gallery as having stated it was a matter the Government should take notice of. This was said to be followed by Ministerial cheers. Such a statement, which pointed to the arrest of the hon. Member, would be of no consequence in an English journal; but in an Irish paper, during the existence of the present intimidation, it was of consequence. He now wished to give the statement a flat contradiction.

MR. RAIKES said, he rose to make a personal explanation. In the course of the debate last Monday week he had stated that the Prime Minister had, in opposing the Divorce Bill of 1857, spoken at such a length that the report of his speech filled 15 columns of The Times. He merely related what he had heard mentioned in conversation scores of times; but, the right hon. Gentleman having taken exception to his statement, he had looked into the newspapers, and had found that, as a matter of fact, the current notion was without foundation, and he thereupon wrote to the right hon. Gentleman unreservedly withdrawing his statement, and expressing his regret that he had made it. He should not have considered the matter sufficiently important to warrant him in obtruding it upon the House; but as he understood that the right hon. Gentleman felt somewhat aggrieved by the statement, he felt it due to him to say this now. He hoped, however, that what he said now would not tend to diminish the credit of the right hon. Gentleman for the vigorous and pertinacious opposition which he offered to the Divorce Bill, which he had always regarded as the most praiseworthy part of the right hon. Gentleman's Parliamentary career.

EAST CORNWALL ELECTION—SPEECH OF MR. COURTNEY.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he understood the next Question on the Paper was not to be put. He wished, however, to make a reference to it, for it seemed to contain an imputation on his hon. Friend the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies. The Question was one that had been given Notice of by the hon. Member for Louth (Mr. Callan) with regard to the speech delivered by his hon. Friend (Mr. Courtney) in Cornwall a few days ago. He did not wish to give any countenance to the idea that an hon. Member, who was also a Member of the Government, in speaking anywhere in the country was to be regarded as the organ of the Government, or was bound to ascertain that everything he was going to say was approved by the Prime Minister or by the Cabinet. No such censorship would be endured by independent and

hon. Members. There was, however, a passage in his hon. Friend's speech which had attracted much attention. This was a passage in which his hon. Friend said—

“They would never have Ireland happy until its people were given the power of legislating for themselves in purely domestic affairs.”

To make the quotation a perfectly fair and complete one there should be added the following words, also reported in the Times :—

“The way in which to do that was to give them that county government which it was proposed to establish in England.”

MR. CALLAN desired to ask the Prime Minister the latter part of his Question, as to Whether his attention had been directed to a speech of the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, which, according to the “Daily News,” was to the effect that—

“The prevailing discontent in Ireland had been induced by years of misrule, and, although there was a common Parliament, and although England was governed according to English ideas, and Scotland according to Scotch ideas, the same privilege had not been accorded to Ireland. Until we learned to appreciate the principle that it was not enough to rule people according to our own ideas of what was best for them we should not succeed in conciliating Ireland ;”

whether these statements express correctly the views and policy of Her Majesty's Government ; and, whether they intend to give them effect during the present Session by introducing a comprehensive measure of Home Rule for Ireland, in relation to the “purely domestic affairs of that Country,” or do they propose introducing a more stringent measure of Coercion ?

MR. GLADSTONE : Sir, with regard to the passage referred to by the hon. Gentleman, I must say that I was in hopes that he rose to offer some apology to the House and to my hon. Friend for having been unwittingly the means of giving a representation of the views of my hon. Friend which was totally inaccurate. With regard to the speech which purported to have been delivered by my hon. Friend, it falls within the description which I have just given. At the same time, I believe it to be a reproduction in the main of what has been said by Mr. Fox and partly of what I have heard myself said by Earl Russell, and I am not aware that there is anything to be ashamed of in it. My hon. Friend did not go down to Cornwall as the organ of the Cabinet to express the views of the Government, but simply to express his own views. With regard to the last paragraph of the Question, the Government have no intention of doing either one or the other. With regard to providing for the fuller management of local affairs in Ireland, that is a subject which they will be most anxious to deal with when the opportunity offers, when the state of Business permits. With regard to any measure which will be required for the maintenance of law and order, of course it will be the duty of the Government to consider and propose them when the time for considering and proposing them arrives. The time for considering what is to follow the present Act has obviously not arrived. We are now in the month of March, and the Act now in force subsists until the 30th September, and the circumstances of Ireland are circumstances which might vary most materially from month to month, and almost from week to week.

MR. CALLAN said, he wished to add something to the quotation he had made from the speech of Mr. Courtney, and the addition came into his possession through the kindness of the Lord Mayor of Dublin. It was for the House to say whether this addition made the statement untrue. The sentence that followed was—“How can they suppose that the democracy of Ireland will be satisfied until they enjoy—[Cries of “Order!”]

MR. SPEAKER : Is the hon. Member offering a Question ?

MR. CALLAN said, he was explaining his Question. The quotation continued—“Until they enjoyed some sort of Government themselves ;” and then the report ended and there was nothing more.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that it was quite evident that the hon. Member had quoted from a report which was extremely succinct and imperfect, instead of going to the report in The Standard, which was more accurate and full.

MR. CALLAN : I gave the quotation from the report in The Times.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881— ARREARS OF RENTS.

MR. T. A. DICKSON asked the Prime Minister, If the Government would, during the Recess, take into consideration the question of arrears of rent in Ireland, and on the re-assembling of Parliament propose some scheme by which that serious embarrassment in the working of the Land Act might be removed, and tenants saved from eviction?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, I can assure my hon. Friend that the question of arrears, in all its gravity and difficulty, will be carefully considered during the Recess. It would not be possible for me to pledge myself to more than that at the present moment.

PARLIAMENT—BUSINESS OF THE
TION)—AMENDMENTS.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I wish to ask you a Question, Sir, as to the manner in which you propose to put the Question on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott). I understand that you will put the Question in such a way as to exclude as few as possible of the subsequent Amendments. I have an Amendment on the Paper of some little importance which proposes to leave out the words "Mr. Speaker," in order to raise the very important question whether or not this important power should be exercised by Mr. Speaker and the Chairman of Ways and Means or by a Minister of the Crown. I wish to ask you, Whether, if the form in which the Question was put precluded my Amendment, it would be competent for me afterwards to raise the Question in another form?

MR. SPEAKER: The Question that will have to be submitted to the House on the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton is that the words "when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker" stand part of the Question. If the House think proper to resolve that those words stand part of the Question, the Amendment proposed to be moved by the noble Lord to omit the words "Mr. Speaker" will come too late, and cannot be put, because the House will have already affirmed that those words stand part of the Question. If the Amendment of the noble Lord had been on the Paper before I put the Question to the House, I should have put it so as to admit of the noble Lord's Amendment; but now his Amendment cannot be put, unless the House thinks proper to withdraw both the Motion and the Resolution now before the House.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: In those circumstances, I beg to give Notice that on the Amendment of the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) I shall propose to insert, after the words "Mr. Speaker," the words "after appeal by a Minister of the Crown, or by the Member in charge of the subject under discussion."

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [20th February],

"That when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker, or to the Chairman of a Committee of the whole House, during any Debate, to be the evident sense of the House, or of the Committee, that the Question be now put, he may so inform the House or the Committee; and, if a Motion be made 'That the Question be now put,' Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman, shall forthwith put such Question; and, if the same be decided in the affirmative, the Question under discussion shall be put forthwith: Provided that the Question shall not be decided in the affirmative, if a Division be taken, unless it shall appear to have been supported by more than two hundred Members, or unless it shall appear to have been opposed by less than forty Members and supported by more than one hundred Members."—(Mr. Gladstone.)

And which Amendment was,

—instead thereof.

Question again proposed, "That the words 'when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker,' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. JOHN BRIGHT: Sir, I may say with the greatest sincerity that I am very sorry that this important and prolonged debate should not have concluded on Monday last; because, if it had been so concluded, I should have been spared the task and the duty of making the observations which I am about to offer to the House. I promise, however, on an occasion of this kind, when we are all endeavouring to be virtuous, not to say more than is necessary, and not to keep the attention of the House from other speakers who may wish to follow me. I may begin by saying that, with regard to hon. Members opposite, most of whose speeches I have heard, I am very much surprised at the hostility which they have shown from the beginning to the proposal before us. It seems to me, from the course they have taken in the matter—although, doubtless, they will not agree with me upon the point—as if they had, in their own idea, only a very remote prospect of ever taking their seats on this side of the House. I have arrived at that conclusion because they seem to have no special interest in this question—a question which does not affect the Government of the day any more than it will affect succeeding Governments. I must say that, had I been on that side of the House, and any Government with a powerful majority at its back had proposed an Amendment of the Procedure of this House of this kind, I should have been very anxious to give them all the support in my power, in the hope that it might be of advantage to my own Party if we should at any time afterwards be allowed to take our seats upon these Benches. I am surprised also at another thing, and that is the almost universal, and ingenious exaggeration as to the probable effects of this Rule which has been imported into this discussion. I should like to ask whether there is any Member of this House who does not admit that the House of Commons is in great difficulties with regard to the management of its Business? No one can deny for a moment that the House is in such difficulties—indeed, all the speeches made on the other side of the House have admitted it, and some of them to a very great extent—and I believe there is a consciousness in the minds of all men in the House, even those who do not want any amendment, that the House suffers materially under the difficulties which press upon it, and the attempts to transact Business which the country naturally expects of it. Well, if that be so, then I should say that we ought to be also agreed that some real and effective remedy for those difficulties is called for. Do not let it be supposed that it is a matter which affects merely some dozen Gentlemen sitting on these Benches. It is one that affected the late Government equally with ourselves; and the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) knows perfectly well what difficulties he and his Colleagues had to contend with when they were in Office—difficulties which are growing from year to year. I can speak with impartiality on this question, because, although I have been in this House nearly as long as any Member in it, no one will charge me with having at any time unduly prolonged a debate, or with having offered anything like obstruction to any measure which has been proposed by either a Government or by a private Member of this House. Neither can it be supposed that it much concerns me what happens with regard to the prosecution of Business under the present Government. In speaking on this subject, therefore, I am entitled to regard myself as being as impartial in this matter as any hon. Member in this House. In my opinion, there is no doubt whatever that the time has arrived when, unless the House does something to free itself from its difficulties, it will stand before the country as having greatly neglected its duties. That the House admits fully the difficulty of its position is abundantly clear from the fact that it has, from time to time, appointed Committees to examine into the cause of and the remedy for that difficulty. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate) has sat upon some of those Committees, and has complained a score of times to the House of the dangers that he saw ahead with regard to this matter. Committees so numerous have been appointed to consider this Question that no one can tell us how many of them have sat. A Member of the Government has stated that 14 such Committees have sat; while an hon. Member opposite tells us that he believes there have been at least 20 appointed. But, whatever be the number of such Committees, at all events many of them have sat and have discussed this question, and they have had Members of this House, of authority, called before them, who have given evidence, and among those Members there have been at least three Speakers of this House, and yet, after all, they have been unable to come to any definite conclusion on the subject, which they could offer with confidence to the judgment of the House. If, therefore, all these Committees are of opinion that something required to be done in the matter, and yet found a difficulty in recommending what should be done, is it not certain that throughout the constituencies there is now a universal complaint which answers to our own judgment upon this matter? Hon. Members opposite, when they are speaking to their constituents, taunt the Liberal Government with having done nothing, and the Liberal Government, when it is not a Government, but is the Party in Opposition, taunt the right hon. Gentleman opposite and his Friends with having done nothing. I do not say that either Party does its duty as well as it might do it; but we are all conscious that no Ministry in this House, with our present Rules, with our present habits, and under recent circumstances with which we are all familiar, can do what the constituencies expect from the Administration which it has placed in Office. The main question before us, therefore, is whether what has been proposed is likely to be effectual or not in relieving us from our difficulties—I refer to the Resolution which has been brought before us by the First Minister with regard to what is called the clôture, and which, in fact, proposes that we shall adopt something like it. For my own part, if I were not on this Bench, I should say openly what I now say privately—that I think that the measure so proposed, if it has any failing at all, falls short in this, that it is not sufficiently comprehensive and sufficiently stringent. I think that I shall be able to convince some hon. Members of the truth of what I say before I have done. The Resolution, to my mind, is a very limited and a very moderate one. It proposes that if a debate be unduly prolonged—and I must have an honest interpretation given to that phrase—unduly prolonged and obstructed, that there shall be a mode appointed by which the House may bring to some definite conclusion the Business upon which it is engaged. What is the proposition which the Government have made? It is a very small one. It is to this effect, that when a number of Members, under 40—that is, less than a quorum of the House—continue to speak, without any moderation and limit of time, and there is a general weariness in the House, and a sense that the debate might rightly be closed, then, if there are more than 100 Members present who wish the debate closed, it shall be closed. The other proposition of the Government is equally simple. It is, that when more than 40 Members—that is, more than a quorum of the House—continue to speak under the circumstances I have mentioned, then that not 100, but 200 Members shall be required in order to close the debate. This is not a great arithmetical puzzle. I think the right hon. Member for Preston (Mr. Raikes), but, at any rate, the right hon. Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), who, I admit without reservation, made a very able and temperate speech in opposition to the views I hold, said so. But the puzzle is no puzzle at all. When there is under a quorum of the House desirous of continuing the debate, there must be 100 desirous of closing it. If there is more than a quorum, the majority must be at least 200. Let us see what that is in practical working—100 to 40 is a two-and-a-half times majority. With 200 to 40, which is the next step, the majority is five times as large as the minority. Then we come to 200 to 100. The majority in that case is equal to double. In 200 to 150 the majority is four to three. I should like to ask the House to observe—and this is what I call an important point—that, as regards small minorities, the proposition which has been made by the Government is much less severe than the proposition of those who think a two-thirds majority would be advisable. I do not think that has been commented upon. As regards small minorities, our plan is the most moderate, the least severe. With regard to large majorities, the other plan is the more moderate. Observe what is the difference. In the two-thirds plan, which hon. Gentlemen opposite do not like—they do not seem to like anything in this matter—I am only afraid that I may convert them—but if they were to look the figures over, they would see that an obstructive minority—I will use the term—of 20 only requires 60 Members in the House in order that the debate may close under the two-thirds plan; but, according to our proposition, it requires 100 to be in the House. If 30 be the small minority, according to the two-thirds plan, 90 must be in the House; according to our plan, 100. If the small minority be 40, the two-thirds plan requires a House of 120; our plan a House of 200. In the case of 50 the two-thirds plan requires 150, and our plan 200 to be in the House. Therefore, it is obvious that with regard to small minorities, the proposition of the Government is the more moderate of the two. But when you come to large minorities the case is somewhat reversed. Hon. Gentlemen have dealt with that as if it were of great importance; to my mind it is of the least importance. The importance is to guard the moderate and small minorities. Judging from my experience of large minorities, I should say that they can always take care of themselves. And, besides, it is obvious that the Speaker of the House, in the case of a large minority, say, 199 to 201, never would undertake to say that it was the evident sense of the House that the debate should close. It is impossible for any rational man to suppose we should believe that the Speaker would say so, for he would have no accurate measure of the sense of the House, and he would certainly jeopardize his own reputation were he to undertake to divide the House when the numbers were, say, nearly equal. Therefore, I venture to say, without fear of contradiction, that the Government proposal is reasonable—so reasonable, I think, that even small minorities have no right whatsoever to object to it. And as for large minorities, whatever be the Rule you propose, you may rely upon it that a large minority will always have its influence, and always be secure from unjust treatment in a deliberative Assembly wherever they do not resort to brute force to express their views. As regards the question of 201 to 199, it should be remembered that the House is now often constituted by one vote. When an hon. Member has drawn attention to the fact that there are not 40 Members present, and the Speaker has counted up to 39, the entrance of another Member constitutes the House, so as to be able to give consideration to, and to come to a decision on, the gravest questions. On the other hand, if attention be called to the fact that 40 Members are not present, and the Member giving that information does what was often done years ago, that is, slip behind the Speaker's Chair, and thus avoid being counted, if the Speaker is unable to count more than 39, the House stands adjourned. So that one Member is competent to make the House, under certain circumstances, competent for its gravest transactions; and one Member can disperse the House and send us all to our homes. I should like to ask hon. Gentlemen opposite to allow me to make a few observations on the real or simulated alarm they exhibit in regard to this matter. ["Oh!"] If I say it is not simulated, it would seem as if I did discredit to their judgment. But if they wish, I will admit that that alarm is real. I have seen great alarm in this House on many occasions. No one can have been here 40 years without having observed occasions when there was the utmost terror at some great harm that was about to happen. I have observed that hon. Gentlemen opposite are often seized with this fit when any good or reasonable measure is proposed. Why, Sir, in the year 1846 I recollect the House discussing for 11 nights before going into Committee a question which aroused alarm. The alarm was real, not simulated. It ended in dethroning a great Minister, the greatest Minister of our time, unless we accept the First Minister of to-day. It ended also in the dismissal of all his Colleagues, not only from this Bench, but from association with their Party. And, after all that terror, we know now that, 30 years afterwards, hon. Gentlemen on the other side, who had been so excited, have enjoyed great profit and prosperity from the policy they so much condemned. Later than that, in 1866, there was exactly the same expression of fear. Some hon. Gentleman opposite threw out a Bill and destroyed the Government. They threw out the Bill because they said that the £7 franchise would swamp all the rich and respectable people in the country. Well, they came into Office, and in the very next year they passed a Bill which gave a vote to every man who was rated to the poor, however small or humble was the cottage or hovel in which he was living. And to show that they have not repented, and that they have received no harm, now, in every Recess, in speeches especially to constituencies in the North, they always remind the working men of the liberal and patriotic Act which conferred the franchise upon them. ["Question!"] That is not the question, I am aware. I mentioned it as an illustration. Another phrase used on the other side is that we are endeavouring to limit freedom of speech. But, what I understand by freedom of speech refers not so much to the quantity as to the quality. Every Member of this House who chooses may arise and say things now which two or three centuries ago would have brought him under the direct discipline of the Crown. All that has passed away. Now we may say anything we like, and some hon. Members, as we have heard on a recent occasion, have said things that I should very much regret to think that I had said. Then, in this House also we may say very severe and ill-natured things, and, it may be, very inaccurate things, which if said outside would bring us under the Law of Libel; but from the Law of Libel we are free in this House. Now, this is freedom of speech, when you may say what you think right to say; and neither the power of the Crown on the one hand, nor the power of the Law of Libel on the other, can in the least degree interfere with what you have said. But as to quantity of speech, I would ask hon. Gentlemen if they know of any deliberative assembly in the world where there is not some limit to speech? Go to your church assemblies; have they not some limit too? We know that the clergy are apt to be rather long in their speeches, and that their debates extend over many hours; but they all have some mode of bringing a debate to an end. What is the course in all the public meetings held in this country? What would become of public meeting if the right asserted by some Gentlemen here were exercised on those occasions? Is not it the commonest thing known to us all that, after a debate has gone on to such a length after the programme of speakers has been gone through, somebody proposes to speak, or continues to speak, too long, and the chairman is at liberty to, and constantly does, put it to the meeting whether Mr. So-and-So shall be heard, or whether he shall be heard any longer, and as the meeting decides the gentleman—as I have seen it, and I think I have never seen it otherwise—has yielded to the opinion of the meeting and to the decision of the chair. But for this, public meetings in this country would be absolutely of no use, and we know that in the freedom of the Press and the freedom of public meetings we find all the elements of whatever permanent freedom there exists in this nation. Then there is another—what shall I call it?—hobgoblin, or something which is very alarming, which meets hon. Gentlemen, and they say—never having seen anything like it on their side, I suppose—they say that on this side of the House the majority will be led by a powerful Minister. In this country Ministers do not become powerful except by some great qualities, and they are only powerful when a very large portion of the public puts reliance in them. And then I think it is a great blessing that a powerful Minister should exert great influence over his Party, and that his Party, being a majority elected with him by the constituencies, should influence Parliament to serve the country. But hon. Members opposite seem to me as if they did not like to look at more than one point of the question. They say that a Minister who has a majority will do this, that, and the other; and they leave out of view the question of the highest authority in this House, without whose opinion, without whose judgment, and without whose express intimation to the House the most powerful Minister who ever sat, or who ever will sit here, and the most powerful Party itself, would be absolutely helpless in this matter. That is not merely my construction. It must appear to be so to every Gentleman who hears my voice. I hope some hon. Gentleman who follows me will attend to this—driven from point to point in argument, hon. Members have at last said—Well, we know that is what you expect of the Speaker of the House; but what security have you that the Speaker will act up to your expectation? Well, I would say this—My right hon. Friend has been about 50 years a Member of the House. I have been a Member nearly 40 years. I have seen three eminent Speakers occupy that Chair—Lord Eversley, Lord Ossington, and the right hon. Gentleman the Speaker now in the Chair; but has anybody noticed any trace of any partiality on the part of those Speakers? There is a score of opportunities every Session, one might say, if a Speaker thought it worth his while to do it, he might give some petty advantage to the Party with which he is connected. Now, those three Speakers of whom I have spoken have all been connected with the Liberal Party. They have served in the Office of Speaker during the Administrations of Sir Robert Peel, Lord Russell, Lord Aberdeen, Lord Palmerston, Lord Derby, Lord Beaconsfield, and the Prime Minister who now leads the House. In the last Parliament Gentlemen opposite sat on this side of the House. They were the Conservative Party. Mr. Speaker took the Chair then, as now. He was then, and no doubt is now, connected by sympathy with the Liberal Party. But no one said in the last Parliament that as between the two Parties in the House the Speaker was not perfectly impartial. I defy any man to say that at any time during the Parliamentary life of the oldest Member of the House anything has ever been done by any Speaker which would lead to the conclusion that you are relying upon an unsafe security when you ask the Speaker to take the initiative in a matter like that before the House. Now, Sir, I will ask hon. Gentlemen—Do not you suppose that the Office of Speaker is so eminent and dignified that it necessarily almost shuts out the possibility of partiality? Is it possible that any Speaker would sacrifice his great honour and his historical position for the purpose of giving some small advantage to the Party on this side of the House? Now, then, I insist upon it, and I think the House and every dispassionate, fair-minded man will come to the same conclusion, that the danger hon. Gentlemen have spoken about, and which they are so alarmed about, is, in point of fact, only a phantom, and that the safeguards provided in this Resolution are sufficient and complete for the proper maintenance of the Business of the House. An hon. Gentleman said that we are not all agreed on this side of the House. Well, hon. Gentlemen opposite have not told us of their opinions; but, possibly, they are not all agreed. I should be very sorry if, on every matter that came before the House, it was to be expected that all men would think exactly alike. We have an Amendment by the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott). That is an Amendment that means that the House shall do nothing whatever. If any Member of the House wishes to support that Amendment, he supports a proposition that, in regard to the shortening or closing debates by any contrivance whatever in the way of any vote in the House, that is a thing which cannot be recommended. I may say here that there has been some reference made to the word "bare" and "bare majority," and I see it stated in some of the papers that the word "bare" was left out of the Amendment at the suggestion of the authorities of the House. Well, I believe I am at liberty to state, without fear of being in error, that the authorities of the House—I mean Mr. Speaker, in the first place, and the Gentlemen at the Table—have had nothing whatsoever to do with the leaving out of that word; and the Amendment stands, as I understand, exactly as it was proposed at the Table by the hon. and learned Member for Brighton. Well, that is one of the propositions. There may be other propositions. I do not condemn them; but it seems to me that if I were sitting on this side of the House and not connected with this Bench—if I thought that anything ought to be done and that something effective might be done—there being no matter of conscience involved, for this is not a matter of blood shedding or of a terribly atrocious and evil policy of any kind; it is a matter upon which we may all agree without any amount of suffering, or upon which many may disagree without quarrelling—I should say that if a Government in which I had confidence had recommended this Resolution I would accept it—and if the Party with which I usually acted in the main, and for the most part, approved of it, and would all but unanimously support it, then I should have no feeling of conscientious objection to submit my judgment to the judgment of my Leaders and my Party. [Cheers and ironical cheers.] If hon. Gentlemen opposite come to their unanimity by any process differing from that, I hope they will state it. There is one other point on which I shall address a few words to the House—to the Conservative Members as well as to those on this side. It may be observed that in what I have said I have made no appeal whatever to Members of this House who call themselves the Irish Party. I have

by many methods, that men to make government by this Commons not difficult only, sible. Two hon. Members of e—for we are all honourable hon. Members of this House, ow present, but absent under ices not without his own con- y two hon. Members of this ilet in the United States, were a Convention of Irish delegates . It was a Convention which, it had power, declared war e Crown and the Government ited Kingdom. Subscriptions ected at that Convention, and led in openly, with the view of soldiers to take part in the and intended war; and the n to whom I refer, as far as I from the report, said nothing nvention. They were parties olution. They were parties to ss. They spoke in the Con- [Mr. HEALY: No!] I have i Irish-American paper a most careful, and interesting report eches at that Convention. To- end one of the leading speakers ough it was better, for reasons, r friends from Ireland should further part in their delibera- t there was a speech in that an hon. Member of the House.] I do not know whether the nber who says "No" would it was made at a part of the on which was not in the Con-

I say, therefore, that it is not worth my while to appeal to those Gentlemen. They are at liberty to hold their opinions, they are at liberty to conspire, and they are at liberty to rebel; but, at any rate, they are not at liberty to make it impossible for this Imperial Parliament to transact the Business which it has to do. I think that if there be within the walls of this House a Party, however small, avowing objects such as these, and pursuing a course such as this, it behoves all Members of the House of a different kind to consider the position in which they are. I appeal to hon. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, to the Conservative Party—I differ from them, as they know, very much in many things, but I admit that if they are mistaken they are in intention patriotic, and that they would wish the honour of Parliament to be sustained, and the interests of the country to be guarded—I may, therefore, fairly appeal to them, and I may appeal to hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House—English Members, Welsh Members, Scotch Members, loyal Irish Members, I may appeal to them, and ask them whether this House of Commons, with its centuries of renown and its centuries of service, is to be made prostrate, powerless, and useless, at the bidding and by the action of a handful of men, who tell you that they despise you, and who by their conduct would degrade you? Do not let them suppose that they are greater friends of Ireland than I am. Whv. Sir. I acknowledged doms, and for what? For the high and noble purpose of legislating for a great and powerful Empire; and I ask you whether you are willing now to assist Her Majesty's Government in altering, to some small extent, the Rules and practice of this House, in order that the House of Commons, in spite of the mischief of the few, may find itself hereafter able to fulfil the great duties which the people of this great nation have committed to its charge?

COLONEL STANLEY: I remember, Sir, that a few years ago a distinguished American Minister said to one who was then the Representative for Foreign Affairs in this country, and who had a difficult answer to make to a deputation at a critical time, that he was anxious to know how a European diplomatist would answer, and, so to speak, "dance among the eggs." Now, it was with a curiosity akin to that of this American Minister that we watched to-night how the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster would acquit himself in speaking on behalf of a Liberal Government in a debate the object of which—in the opinion of Members on this side of the House, and of a great many Members on the other side also—must tend, in a great degree, to the limitation of the right of free speech. The right hon. Gentleman has ridiculed our alarm, and he has spoken, in terms which I need not characterize, of the Members of the Irish Party who sit below the Gangway on this side of the House; but he has given us absolutely no reason why we should not entertain the feelings of alarm which he ridiculed. Throughout this debate there has prevailed, up to this evening, a tone of studied moderation, from which I shall endeavour not to depart. But I cannot but comment upon the very marked differences of opinion which have been made manifest in the course of this debate among the supporters of the Government, and even in its very ranks. The Prime Minister, in the speech with which he introduced these Resolutions, showed that he was obviously anxious to hold on to old Rules as long as possible, and that it was with a feeling of pain that he found himself constrained to depart from the old lines followed by the House of Commons. The right hon. Gentleman also said that he trusted the House would continue to appreciate, nay, to worship, liberty of speech. The President of the Local Government Board follows in the same strain, saying that no Member of the Government has ever suggested that they should stop a debate which is neither repetition nor Obstruction. But the President of the Local Government Board, the hon. Member for Bedford, and now the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, have spoken of the alarm which is felt on these Benches; and the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. John Bright) says that that alarm is simulated. Not one, however, of these Gentlemen has adduced any proof of our being mistaken. The right hon. Gentleman talks of the "phantom" which has caused our alarm. He should remember that it is feared also by above 100 Members of the Liberal Party. ["No, no!"] Well, such was the statement of the hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson), and, up to this time, it has not been contradicted. Right hon. and hon. Gentlemen tell us that there is no intention of using this Rule for the prevention of free speech; but we must look not to their intentions, but to future possibilities. How can we be confident that on all occasions the intentions which the Government have expressed will be those which will be realized? Of that we have before now had some experience; and we are perfectly entitled to look not only to what is intended by the Resolution—a Resolution which, it appears, is to become a Standing Order of the House—but also to what its terms might hereafter, under various circumstances, be held to imply. If we looked only to the speech of the Prime Minister we might, perhaps, be to some extent re-assured; but the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India and the Home Secretary have spoken in a very different tone from that of the Prime Minister. What did the noble Marquess say? Did he say that it was only unrestricted loquacity or needless repetition which was to be guarded against? No; he went a great deal further; and much of the difficulty which we now have to face has been caused by the expressions which the noble Lord thought fit to use. He said—

"The statement that the privilege of speech is not a personal right attaching to the position of a Member of Parliament may be an assertion that will startle some hon. Members; but I think a very little consideration will show it to be a true assertion, and I should like very much to see the contrary of that assertion formulated and defended. If it is true that the privilege of speech is a personal privilege, it belongs, I presume, equally to every Member of the House."—[3 Hansard, clxvii. 1327.]

Now, I hold that the privilege is a personal right, notwithstanding the noble Lord's statement, for we are chosen to speak in Parliament as well as to vote; and it is the duty of every Member, on fitting occasions, to represent his constituents by word of mouth, subject only to his sense of responsibility to the House. But I will call a witness into court who speaks with greater force than I can. The duties of a Member of Parliament have been defined in the following expressive and weighty words:—

"It is often said that we are not delegates; but if we are not delegates we are not rulers. We are sent here to represent the general views of our constituents. We have morally no power to cut off the influence of those constituents—to make fundamental changes in the Constitution, and to vary, alter, and overthrow the practice of 600 years."

From this it will appear that the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster did not always hold the views now put forward by the Government. As to the personal privilege of speech, to which the noble Lord referred, he will find a sufficient answer in words spoken in 1867. The noble Lord—I am not going to quote his words, but the meaning is clear—used a curious expression. He said there were other places where free speech could be exercised outside this House; and another hon. Member has gone further, and said if we wanted to express our views we might go outside to do it, for Parliament was no place for that. I venture to say, in the first place, that that is an entire and complete alteration of the meaning of Parliament. In the second place, if the public mind is to be influenced with regard to measures before this House, not by discussions taking place in the House, but discussions outside, you will import a doctrine rather dangerous and somewhat difficult to define. It is obvious that while the discussion is going on out-of-doors the measures on which the discussion is taking place may be passing into law under this Rule. The Home Secretary was more cautious, but the same argument ran throughout his speech. He spoke of the immense work which lies before Parliament. He began by saying there was the Address, on which he gave a significant hint that the discussion was one which might have been cut short under these Rules. He said, in the month of March, they had the Army and Navy Estimates, and he pointed out the difficulty which arose of Motions being put down between the Government and necessary Supply. Evidently, the argument of the right hon. and learned Gentleman goes a great deal further than Motions on going into Supply. It would apply to all Motions which stand in the way of the Business of the Government, and it would lead to an entire revolution. Then, the right hon. and learned Gentleman says, the month of March is gone and we come to April, and he points out that in April the Government might be in difficulties with regard to their Mutiny Bill. Now, all this is by no means new. These are not things which have occurred to this Government of all Governments. On the contrary, I may point out that it was the duty of the late Government to pass one measure which will greatly facilitate the progress of the Business of any Government. We are naturally led to fear from all this that what is intended to be used against Obstruction will too often be turned against that which is legitimate opposition. I do not wish to misquote the President of the Board of Trade; but I have clearly in my mind the recollection of a speech in which he spoke of Opposition, and used the word as being a very convertible term with Obstruction. It is because we know these facts and views are in the minds of those, at all events, who hold the newer Liberal ideas, and that ultimately this Rule will be entirely diverted from its course, that we take the strong position which we have assumed. As a matter of fact, the Government have been a little ungrateful to the House for the manner in which Business has been expedited this year. Have they been obstructed? Their main Votes have been passed on the first night they were discussed, no doubt at a late and inconvenient hour. I have a clear recollection that on many previous occasions these Votes have occupied sometimes two or three nights. It is true that last year Urgency was asked, and asked by the Government. They were alarmed about their Business. The House thought that it should not be granted, and the Government did perfectly well without it. Having no other course, the Government took the House into their confidence, and the House responded, as it always will when treated in that manner. References have been made to the last Parliament as if the late Government had no Obstruction to contend with. I am not going back on that which may be a matter of controversy. The Prime Minister spoke of the Obstruction which took place in 1879 and in 1877. I tried then to believe that the Obstruction was honest. I was prepared to admit that then, and I admit it now; therefore, although I refrain from saying how much assistance we received from the House, even after the main question of corporal punishment was disposed of, we carried on the necessary Business without the clôture, and passed some considerable measures. No answer has been given to the question—How would the clôture help the Government this Session? Would it have helped them on the Address? Would it have helped them on the Estimates? I do not think that that is a contention which will be made. The clôture could only have been applied against, to use the language of the Home Secretary, Motions which stood in the way of the Estimates, and those Motions could be dealt with by other Amendments on the Paper. I should like to call attention to what may happen in Committee, and in doing so I assume I have a right to argue as to the intentions of the Government from the actual words of the Resolutions which have been submitted. Now, my right hon. Friend the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) pointed out that the clôture can be applied in this way. At the present time, on going into Supply, the Question is moved, "That the Speaker leave the Chair." If an Amendment is moved, the clôture can be applied. Then to the Motion, "That I now leave the Chair," the clôture can again be applied. That has been clearly shown. It appears from the New Rule—

"That when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker, or to the Chairman of a Committee of the whole House, during any Debate, to be the evident sense of the House, or of the Committee, that the Question be now put, he may so inform the House or the Committee; and, if a Motion be made 'That the Question be now put,' Mr. Speaker, or the Chairman, shall forthwith put such Question; and, if the same be decided in the

Now, how is this going to be applied in Committee? If the clôture is passed upon a particular Amendment, all other Amendments may be, although pertinent to the subject, shut out. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman cheers ironically. I should like him to deal with this point, as it may materially facilitate progress. The effect of the Resolution, unless it can be explained in some other sense, may be to cut out Amendments in Supply. I will not be rash enough to suppose that the right hon. Gentleman intends it to work in this way; but it is perfectly competent for anyone to say that this is the position, unless restrictive words are used, in which Parliament may find itself. Suppose the original Question was that £100,000 should be voted for such-and-such a purpose. An Amendment might be moved with which the House disagreed. I venture to contend that, in the terms of the Resolution—I do not say it is the intention of the Government—it would be perfectly competent to the Chairman—I am speaking, of course, impersonally, and without reference to the right hon. Gentleman who is now Chairman—to propose that the Resolution was carried, the Amendment negatived, and the clôture carried upon it. It is said that the clôture is not to be applied to such cases; and, as I understand, the argument in favour of the Resolution is not so much that it is intended to stop Obstruction as to expedite Business. But that can be done by the Resolutions which follow, which are framed with the object of expediting the Business of Parliament. That can be done in two ways—either by stopping questions from being brought forward or by shortening the proceedings. But the question is not whether the Resolution is intended to be used in a particular way, but whether, under the terms of the Resolution, it can be so used. I should have been disposed to argue—if my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) had not already done so—that the word "may" implies that it is the duty of the Chairman to put the Question, and means the same as "must." The President of the Local Government Board said "No;" but that was a bare assertion, and the right hon. Gentleman advanced no argument, and showed no reason in favour of his opinion. But the right hon. Gentleman goes further, and to-night the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said that it is to be at the discretion of the Chairman or Speaker whether the Question is to be put. That is a delicate matter, and I can only add one more to the testimonies which have been paid to the present occupant of the Chair. But we have to look on this not as a Sessional, but as a Standing Order, made for all time. See the enormous difficulties and responsibilities in which you are involving the Chair! Suppose the Speaker or Chairman ignored or misinterpreted the feelings of the House. My right hon. Friend the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) noticed this; other Members have noticed it also. In practice, some Rule would be devised which would be followed by each successive Speaker or Chairman, and the discretion of the Speaker would be abandoned. I find, Sir, that the question was raised in a discussion which took place in February, 1880. The difficulty then dwelt upon was as to the ascertainment of the "feeling of the House," when many Members were not present in the House, but in the Lobbies and precincts of the House. My right hon. Friend the then Chancellor of the Exchequer clearly showed the difficulties which might arise, and the great inconvenience under which the Speaker or Chairman might labour in having his discretion confirmed or disapproved by the House. It has been said quite truly that the Speaker or Chairman would be an independent and impartial person. No one has expressed a doubt on that subject. But—speaking of him, not in his official, but in his personal capacity—is it certain that he would be entirely independent of the Government? Then, in the case of Members not actually in the House, but in the Lobbies and precincts, to whom could the Chairman look save to those useful persons to whom we look for the declarations of the numbers in Divisions? I fear, if we accept this Resolution, that we shall place the Chairman or the Speaker in an invidious and unpleasant position. I know that the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), in his temperate and able speech the other night, the President of the Board of Trade, and others, say that we on this side of the House are detracting from the Speaker's authority. No, Sir; I venture to say that it is far from our intention. We wish to save the Speaker from that which, in our minds, is an invidious position. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster asked us whether we could suppose that the Speaker or the Chairman would be actuated by the prospect of some Party advantage? We do not suppose anything of the kind. But the Resolution would place the impartiality of the Speaker or Chairman not in any real danger, but in danger of suspicion; and it is for that reason that it is our bounden duty to guard him from such dangers. With regard to the clôture, the Home Secretary the other night quoted the opinion of Lord Eversley, who expressed a fear that we should be obliged some day to come to the clôture. Lord Eversley, when examined on the subject, on the 6th of March, 1854, said that he believed that some day or other the House would be obliged to adopt a method of bringing debates to a summary end; but he added words which I do not say destroy the effect of the Home Secretary's quotation, but materially modify them. Lord Eversley, after expressing that opinion, adds—"I should postpone the adoption of that summary process till the latest possible period." My right hon. Friend near me, the late Chancellor of the Exchequer, has been quoted as an authority in favour of the clôture. This statement has, however, been already explained in the public Press. What my right hon. Friend really said was that it was thought by some to be possible that we might have to come to the clôture, but that he himself was entirely opposed to it. "That," my right hon. Friend said, "is a method which, I venture to think, this House will pause very long before they adopt. It is wholly at variance with the traditions of the British House of Commons." Now, let us see what is said by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn). Speaking no later than two years ago with regard to the clôture, he said he trusted there was no sort of a possibility of its being adopted, and that any such proposal would meet with the most determined opposition. Again, another Member of the House expressed his opinion on a former occasion that the Government had done wisely in seeking to punish individual Members who were guilty of Obstruction, instead of altering the Rules of the House. That was said by no less an authority than the present Postmaster General. Then there is one who, on financial questions, has always proved himself to be a lively and a careful investigator, although his pertinacious good humour, and his thirst for knowledge respecting the Estimates, have, no doubt, been a source of very mixed feeling. What did the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) say? He said that he altogether repudiated the idea of the clôture. The hon. Member for Walsall (Sir Charles Forster) also spoke in the same sense. All Committees and authorities have considered it as absolutely the last alternative which should be brought before the House. They all say—"Let us put it off as long as we can." We have, I think, a right to ask why no Minister, up to the present time, has told us what reason there is for carrying this Resolution before the other Resolutions? If other means failed, doubtless the House might approach its consideration; but the burden of proof lies upon those who insist upon placing it first. I should have thought it a task well worthy of a Prime Minister, whose vast abilities and matchless eloquence even a political opponent may express admiration for, to bring back the House to a remembrance of its old traditions, to vindicate the rights of Parliament against those who wish to bring those rights into contempt, and to maintain on its behalf that freedom of which on other questions the right hon. Gentleman has been the foremost advocate. But we have here a measure which the most incompetent Minister could carry if he only had a compact majority behind him. I do not want to go into the question of a mere majority, except to a very slight degree. The Home Secretary said it was the only question before the House; but I understood you, Sir, to say it was otherwise, and I think that has been confirmed this evening by the manner in which you explained the Question to be put. And the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has said this evening that he understands it is not a question at all of a mere or of a bare majority. I could point out many instances where hon. Members opposite have expressed themselves against the principle of a bare majority. I will, however, only mention the hon. Member for Walsall and the hon. Member for Swansea, who have spoken against giving the power of clôture to a bare majority. I will not argue this, for the argument seems to go very much against the adoption of the clôture at all. I have not argued, therefore, against a bare majority. But what I wish respectfully to point out is, whether the Government would not advance Business more by leading than driving? If any Government endeavours to drive instead of leading, infallibly they will oblige the House to look, not at the spirit in which these Resolutions have been proposed, but at the actual letter of them. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread) said he did not believe much in advancing Business by the policy proposed; and the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) showed clearly how, if oppressive measures were adopted in one respect, difficulties would arise in other matters in regard to which they could not be interfered with. Surely, trusting to this, one power, forced, on the whole, upon an unwilling House, is very little better than the course adopted by the wise men of Gotham, who built a hedge round the cuckoo under the impression that that would keep the bird from flying away. If the clôture is not to be used, it appears to me that the Business of the House will not be advanced. We cannot be led away by the assertion that this is to be hung up as a weapon in terrorem, not to be used, but to frighten evildoers and to keep ill-luck from the Government, very much like a horseshoe nailed on a stable door. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade says we dislike the clôture because it is a French word. I do not dislike it because it is a French word, but because it is an institution not known to England, and which has never been employed in an English Parliament. That is an insular view if you please; but, as the clôture is imported from abroad, so I believe it will be used here as it is used abroad. I believe that it will do more than anything else to do away with the spirit of fair play and mutual conciliation with which hitherto the Business of the House has been conducted. Before I sit down, I wish to disclaim that connection between ourselves and the Irish Members of which the Home Secretary spoke the other night. I do not know that we need look very far after the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster to-night to see, perhaps, why hon. Members from Ireland may not altogether like to find themselves in the same Lobby as the Government. To form a combination for the purpose of getting the Government into a difficulty is very far from our intention. Look at the situation in which the House is placed at this moment! The Amendment is by an honest and earnest Liberal. [Mr. JOHN BRIGHT: Very!] The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) has made as strong a speech against the Resolution as any Member of the House. The hon. Member for Berkshire (Mr. Walter) has also spoken against it; and other hon. Members, in a greater or less degree, have expressed their disapproval of the measure of the Government. We have taken our present course, not, as many hon. Members affect to suppose, for the purpose of embarrassing the Government, but to preserve our rights while we can. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India speaks of this vote as a Vote of Want of Confidence. His position reminds me of the lines—

Let the high office and the honour go
To one that would do thus. I am half through;
The one part suffer'd, the other will I do.”

We believe that less objectionable measures than the present would have done, and we do not believe that this measure will succeed, as the Government expects. No one has as yet answered the question put by my hon. and learned Friend (Sir Hardinge Giffard)—would any hon. Member on that side of the House have supported this measure if it had been proposed by us when we were in Office? Reference has been made to the fact that the clôture has already been used in this House, though it has only been used on the occasion of measures of gravity being before the House. For instance, as has been pointed out, the clôture was virtually adopted in the Candahar debate, and it will prevail with regard to the decision which will be taken on this vote to-night. If the Government would take the House into their confidence—would lead, not drive, when it becomes absolutely impossible to carry on the Business of the country, we should have free room for the exercise of those rights of discussion which never attained such a height of freedom as they have attained within the walls of this House. These are the privileges for which, by a strange irony of fate, we on this side of the House find ourselves contending against a Liberal Government. I have only to thank the House for the patience with which they have heard me.

MR. O'SHAUGHNESSY said, that while all Members were bound to consider the question with a due regard to the traditions of the House, Irish Members would be pardoned if they paid particular attention to the effect of restrictions of debate on the Irish representation. Independent Irish Members on both sides of the House could never form more than a small minority of the entire Assembly. Both the great Parties had this common ground, that they were equally determined that individual liberty of speech should be curtailed, and that, by direct or indirect means, debates should be shortened if they passed certain limits. The debates had shown how each Party proposed to effect this. The Liberal Party proposed the clôture. This measure would be felt by the Liberals when they were in a minority, and by the Tories when they, in turn, were in a minority. The clôture was not directed specially against Irish Representatives. So powerful an instrument could not have been necessary to silence an Irish minority. If that had been the special object of the Government, they could, without endangering their position, have easily passed a sufficient measure. The Conservatives would never have said a word about liberties and traditions, but passed it with the enthusiasm they displayed in support of coercion, as long as it could substantially affect only the Irish minority in the House. The Conservative Party, on the other hand, in their speeches, demanded measures by which individuals on various grounds could be silenced, and by which small minorities could be fettered in debate. There was only one small minority of importance in the House—namely, the Irish representation; and what the Conservative Party wished was an arbitrary system of clôture against that minority and its Members. The case, then, stood thus. Both great Parties agreed that restriction must come. Everyone knew it would come. As a practical man

bound to chose, he unhesitatingly preferred a measure aimed at minorities consisting of the great Parties, to a system aimed at the Irish representation alone, and capable of use against only an Irish minority. With every respect for the opinion of some other Irish Members, he recoiled from the dishonour of leaving on the Journals of the House a system of restrictions aimed exclusively at Irish Members. A measure available against English minorities would be viewed with dislike and used sparingly, for fear of precedent, against any body of Members. If his hon. Friends succeeded in their main object of ousting the present Government, and in obtaining a Tory Administration, the first thing the Conservatives would do would be, in one form or another, to pass an Irish clôture, dishonouring to the Irish representation, and far more stringent in effect than the present proposal. It was alleged that without clôture a renewal of coercion would be impossible. This statement, contained in an extraordinary document lately issued by the hon. Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) and others, meant that it was impossible for a majority of 6 to 1 to pass a Bill against a small minority. He trusted that coercion, introduced under the unwarrantable circumstances which marked the introduction of the present Coercion Act, would always be firmly opposed. But impossible was a strong word. Though there was a good deal of credulity in Ireland, as in other countries, he did not believe that the simplest and most illiterate Irish peasant could be gulled into the belief that without the clôture a renewal of coercion would be impossible. Everyone knew a large majority could compel a small minority to let any measure pass. Nay, more; experience had taught them that, after a certain amount of resistance, Mr. Speaker was ready to stop debate, and the House was ready to approve his conduct, and thereby create a precedent. Then there was not the smallest truth in the assertion that without clôture a renewal of coercion was impossible. What rendered a renewal of coercion possible was told the people of Ireland a few days ago by the leading Home Rule journal, in these words—

“If coercion be perpetuated, it is at the door of the Moonlighters the extreme measure must fairly be laid.”

Mr. O'Shaughnessy

He was opposed to any measure specially directed against Irish Members. He should support the clôture because it would render it practicable to pass just laws for the United Kingdom in a reasonable time. He would support it especially in the interests of Ireland, because it would break down the obstruction to radical reforms in Ireland, which begot disappointment and disloyalty by resisting and delaying every great measure proposed for that country. The clôture would induce men to enjoy freedom of speech without abusing it, and thus, instead of destroying, it would maintain the ancient traditions and liberties of the House of Commons.

MR. NEWDEGATE: Mr. Speaker, perhaps the House will excuse the eldest ex-Whipper-in in the House for expressing an opinion on this subject. I rejoice to see the Prime Minister and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in their places, because the years of my service in the House are about the same as those of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, though they have not reached the number of those for which the Prime Minister can take credit. As a quondam Party organizer I am senior to yourself, Mr. Speaker, though I have had the honour and the pleasure of acting with you when you were the organizer of the Whig Party. While we had the organization of the two great Parties in this House, though during most trying times, the confusion, Mr. Speaker, which has been witnessed of late years did not prevail. The hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), who has just spoken, was examined before the Committee on Public Business which sat in 1878—the last Committee on Public Business. I produced, as a Member of that Committee, figures which the Committee accepted, and which proved that the Obstruction from which the House had then been suffering was originated and was carried on by small minorities chiefly composed of Irish Members. It is a singular fact that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington), who was a Member of that Committee, though he accepted all the details of these figures, induced the Committee to reject the totals which gave a summary of the results. That summary, Sir, is the foundation of the alarm which has been expressed by the hon. and learned Member for Limerick, because it showed that of the small obstructive minorities previous to 1878, the larger number consisted of the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) and other Irish Members, one of whom is imprisoned with him as a "suspect." A large number of these minorities did not include more than, or indeed so many as, 11 Members each. After the Committee of 1878 had reported, I ventured to submit to the House a proposal to the effect that the House should deal with the offence of Obstruction on the principle of the Common Law, so that when it was represented to this House that a Member had been guilty of persistent and rebellious Obstruction, such as that of which the hon. Member for the City of Cork undoubtedly had been guilty, the House should deal with the offence of that individual Member, and with the offences of others in like manner. My proposal stands now on the Notice Paper as an Amendment to the 9th Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister. I trust that this clôture will not be adopted. I can adduce against it the Report of the only Committee who distinctly considered the proposal for the adoption of the clôture in this House. When I name the Members of that Committee, I think their character will give force to the objections to the clôture. This Committee on Public Business sat before the several Committees on which I have served. The Committee was appointed in 1848 because there had been a certain tendency towards confusion in this House in consequence of the separation of the majority of the Conservative Party from the late Sir Robert Peel on the question of commercial policy in 1846—the commercial policy to which the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster referred when he said that it caused unfounded alarm among the Conservative Party now in Opposition. I venture to ask that right hon. Gentleman, who is one of the Members for Birmingham, whether, in the present condition of agriculture in Warwickshire, there is no cause for alarm? At this moment the Mayor of Birmingham is urging that encouragement should be given to farmers in the form of prizes and premiums in dairy produce. The Mayor is a brother of the right hon.

Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, and intimates by his action that he, at all events, thinks that corn-growing in Warwickshire is not in a prosperous condition. But I was speaking of the Committee on Public Business of 1848, and I will now name the Members who composed it. These were Lord John Russell, Sir Robert Peel, Sir George Grey, Sir James Graham, Mr. Hume, Mr. Disraeli, the Lord Advocate, Mr. Goulbourn, Sir Robert Harry Inglis, Mr. Bernal, Sir William Heathcote, Mr. Cobden, Mr. Morgan John O'Connell, Mr. Brotherton, Mr. Henley, Mr. George Alexander, and Mr. J. Evelyn Denison, the late Speaker of this House; and to this Committee was afterwards added Mr. Greene, who was for many years afterwards the Chairman of the Committees of the House. This Committee examined, among other persons, M. Guizot, who was then in England, having been Prime Minister in France under the expelled King Louis Philippe. M. Guizot and others, among whom was a distinguished American, gave evidence with respect to the action of the clôture in the French Assembly and the House of Assembly of the United States, upon which evidence the Committee of 1848 made the following observations:—

"Your Committee, in weighing the value of this evidence, had to take into account how materially the constitution and the mode of transacting Business in the House of Commons differed from those of the two Legislative Assemblies referred to. In France the clôture has been found available without any restriction on the length of speeches. In the United States a limitation of the length of speeches has been found necessary, in addition to the power of closing the debate. In France important Motions are considered in the Bureaux before they are discussed in the House. The House meets in the morning, and the attendance is continuous."

We have at present an example that the attendance in this House can scarcely be called continuous. This Committee add—

"The clôture, in the form in which it is used in France, could not be applied to our debates without the risk of unjust surprises, and without other inconveniences."

They go on to say in their Report—

"Your Committee, however, ventures to express an opinion that the satisfactory conduct and progress of the Business of the House must mainly depend upon Her Majesty's Government, holding, as they do, the chief control over its management. They (the Committee)

believe that by the careful preparation of measures, their early introduction, the judicious distribution of Business between the two Houses, and the order and method with which measures are conducted, the Government can contribute in an essential degree to the easy and convenient conduct of Business. They trust the efforts of the Government would be seconded by those of independent Members, and that a general determination would prevail to carry on the Public Business with regularity and dispatch."

But is there at present a judicious distribution of Business between the two Houses? We cannot fail to remember that the present Government have lately induced this House to vote the condemnation of the House of Lords, because that House has acted upon its undoubted right in appointing a Committee of its own on the Irish Land Act; nor can we forget that the complaints of the House of Lords are continuous, because no fair share of Business is allotted to them. I do not think we can come to any other conclusion than that the present difficulties of this House are attributable, and very largely attributable, to the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers. I have cited the opinion of men who, in their day, were first-rate authorities, an opinion in which the late Sir Robert Peel, Lord John Russell, and Sir George Grey concurred with Mr. Cobden. In the opinion of that distinguished Committee, the measure now proposed by Her Majesty's Government is singularly ill-adapted to this House—is fraught with danger and inconvenience. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has made a minimizing speech, to induce us to believe that this is a measure which will be very seldom resorted to. But the eldest organizer in the House ventures to tell him that, if not frequently resorted to, it will be comparatively useless in forwarding the Business of the House. What is it, let me ask, that this House has suffered from? From constant interruptions, owing to the abuse of their Privileges, by small knots of Members. From the fact that small minorities—chiefly an Irish minority—in the endeavour to force extreme and ulterior measures upon the House, has from day to day persisted in obstructing the Business of the House. I venture then to say that the evidence is strong that unless the clôture is frequently applied it cannot meet the evil and inconvenience from which this House has been suffering for the last four or five years, as anyone may see who will take the trouble of examining the Proceedings of the House and Hansard's Debates. No man values more than I do the individual rights of independent Members. It has been my fate to be an independent Member for many years, and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster ought to have some sympathy with me, for when I was Whipper-in to the Conservative or Protectionist Party, I was tried by a sort of court martial, with Lord Lyndhurst in the chair as President, and the late Lord Beaconsfield as my accuser, because I refused to "Whip" the House against Lord John Russell's Reform Bill of 1852. I expressed the opinion that when that noble Lord felt the necessity for proposing such a change that change was inevitable, and that the sooner it was made the better and more moderate it was likely to be. I have ventured to urge on the House that it must take cognizance of the conduct of individual Members and of small minorities, because, since the last Reform Act, the character of the House has greatly changed, and Obstruction has increased, in great measure owing, as I believe, to the rebellion in Ireland, for I can call it by no other name. There is your difficulty. You have no need to coerce large numbers; your difficulties have been created by small numbers; and upon the principle of the Common Law you should never punish large bodies when you can single out the principal offenders, and by making examples of them deter others who might be inclined to imitate their bad example. My belief is that if the Notice which stands in my name had been adopted in 1879, it is very probable that the hon. Member for the City of Cork and the other hon. Member who is in prison as a "suspect" would now be in their places in this House. But the House failed to check these hon. Members; the House placed no restriction upon their obstructive action, no restriction upon their disloyal attempts to incapacitate the House. Hence the present difficulty. I own that I have been disappointed in the conduct of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India. Evidence has been afforded in this House that the noble Marquess has urged upon his constituents the adoption of the clôture as a means of forcing on measures which he deems to be advantageous. The noble Marquess has been an advocate of the clôture from 1878, and before that. In 1880 I made the proposal which stands now in my name as a Notice upon the Order Book, and there was a great disposition on the part of the Conservative Members to adopt it. But what said the noble Marquess? Why, that he was astonished that any such proposal should ever be entertained. He said—

“It is the Government who are charged with guiding the course of Business, and of directing and controlling it in the House. It is the Government who are principally responsible for the conduct of that Business.”—[3 Hansard, ccl. 1465.]

There I agree with the noble Marquess. He then proceeded to say, with respect to the proposal of the then Chancellor of the Exchequer, which in principle was the same as mine, though much feebler—

“But in the Resolution now before us, the House will observe that when the Speaker has named a Member, the matter is left to be decided by the majority of the House. Now, it appears to me that it is questionable whether there is any advantage whatever to be obtained from the proposed action of the House itself.”—[Ibid. 1471-2.]

The noble Marquess therefore proposed that your authority, Mr. Speaker, should be supreme without reference to the House—a position which no Speaker has ever occupied in this House. The noble Marquess further asked—

“I cannot but think that something of dignity is taken away from the character of the proceeding by requesting a vote of the majority of the House, and not leaving it nominally, as well as practically, in the hands of the Speaker himself.”—[Ibid.]

The noble Marquess thus proposed that you, Sir, should constantly exercise the totally exceptional authority by which, on an occasion of a great emergency, you terminated a debate; while you, Sir, have emphatically declared that you felt that what you did on that occasion was an operation which ought never to be repeated. What further said the noble Marquess? What reason did the noble Marquess assign? He said—

“Because the Speaker or the Chairman of Ways and Means was the only person who could possibly, from the necessity of the case, be cognizant of all that had taken place; and if it is the intention of the Government to strengthen their hands, I think that it could be more effectually done by placing the necessary power in their hands, and not by”—let the House mark this expression—“not by delegating it to the majority of the House.”—[Ibid. 1473.]

I could not understand the noble Marquess in the Committee of 1878; but when he thus spoke in 1880, I understood him perfectly. Then the noble Marquess went on to say—

“I quite agree with the Chancellor of the Exchequer”—the right hon. Baronet the Member for North Devon—“that you cannot at all defend the adoption of the clôture in this House; but when considering this question the House will do well to remember that this is a proceeding to which in time you will be forced to come, and that it is a proceeding which would undoubtedly be efficient for the purpose for which it would be intended.”—[Ibid. 1476-7.]

Then, further on, he added—

“We ought to bear in mind that we have in reserve a simpler and more effectual means of proceeding”—that is, the clôture.—[Ibid.]

These, unfortunately, now seem to be the opinions entertained by the Government. They propose to place this House and its Business under an extraneous authority, for the authority of the Speaker, if it be sole and distinct from the action of the House, is extraneous to the House. I hope, Sir, that the House will excuse my having quoted so largely; but I should state that speech of the noble Marquess from which I have quoted was delivered in this House on the 26th of February, 1880, and that on the following day it was answered by the right hon. Gentleman now at the head of the Government. On the 27th of February, in the adjourned debate, the right hon. Gentleman said—

“Reference has been made to the practice abroad of what is termed the clôture; but let us observe and bear in mind that, whatever the clôture may be as a means of saving the time of a deliberative Assembly, it is, I think—and so, I presume, Her Majesty's Government (the Government of Lord Beaconsfield) have thought—inapplicable to the present discussion, because, as a penal measure, it would surely be altogether inappropriate. The clôture is not the stoppage of a particular Member who is supposed to have offended; it is the stoppage of the debate; and, therefore, to bring in the clôture for the purposes which this Resolution contemplates would be simply to enact that the House would punish itself, and the great interests with which it is charged, in consequence of the offence of a particular Member.”—[3 Hansard, ccl. 1593.]

I cannot state the objections to the clôture in stronger or more eloquent terms than these, and I cannot conceive what the circumstances are, or what the pressure is, which has induced the Prime Minister to turn straight round on his deliberate opinion so clearly expressed only two years ago. I am afraid that we have an agency in the Government which is of a very arbitrary character—that we have a Caucus in the Government itself. I believe, Sir, that the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, who is known in the town of Birmingham for a rather arbitrary disposition, though his great talents are acknowledged, has been the introducer not only of the Caucus, but of this proposal of the clôture. We know that right hon. Gentleman in Birmingham, and I will give the House a proof of what we think of him. At the last Election, what were the numbers polled for the three hon. Members for Birmingham? For the senior Member (Mr. Muntz) there were polled 22,969 votes; and for the President of the Board of Trade 19,544 votes, or 3,425 less than for the senior Member; whilst for the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster there were polled 22,079 votes, or 2,535 more than for his right hon. Colleague the President of the Board of Trade. That, I think, is strong inferential proof of opinion in Birmingham. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade is very democratic, but, at the same time, very arbitrary—two characteristics which, though apparently inconsistent with each other, are often combined, as is well known to everyone who, like myself, has visited the United States; and it is my belief that this clôture, which in the year 1848 was condemned by the distinguished Committee to which I have referred—the only Committee who ever considered the question fully—is, as that Committee declared, inapplicable to this House and will be dangerous if adopted. These, then, are the grounds of my opposition to the Resolution now before us. I consider that at present a direct attack is being made upon Parliamentary government. This House has in this Session been induced to attack the House of Lords for exercising its undoubted Privileges and performing its assigned duty; and now there is proposed to this House a measure that is not calculated to meet the difficulties which were proved before the Committee of 1878, but that is calculated to enable a majority arbitrarily to silence a minority. Again I say that if this measure—the clôture—be not used frequently it will be practically useless; while, if it be used frequently, it will change to the verge of destruction, if not actually destroy, the noble character which this House has borne for centuries as the greatest example of Representative Institutions among the nations of the world. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has told us that we are alarmists. If I am an alarmist I am not satisfied, as he knows, with merely expressing my alarm; and I am confident if you pass this measure, which I believe to be inconsistent with the character of the House of Commons, you may expect that those who have been the quiet Members of the House and quiet members of society will make their voices heard when they find that you no longer respect the characteristics of this House, which they believe to afford, at least, some of the surest foundations of their freedom.

SIR ROWLAND BLENNERHASSETT said, it was not his original intention to take any part in the debate; but he wished, with the permission of the House, to say a few words in reply to some statements made by opponents of the Prime Minister's Resolution. But, first of all, a word with respect to the phraseology of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott), which reminded him of the old joke in Whately's Logic—"No food is better than potatoes," which was capable of two distinct meanings. One meaning was that they had better go without food than eat potatoes, and the other that no species of food could excel potatoes. The Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton said—

"No Rules of Procedure will be satisfactory to this House which confer the power of closing a Debate upon a majority of Members."

Now the hon. and learned Member wished them to understand that the clôture ought not to be enforced by a simple majority; but the form of his Amendment would justify an inference that no majority, however large, should have power to close debate. If, then, they voted for this Amendment as it stood, and still contended that they were in favour of some kind of clôture, then, logically, they must be in favour of the clôture with a vengeance, for as they said that the clôture ought to be established, and that the majority ought to have no power to enforce it, then it was obvious that the power to close a debate must be vested in the hands of some minority, a reductio ad absurdum which, moreover, many of the arguments against the proposal of the Government tended to establish. It seemed to him that the Amendment was in substance identical with a claim for that liberum veto by which it was formerly in the power of one individual in the Polish Assembly to arrest even the most necessary legislation. They had seen that the result of that right in the Polish Assembly had been the ultimate ruin of the country. Many of those hostile to the proposals of the Government were so because they dreaded the possibility of an abuse and a finally acquired power in the direction of rash legislation. For his part, he admitted the desirability of the utmost deliberation when great political questions were before the House, the very difficulty which might seem to stop the way being, in fact, the most important element in securing full justice to every shade of opinion. There was all the difference in the world between slow legislation and no legislation. Look at the numerous important questions which were pressing for solution—agriculture, the relations between capital and labour, Bankruptcy Laws, and a whole host of others which had long loudly cried for the interference of the Legislature. Some day the patience of the country would become exhausted, and a sudden and imperative demand would be made upon Parliament to pass a number of measures dealing with subjects of extreme delicacy and requiring the most serious and calm deliberation. Some means were, therefore, absolutely necessary to enable the House to get through the Business before it. But it was argued that the result of establishing the clôture would be that unpopular men would not be heard, and unpopular Parties and sections practically deprived of deliberative voice. He really thought that on this point they must appeal to experience. How had the clôture worked elsewhere? In Germany it was not even suggested that there had been any attempt to abuse clôture by shutting the mouths of unpopular men. [Mr. O'DONNELL: On the Socialist laws.] He was present during the debate, and there was no attempt to shut their mouths. In France he was not aware that it had been exercised in any matter of first-rate importance. They had heard something of the opinions of M. Guizot; but he must say that the hon. Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) had been somewhat unfair in his reference to that politician. The testimony of M. Guizot really amounted to this—that during his long life he did not remember one instance of the abuse of the clôture. If they were of opinion that a change was necessary in their Forms of Procedure, they should make a change adequate to the occasion. Nothing could be more dangerous to their credit than to take feeble and ineffectual steps to amend their Rules. From the very infancy of political discussion some restraint had been put upon loquacity. The stroke of the clock warned the most eloquent Professor that he must bring his lecture to a close. In a Church Congress the inexorable bell of the President forced the most loquacious orator to resume his seat. The House was not asked to do anything so despotic as that. As the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers) pointed out, it was only asked to revive in a mild form some of the ancient Rules of Parliament; and he ventured to think that no impartial person could object on the ground of its real interference with the liberty of discussion. As to the far-reaching impression which this division would create, he might observe that all over Europe some of the keenest intellects had for some time been engaged in criticizing Parliamentary institutions. The result of this examination was anything but favourable, and the enemies of Parliamentary government had found ample material in the proceedings of that House to point to it with many a telling sarcasm. In days not far distant the friends of liberty were able to boast that the British House of Commons showed the possibility of reconciling perfect freedom of speech with obedience to the law; but recent proceedings in the House had been used to illustrate the practical failure of Parliamentary institutions. If, then, they were able by increased efforts to redeem their former honour and restore themselves in the good opinion of the nation once more, they should be doing a service, not only to their own country, but to all elective Assemblies, which, with one or two exceptions, were everywhere in the civilized world children of the famous and ancient Parliament of England.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he felt bound to complain of the unprovoked attack that had been made upon many Members on his side of the House by the speech of the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India. The speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that evening, though a remarkable one, would not rank amongst his highest and happiest efforts—not from any deficiency on his part, but from the difficulty in which he found himself in successfully defending a course like that proposed in the 1st Resolution. The right hon. Gentleman had twitted the Conservative Party with not supporting the Resolution, because they did not seem to expect to again sit on the Government side of the House; but they were happy to be able to disclaim, in spirit and word, the desire for Office. They preferred to adhere to the great principles of the Constitution, to the liberty of Parliament and of the English people, rather than to court any possible advantage which might accrue to them, or any Party whatever, by a change of places in the House. As to the hon. and learned Member for Limerick (Mr. O'Shaughnessy), he forgot, when he taunted the Tory Party with a desire to overwhelm small minorities, that the Rules to which he took exception were to be found among the Government proposals. He contended this 1st Rule would not put down Obstruction. It would not put an end to Obstruction as it had been understood in previous Sessions; and the greatest Parliamentary authorities of the past had considered, and had left it as their deliberate judgment, that such a measure would not put down Obstruction. The Tory Party were most anxious to put down Obstruction; but this proposal would put an end to discussion and debate on great and important questions when it was convenient for a Minister, or the Government of the day, to do it. It would not put an end to, but would refine Obstruction. It would drive men into becoming Obstructives who had never been Obstructives before. The late Government had experience of Obstruction far greater and more prolonged than any which the present Government had to contend with. The remarkable feature about this scheme was that among those who were the greatest advocates of the clôture were men on the Front Bench opposite, who were Obstructives in the last Parliament. It was said the Tory Party taunted the Government with failure to carry their measures, owing to Obstruction. He was not prepared to answer for every Member of the Tory Party; but he could not recollect a single instance where the Government was taunted with failure of legislation owing to Obstruction. He admitted, however, that there had been charges against the Government that, owing to their mistakes and blunders in Ireland, they had wasted the time of the House over coercive measures for that country. As to the experience of the clôture abroad, in France, where the form of clôture most resembled the present proposal, large majorities were systematically and tyrannously kept down by its operation, and every Party in that country had in turn protested against the hardships under which they suffered by reason of its constant application. Only recently, on an important occasion, it was applied after one speech had been made by the Opposition. He was of opinion that the clôture would be used for Party purposes in critical times. Had it existed it would have been put into operation during the recent debates on the proposed Vote of Censure on the House of Lords, in order to prevent the exposure of the conduct of the Government in connection with the Land Act. The Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said that the freedom of the Press and the right of public meetings were the great securities for the liberties of the people. But how long did the right hon. Gentleman suppose that these rights would exist after the destruction of the freedom of the Representatives of the people? It was a significant fact that in most of the countries in which the clôture existed there was neither freedom of the Press nor freedom of speech out-of-doors. The right hon. Gentleman had alluded to the fairness and sincerity of the occupants of the Chair. For his part, he looked forward with dread to a possible time when the Government of the day would secure the election of a Speaker who would put the clôture into operation whenever the Government should wish it. He regarded the expression of regret by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that the measure was not more severe as an indication of the increasing tendency on the part of the Radicals to introduce measures which were in the direction of despotism pure and simple. The Resolution, if not an arithmetical puzzle, was full of inequalities, and under its operation he predicted that the rights of minorities would be invaded. Was it not notorious that the opinions of a majority of the House were opposed to this Resolution? It was perfectly notorious that if it were not for the exterior pressure, for the pressure exercised by what was known as the Caucus, from the fear of Dissolution, that over 100 hon. Members on the Liberal Benches would join the Opposition. ["No, no!"] If this measure had been proposed from the Conservative Benches, he did not believe that 10 of them would have voted for it. In the speech which the noble Marquess opposite (the Marquess of Hartington) had made in support of the Government Resolution he had been attacked personally, the noble Marquess having, by implication, charged him with Obstruction. He now challenged the noble Marquess to bring forward one single act of his which bore, directly or indirectly, the character of Obstruction. ["Oh!"] He did not know from whom the word proceeded—

MR. SPEAKER asked the hon. Member to address himself to the Chair.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, that he challenged that hon. Member to produce any single instance in which he had, either directly or indirectly, done anything to obstruct the Business of the House. He had never moved the adjournment of a debate, and he had never spoken repeatedly on any occasion. Once or twice he had endeavoured to bring before the House questions of Imperial interest, inadequately, he admitted; but he was a Member of the House, and claimed a Member's rights. He had as yet proposed no special Motion during this Session. For the noble Marquess to allege, in support of the clôture, his references to the advance of the Russians in Central Asia was unusual and discourteous. It was true that his attendance in the House had, perhaps, been more regular than that of the noble Lord, and it was also true that he had not yet had an opportunity of becoming a Minister of the Crown, and of showing himself, in that position, unable to give the House news which was less than six months old. Neither had he lent a great name and position to furthering the ignoble projects of the politicians of Birmingham. What was the cause of this extraordinary Resolution being brought before the House? It was, in the first place, because the Government were discredited throughout the country, and they relied upon this clôture proposal as affording them a cry with which to go to the country in the event of their being forced into a General Election. They were discredited in the country because of their conspicuous administrative failure, of their failure to maintain law and order at home, and to maintain the position of this great country abroad, and of their failure to carry out their legislative promises to the country. It was because he considered that it would be powerless to prevent Obstruction, that it would be fatal to freedom of debate—the most ancient and cherished privilege of Members of that House, by which alone the rights of the English people could be maintained—and that it would be destructive to the liberties and the privileges of the people themselves, that he should record his vote against this most pernicious measure.

MR. MITCHELL HENRY said, he thought the House would not consider it unreasonable that hon. Members from Ireland, sitting on the Government side of the House, should desire to take part in this debate; and still less unreasonable would they consider it if they were aware of the unconstitutional pressure put upon them with the view of causing them to desert their duty, and prove unworthy of the trust that had been reposed in them. He did not deny that this was a difficult and complicated subject; and in considering any difficult and complicated subject the proper course was to endeavour to arrive at the principle which underlay it. What, then, was the principle which underlay this proposal? It was this—that the time of the House of Commons belonged to the people. It was the property of the people of England, Ireland, and Scotland, and, in some measure, of the people of the Colonies, and of the Dependencies of the Crown. It was not the property of the House of Commons in any other sense than that the House of Commons was the trustee for all Her Majesty's subjects. For what purpose was that time given to them? It was for the purpose of alleviating the burdens of the people and making good and reforming bad laws. If, therefore, they did not make good use of this time they were doing wrong to those who sent them there. Now, he thought everyone would admit that the Procedure of that House might be improved. He should not, therefore, enter upon that question. The question he desired to deal with was much more serious. He desired to ask, were they deliberately wasting the time of the House? If they did waste that time they were worse than fraudulent trustees who wasted property or money committed to their care. Property or money could be restored; but time lost to the legislation of the country was gone for ever.

He deliberately said, then, that there was a number of individuals calling themselves a Party whose object in that House was to waste the time of Parliament, to make legislation impossible, and to cast a slur upon all their ancient institutions. That was a serious accusation to make, and he would not have made it were he not in a position to prove every word he said; and if the House would give him its attention for a few minutes he would endeavour to do so. To do this he asked the House to go back some years. In 1868 the present Head of the Government moved his Resolution with reference to the Disestablishment of the Irish Church. The Tory Ministry was defeated, and a General Election followed. It turned almost entirely upon questions relating to Ireland. It was an expression of the determination of the English people to put an end to the feud between England and Ireland, and, by redressing the grievances of the Irish people, to make both countries one harmonious nation. In 1869 the Protestant Church of Ireland was disestablished and disendowed. In 1870 they had the Land Bill. In 1871 and 1872 they had the Ballot Bill, an Act of far more importance to Ireland than to any other part of Her Majesty's Dominions. 1873 brought the Irish University Bill, which failed to get the acquiescence of Parliament. But what was passing in Ireland all this time? They had had the Fenian insurrection, which, if not entirely put down, was left unable to rear its formidable head; and the events of that time had greatly depressed the spirits of the people. With the view of remedying this state of things, in 1870 a few gentlemen met together in Dublin. They were, in a great measure, Conservatives—they were not those who usually took part in politics. They desired to see if it were not possible to raise the tone of the Irish people, and to obtain for them the measures they thought just. The Home Government Association was, therefore, formed. The General Election took place, and Mr. Butt was returned to Parliament as the Leader of the Party known as the Party of moderation and conciliation. In 1873 there took place a National Conference in Ireland, and it inaugurated a policy which was devised by Mr. Butt. That policy was based upon the belief that Parliament was desirous to do justice to the Irish people, but that it did not know what measures were requisite. Mr. Butt, who was above all a Constitutionalist, explained to his followers that the Irish Members ought to prepare all those Bills which they would wish the Cabinet to carry into law. Accordingly they did so. He himself belonged to that Party. They produced University Bills and Bills to amend the Parliamentary and municipal franchise. They pressed a series of measures upon the House; but one sentiment actuating them all was this—that it was their duty to conciliate English opinion, and to make the English people do Ireland justice by making them feel that justice was with the Irish demands. In 1875, however, Mr. Parnell was elected for Meath. For about one Session afterwards things went on tolerably quietly; then those who were in the House at the time would recollect that the system of Obstruction sprang up. That system of Obstruction was carried on with the avowed object of bringing Parliament into contempt, and preventing that Representative Institution, the House of Commons, from legislating. The House would not forget the first opportunity that presented itself of absolute and wearisome Obstruction. It was when the hon. Member for Cavan (Mr. Biggar) introduced a small cart-

load of Blue Books, and, for four consecutive hours, read extracts from these books in a voice inaudible and inarticulate, compelling the Speaker to remain in the Chair listening. That conduct gave great umbrage to Mr. Butt, to whose Party the hon. Member for Cavan then professed to belong; and when this Obstruction went a little further, Mr. Butt, on March 29th, 1879, addressed to the hon. Member for Cavan a letter, from which he was anxious to read an extract—

“The impression, rightly or wrongly, is that you and Mr. Parnell are actuated by a desire to obstruct the progress of Business, either from the wish to embarrass the Government, or, as is more generally thought, from the motive of putting the House to all the inconvenience in your power. No harder task was ever imposed on man, than that of trying to win respect and influence for the Irish Party in the House of Commons—a policy which I myself devised and placed before the country.”

He added that he had not time to write a similar letter to the hon. Member for Meath (Mr. Parnell), and asked the hon. Member for Cavan to show him this one.

Obstruction grew from day to day. Now, the great difference between Obstruction which was legitimate and the Obstruction which was resorted to by certain of the Irish Party was easily seen. Occasional Obstruction to great measures was a permissible thing in the House; but Obstruction on every occasion upon measures great and small, carried on for the purpose of Obstruction and delay, was unconstitutional, and rebellious against that House. That was the doctrine of Mr. Butt, and it was a true doctrine. Accordingly, on the 21st of April, Mr. Butt wrote to the hon. Member for Meath—

“Alienation of our English friends is not the only or the worst result that will follow from an unnecessary delay in the progress of Public Business. There is no Party so interested in the expedition and discharge of the Business of the House as the Irish Party. Believe me, that every hour during which we prevent the discussion of an English measure will be set down to the account of Ireland, and set down, in all probability, fourfold. The policy of Obstruction must alienate our truest and best English friends. It will expose us to the taunt of being unable to administer even the forms of our representative government, and end in discrediting and damaging every movement we make. But, if I urge these grounds of prudence, I am not insensible to that which is higher than all prudence—the duty of maintaining before the civilized world the dignity of the Irish nation and the Irish cause. That will only be done while we respect ourselves and our duties to the Assembly of which we are Members, an Assembly to degrade which is to strike a blow at representative institutions all over the world, a blow which will recoil with terrible severity on the very claims we make for our own country, but which, whatever may be its effects, would be unworthy of ourselves and of our cause.”

He (Mr. Mitchell Henry) thought the House would regard these published letters as worth reading at this time. But, of course, there was a Party in Ireland captivated with this new policy of Obstruction, and Mr. Butt had to deal with it. He accordingly wrote a letter to the Rev. Joseph Murphy, who was strongly inclined to support the new policy, in which he said—

“If once this policy of Obstruction be entered upon it will be impossible to carry anything in Parliament by discussion or debate. It is the abandonment of Constitutional and the adoption of unconstitutional action in its stead.”

Now, perhaps hon. Members recognized some connection between the unconstitutional action in that House and the unconstitutional “no rent” policy pursued out-of-doors. He saw a close connection. Mr. Butt went on—

“To what will it lead? No one will say that a perpetual obstruction of all Business is to be the perpetual condition of the British Parliament—Parliament must put down Obstruction, or Obstruction will put down Parliament. There is no rule that Parliament would not adopt, no Statute which it would not pass, rather than yield to the dictation of a few men who attempted to use the Forms of the House to destroy it.”

He concluded with this noble passage—

“I have learned to feel some pride in a seat in Parliament, and to set some value upon political influence and power; but, were these put before me, I would forfeit them for ever rather than betray my duty to my country—rather than resort to an unconstitutional course of conduct. I know it can have finally only this result—to bring to the cause of Ireland nothing but disaster and disgrace.”

Shortly after this, in 1878, Mr. Butt resigned the Leadership of the Party, and in 1879 he died a broken-hearted man. All that he had now said explained the reason of the difference which existed between Irish Members sitting on the Government Benches and Irishmen sitting on the Benches opposite. He would pursue this subject no further, except to say that, previous to the General Election of 1880, he published letters to his constituents and spoke frequently against the policy of Obstruction. Twice he met the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell) on political platforms, and twice, to the best of his ability, opposed his policy. No one, therefore, could now say that he was guilty of unfaithfulness to the trust of his constituents. He had been sent there, in fact, as an opponent of Obstruction, and as a supporter of Mr. Butt's policy of conciliation. As such, he had always spoken in that House, and as such he would continue to speak so long as he held his seat. He had shown, on the other hand, that the policy of hon. Gentlemen from Ireland sitting opposite was a new policy, which was not endorsed by the people of Ireland.

He now desired to say a few words with regard to the clôture. He had been always in favour of a reasonable and proper measure of clôture. Four years ago, in the Irish journals, he prophesied to hon. Members when they were entering upon this policy what it would lead to. Hon. Members opposite, whom he wished he could call his Friends, were ready to join the Conservative Party in opposing this measure. Did hon. Members from Ireland think the object of the Conservative Party was to protect them? Nothing of the kind. The Conservatives would be quite ready to support any measure for putting down hon. Members opposite. In fact, the Conservatives did not want any more than a simple majority in order to apply their favourite measure of putting down hon. Members one after another by the action of a penal Rule. It was absurd, therefore, for hon. Gentlemen opposite to expect to gain anything from a coalition with that Party. A great deal also had been said about an arithmetical puzzle; but the two ends of the scale of this clôture were devised for two different purposes. Would anyone say that a division in that House of upwards of 400 Members was not an adequate representation of the opinion of the House? What was debate for? It was useful only to inform the mind of the House; and if, when they came to divide, a representation of 400 Members or upwards was not enough to decide any question whatever by a simple majority, he should like to know how Business was to be carried on? A jury addressed by counsel, after hearing witnesses, constantly told the Judge that they had heard enough and wished to come to a decision; but hon. Members were not content to allow the House of Commons, when they were actually saturated with speeches, and unable to attend to or take in any more, to come to a decision. They objected to Mr. Speaker knowing the mind of the House from what he saw and from what was communicated to him, stating that he believed the House desired to divide and that the clôture should be put in operation. Hon. Members said it was a great hardship that a majority of 1 should settle whether they had heard enough; but they were quite content that the same majority of 1 should immediately after, in the same House, constituted in the same manner, settle all such questions as peace and war, or the fate of a Ministry. Then, with regard to the other end of the scale, what was the object of it? The object of it was to protect the minority. One hundred Members must be in the House, and the clôture could not be proposed unless 100 Members voted for it. Well, suppose, in that instance, they were to have a two-thirds or a three-fourths majority, what would be the effect? It would simply diminish the sense of responsibility which must rest with the occupant of the Chair, who would always remember that he had the protection of the minority in his trust. He believed that the duty of the Members of that House was exactly the same, whether they were from England, Scotland, or Ireland. They were Members not only for Ireland, but for an Imperial Empire. Probably they might eventually legislate for Irish subjects out of that House, but they must legislate for Imperial subjects in that House; and if they proposed, by action of theirs, to exercise an organized system of Obstruction towards the House of Commons, they were unfaithful to their trust. As Members of an Imperial Parliament, the Members, wherever they came from, had one common duty, and that was to preserve to the people of this country the priceless inheritance of a free Parliament—of a Parliament for which generations of men had laboured and fought and died—of a Parliament free to act as well as to speak, and which would not allow itself to be mocked with that counterfeit of freedom, the licence of a small minority. To preserve this precious inheri-

ance Parliament had suffered much, and had still much to suffer; and they, its Members, must suffer with it. They must take part in labours which for the time seemed fruitless, and endure tediousness that impaired their physical strength and disturbed their minds; but over all these things Parliament would triumph, and they should triumph with it—

“So sinks the day-star in the ocean bed,
And yet anon repairs his drooping head,
And tricks his beams, and with new-spangled ore
Flames in the forehead of the morning sky.”

MR. SEXTON said, he should not trouble the House with any remarks upon the poetical peroration of the hon. Member for Galway. The question with which they had to deal was one merely of a practical character, and he believed they could effectually deal with it in prose. What was called the unapproachable gravity of the occasion was now before them. It was doubted in some quarters a few days ago; but incidents which had lately come to light proved that in the mind of the Government, as well as in their minds, the occasion was one of unapproachable gravity. He had been accused of causing offence and uttering insult, because he had intimated his belief that the tactical arrangements of the Government rendered it convenient for them to imprison the votes of three Members of that House. But was he not in a large measure justified, when he found that the Government had suddenly broken off a delicate and confidential mission to bring one vote from the Tiber to the Thames? It was as unpleasant to him as to any Member of that House to cause offence or give insult to anyone; but when public duty required him to express his convictions, he cared not what the result might be, and though the conclusion he drew might be offensive, mature consideration convinced him that it was the true conclusion. An attempt had been made to make it appear that the people of Ireland felt little interest in the question then before the House. He called the attention of the House to the fact that it was too familiar to them that every avenue for the free expression of Constitutional opinion had been closed in Ireland, that the leaders of the people, the clergy of the people, and some of the bravest and best of the women of Ireland were pining in gaol. Such a moment was not the moment when it could be expected that the people of Ireland would dare not merely the civil, but the military power of this great Empire in the expression of their public feeling. What a story the Irish journals told them to-day of attempts made by the electors of Ireland—by those electors whose rights were sacred as those of electors in this country—of attempts made by them to meet together and instruct and suggest to their Representatives what course they ought to take, and in these attempts terrorized and prevented by those outsiders in Ireland who represented the territorial interest, and by those military and those police whose pay they in the House were expected to vote with silence and with tame assent. It was impossible at such a moment for the electors of Ireland to give expression to their feelings. They could, however, do so indirectly by making a recently liberated “suspect” Chairman of a Board of Guardians in place of a Lord who had held the position for 20 years. Those were the protests which the people made against the Algerian, and worse than Algerian, hold on the country which was maintained by this country. He was proud to say that the Irish journals left no doubt of the opinions of the Irish people upon this question. In despite of their military and police, meetings had been held, and wherever they had been held one voice had gone forth, and that voice had said that any attempt to silence or to restrict the Irish Representatives in that House should meet with the condemnation of the Irish people, and that any man who was accessory to the success of that attempt should meet with their hatred and their contempt. That evening had snowed telegraphic messages from the Lobby of the House of Commons. He and his hon. Friends about him had received telegrams beyond number, informing them of letters, of messages, and of memorials addressed to Irish Members who sat on the Government side of the House, praying them to have no hand in this ignoble and base attempt to silence the Representatives of their people. A Petition had reached him which the Forms of the House would not allow him to present, which was signed in a few hours by 1,400 electors of the City of Dublin, praying those Irish Members who sat on Government Benches on that occasion to vote for the Irish people. He passed from this part of the subject by saying that in spite of the extraordinary difficulties, in spite of the most complicated and most universal terrorism prevailing over the face of Ireland, the Irish people had left no doubt of the feelings with which they regarded these attempts of the present Government. The interposition in that debate of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, coupled, as it had been, with the equally significant silence of his right hon. Colleague the President of the Board of Trade, was an episode too singular to escape attention. It was not often even in that House of late that they had been favoured with the right hon. Gentleman's eloquence. It was certainly strange that one whose tongue for 40 years had moved as freely, as actively, and with as little moral constraint, derived from consideration for the feelings of others as that of any man in the House of Commons or in England—that he should appear that night as the advocate of a measure which proposed to deprive his fellow-Members of even the right to brief and moderate speech. He repeated that the right hon. Gentleman had never been distinguished in his public speeches for either brevity or moderation. And it was he who now proposed to deprive his fellow-Members of the right to even brief and moderate speech. For, if the clôture were ever in operation, as he had no doubt it would be, when once the majority had declared their will, although some men might have spoken with neither brevity nor moderation, every man afterwards would be shut out from doing so, however brief or moderate might be the remarks he proposed to address to the House. He could, to some extent, understand the attitude assumed by the right hon. Gentleman. Men hated to be confronted with their cast-off principles. It was from the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman that proceeded the terse and pregnant maxim that "force is no remedy." Force had been proved to be no remedy. And he and his friends, who knew well the evil to which that maxim had reference—who knew that it would prove to be the grave of a reputation, the moral ruin of a great Party and its disastrous failure—they knew, then, that force would be no remedy. But the right hon. Gentleman apprehended that Irish Members in that House would come from time to time to accumulate proofs in that House of the truth of his own principles, would endeavour to prove to him and to the House that force was no remedy. The ease and dignity of the Treasury Bench had had such an effect upon that man of a fiery tongue who wielded the fierce passions of a democracy that he did not wish any longer to be confronted with his own principles raised in protestation against him. The right hon. Gentleman did not wish to hear those things; he wished to buy oblivion—to live alone like the lotus-eaters described by the Laureate, and to forget his past. After the speech which they had heard that night—a speech full of sad recollections of moral retrogression as well as of intellectual decay; after that speech he would have a cruel heart who could wish the right hon. Gentleman a heavier punishment than he would endure in those still hours of reflection and retrospection which occurred in the life of every man, and when he would remember that he had been the mouth-piece of a coercive Ministry after the greatness and magnificence of his past career. The right hon. Gentleman, before he ever saw him, before he thought that anybody would see him in the cruel position which he occupied that night, employed in one of his addresses, with great force and dignity, an illustration from the Scriptures. The right hon. Gentleman on that occasion, referring to some offers of office and dignity which had been made to him, reminded his audience of the story of the Shunamite woman. He said that when a person asked the Shunamite woman, who had done some public service worthy of reward—"Shall I speak for thee to the King, or to the Captain of the Host?" the Shunamite woman replied—"No; I will dwell among my own people." Since then the right hon. Gentleman had reconsidered the subject. His view of the Shunamite woman had changed since that earlier day, and the position in which they found him to-night was that the Shunamite woman had come under the influence of the Captain of the Host. He did not know whether it was the right hon. Gentleman who once compared the Ministers of this country to a row of extinct volcanoes. [Cries of "No!"] The remark, he was now told, was made by a deceased statesman, and it might be most fitly applied to the men now occupying the Treasury Bench. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster was the most complete extinct volcano at present existing in the world. Formerly his eruptions were full of violence and splendour; but what remained now of the democratic volcano of England? Nothing more than the empty void and the cold crust that once was living fire. The observations of the right hon. Gentleman, indirect and remote from the subject, could not be dignified with the name of argument. With what propriety and reason did the right hon. Gentleman compare the practice of public meetings with the Procedure of this supreme deliberative Assembly? Public meetings were not deliberative assemblies, and did not affect, except in rare cases, public opinion beyond their own vicinity. Moreover, they were generally held by persons of one particular opinion for the purpose of registering a decree. Moreover, when a speaker became unpleasant at a public meeting, the way to silence him was by clamour. The right hon. Gentleman ventured somewhat rashly into the arithmetic of this question; but he might much better have left the "stern and unbending lines of arithmetic" to the care of the Prime Minister himself, who was known to be a master in that department. His rashness in dealing with the arithmetical aspect of the case appeared in the remarkable omissions which occurred. In his argument he dealt pretty exhaustively with the case of minorities, and he endeavoured to show that small minorities would have the intellectual delight of being overborne by majorities much larger than themselves; but for a right hon. Gentleman of so frank and so unreserved a career, it was singular, to say the least of it, that he paused at the point where minorities become large, and he shrunk from giving his opinion of the moral or material worth of a majority of, say, 201 overpowering a minority of 200. He came now to consider the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman with regard to Members from Ireland. He had noticed that it was ever politicians of fastidious lives who hurled extreme charges against other men. He might search the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman, and look, for instance, at that famous passage about the British Lion, in which the right hon. Gentleman expressed a wish that the beast or the brute were dead. If he were to look at that and at other passages of fierce, he would not say of coarse, invective with which the right hon. Gentleman had often assailed his fellow-subjects of the Crown, and, perhaps, virtually even the Crown itself, he should find as many passages as seriously open to rebuke, and even to denunciation, as any which could be found in speeches spoken by Members on that side of the House. What was the characteristic argument by which the right hon. Gentleman endeavoured to politically defile the Irish Party? Was it for any language spoken by them in that House, or for any article in their political policy, or for any manifesto, document, or speech issued by any meeting of the Party, or any Member of the Party, in the Dominions of the Queen? The right hon. Gentleman spoke of the Oath of Allegiance. It was a dramatic touch on which the right hon. Gentleman, a great master of dramatic touches, relied to awaken the passions of those around him. But they never swore allegiance to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, or to the Government of which he was a Member. They swore allegiance to the Sovereign of this country. [Ironical cheers from the Ministerial side.] That cheer was ungenerous, if not unmeaning, considering the quarter from which it came. They had pursued objects and sought for purposes compatible and consistent with the Oath of Allegiance; and they defied the Chancellor of the Duchy and the Prime Minister to find in the action of their Party, as a whole, or in the action of individuals, any declarations or acts incompatible or inconsistent with that Oath. The right hon. Gentleman's rhetorical reference to the Oath of Allegiance was not a thing of very pregnant meaning. He (Mr. Sexton) had his own understanding, as every man had, of the Oath of Allegiance. He did not concur with the views of Paley, their great English writer, who, after six elaborate essays, by which he endeavoured to prove the meaning and the force of the Oath of Allegiance, left it in a much

foggier condition than he found it. The meaning of the Oath of Allegiance was not open to considerable doubt; and he maintained that for any purposes which they had avowed, as for any objects which they had sought, the scope for free action, the scope for free expression, and the scope for public effort left to them by the Oath of Allegiance was quite sufficient for them for all their purposes. What was the argument by which the right hon. Gentleman desired, at this critical moment, to cast discredit on the Party to which he (Mr. Sexton) had the honour to belong? Two hon. Gentlemen—the Member for the borough of Wexford (Mr. Healy) and the Member for the borough of Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor)—happened to be in America on a political mission—a mission of life and death to their people, who were being evicted and subjected to the worst influences of despair, and who were thrown into a condition of actual starvation, at a time when the landlords of Ireland, with the tacit encouragement of the Government, were allowed to persevere in acts of tyranny and cruelty. The right hon. Gentleman and the House knew full well that the mass of the Irishmen who had gone from Ireland to the various countries of the world had taken with them a burning and a bitter hatred of the Government of England. [Mr. ARCHDALE: As many Protestants went as Roman Catholics.] He (Mr. Sexton) feared the hon. Member's arithmetic was not accurate; but, at all events, he seemed to be unaware of the fact that the Protestants evicted from Ulster in the last century were some of the sturdiest and stoutest soldiers who fought on the American side in the War of Independence, which wrested the brightest jewel from the British Crown. The men who met at Chicago were the men, or the sons of men, who had been turned out of their humble homes in Ireland by virtue of tyrannical Land Laws, which no one had condemned with more eloquence than the right hon. Gentleman himself. They saw their roof-trees torn down by the crowbar, they saw the fires put out upon their fathers' hearths, they had to rend the dearest ties of men's affections, they left the shores of Ireland with eyes blinded by tears, and they went to a foreign land with bitter hatred in their hearts to that tyrannical system which caused their expatriation; and he challenged any Member of the House to deny that it was the dearest hope of that great mass of Irishmen, wherever they were situated in this wide world, to free the people of Ireland from at least the existing system of British rule—that system which corroded the national life of Ireland, and which took out of the hands of the people of Ireland their own national resources. The hon. Members for Wexford and Galway found themselves in America, and what were they to do? Were they, in order to gratify the new found fastidiousness of the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, which they, not being prophets, could not have anticipated—were they to keep away from this assembly of their countrymen—were they to isolate themselves from their own kith and kin and, in the midst of the great mass of patriotic and high-minded Irishmen on the American Continent, to proclaim themselves not Irishmen, but Englishmen? They attended the Convention as spectators. They did not speak. The Government had endeavoured to mix up the matter of the Convention with other matters. They attended the Convention; and because they did not make themselves the mouth-pieces of the Birmingham school, or some other school of English politics; because they were true to the traditions of Irish history and true to the political gospel of the Irish race, the right hon. Gentleman arraigned them in that House as traitors to the Crown. They had a perfect right to attend as spectators. If he (Mr. Sexton) had been in America he should have considered it his first duty to have been at that gathering. [Cries of "Oh!" from the Ministerial Benches and Irish cheers.] Not because he should regard himself bound by the proceedings of that Convention, not because he should consider the Irish people at home bound by any extreme action which in other countries and under other circumstances might be taken by the Irish race; but because he should deem it his first duty, as one concerned in fighting the cause of the Irish people, to attend that great representative gathering of Irishmen in America, to learn from them directly, with his own ears, the feelings of the Irish race in America. No politician interested in the future of Irish affairs should be without that important information; and, therefore, he held that his hon. Friends attending that meeting were availing themselves of an educational agency of the greatest value. More significance than that he refused to give to the incident, and he could not help saying that the use made of it by the right hon. Gentleman was unworthy of him, and unworthy of any Minister; and least of all should it have proceeded from a Minister who, in his speeches and in his life, had certainly gone to the utmost possible limits allowed to an English agitator. The question before the House was—"Hear, hear!"—if he had departed from the question it was because the right hon. Gentleman had persisted in taking him from Westminster to America—the question before the House concerned, primarily and chiefly, the two great English Parties. ["No, no!"] He spoke with the most unequivocal frankness. He did not think it greatly concerned the Irish Party, which had in the House up to that time, whatever might be thought by others, touched only the fringe of Parliamentary activity. The proceedings of the Legislature were so complicated, and in its capacity for business it so far transcended the power of any other Legislative Assembly, that, no matter what Rules might be devised—clôture or no clôture—it would be impossible for it, looking at the vast ambit of its Business, and considering the infinite variety of the Business it had to manage, to prevent any Member of it, possessing the spirit of a man, from making their activity permeate—permanently permeate—every department of the Legislature. He was not an Englishman, neither was he a Representative of an English constituency; but the House would allow him for the moment to take the part of an English spectator, and tell them, with as much impartiality as they would give him credit for, what he thought the effect of the clôture would be upon the future of that Assembly. As an Irishman he felt that the miseries, the misfortunes, the discontent, and disaffection of his country had sprung from the spirit which had governed the House in past times, and the laws which had been the emanation of that spirit. If he had been an Englishman born and bred, whether a representative Englishman or not, he should take a pride in the records of its acts, and in the influence which it had brought to bear upon the history of the world and the course of the human race. He would admit that that Assembly had been, to a large extent, the upholder of class, and that its enactments had borne the brand of class legislation. But he was bound to say that the Parliament of England had struck its roots deep into the hearts and history of the English people. It was an ancient and a proud Parliament; and although it might not have responded very speedily or successfully to the demands of the English people, yet he would say, as an Irishman, endeavouring for a moment to eradicate his own prepossessions, that the House had slowly, though surely, responded to the general needs and wishes. It was an ancient and a proud Parliament; and, therefore, if he had been an Englishman, he should take pride in it. It had the capacity both to rule the affections of the English people and to take the leading place in the Assemblies of the world. What was the secret of that power? First, it was the position—the unexampled position—held by the Speaker of the House of Commons. He was not under an obligation to please any Party, or to have regard to any Party. He was elected by one Party, and often kept in Office by the other Party, which showed the thorough belief of both sides of the House in the impartiality that characterized the high Office of the greatest Commoner in England. This House, conscious of its strength, had always, with the common sense that Englishmen claimed, postponed the hour of victory of the majority till the minority had been fully heard. The minority of the House were actuated by such loyalty to their Party that, having once been allowed to argue their case, they went quietly into the Lobby and accepted their defeat in a loyal and law-abiding spirit. These were the secrets of the power of that House; but, if the Government had their will, would this power continue? Would Parliament continue to inspire the respect and affection of the people of England? Would it be any longer called the Parliament of free speech? The Government sought to establish a system by which a majority, without regard to the minority, would be enabled to say they would hear no further debate. The majority and the Party in power were convertible terms; and in future, he appre-

divisions. The right hon. Gentleman could not deny that, next to himself, the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) had the most perfect knowledge of the Bill. It followed, then, that the resistance of the Irish Party to the Coercion Bill was the real cause of this gagging Resolution. If the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman in The Nineteenth Century could possibly apply to any condition of things as the justification of any Party, his words and sentiments might stand on record as the justification of the Irish Members for their obstinate resistance to a measure which they knew to be undeserved. And what terms could be extreme in denouncing the Coercion Bill? It was an Act ostensibly passed against crime, but really used to put down political agitation. It was an Act which, according to the Treasury Bench, was directed against the disorderly classes in Ireland; but it was used against the leaders of the people, against the clergy, and against ladies of a highly respectable position and of unstained life. The Irish people upheld the Irish Party in their opposition to the Resolution; and he challenged the right hon. Gentleman to turn to his own article in The Nineteenth Century, and by his own words and sentiments the Irish Party would be justified. This Resolution was, as he had said, not only an act of revenge, but it was a mobilization of forces directed against Ireland. The last speech of the Chief Secretary for Ireland was a warning of what the Irish people had to expect, though the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, indeed, understood the melodramatic business better. The speech in which the right hon. Gentleman, with intonations of ungovernable passion in his voice, and fierce light in his eye, pledged the Government to further and more drastic measures of coercion, was a warning to the House, and to every Member, no matter on which side he might sit, who derived his mandate from the Irish people, of the moral significance of the vote he would give to-night. Let there be no mistake. If he voted for the Resolution he would vote for further coercion. A year of folly had not been enough for the Government—a year of disaster and disgrace had not been enough, and half a year in which to reconsider their course and their steps had not been enough. They did not seem disposed to take the salutary advice tendered by the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies (Mr. Courtney) to make an effort to bring the law in Ireland into harmony with the convictions and associations of the people. That was done in every civilized country; but the determination of the Government, so far as they could discover it from their dark hints and blacker looks, was to persevere in their course of despotism, and to force the people, by their Algerine enactments, into collision with the law. He did not believe they would succeed in that object. As the gag imposed upon Ireland had proved ineffective, so he believed the additional gag that would be imposed upon the House of Commons would not help them out of their difficulty. For himself, so filled was he by the burning passion which agitated the Irish mind on this question that no human consideration would make him hesitate in the vote he would give. Some time ago The Times said to Irishmen—"We do not pass what laws you ask, but we listen to what you have to say; and, unreasonable and passionate Celts that you are, what more can you desire?" He thought that a very inconclusive argument, for to listen to a man was a small satisfaction if you did not give him what he wanted. But the Government had advanced on The Times, which was willing to listen. The Government would neither grant nor listen. Irishmen were not only to have their demands refused, but their speeches silenced. So deep was the feeling of Irishmen on this question, that if he were an Irish Member who had incurred, by his past conduct, the hatred of the Irish people, he would endeavour, by his vote to-night, cast in favour of freedom of speech, to obtain immunity for any fault he had committed, and he believed that by so doing he might atone for errors in the past; because a vote given at a critical moment, in the face of the social and political influences which the Government could bring to bear, would show his sympathy and solidarity with the Irish people. As for himself, his constituents had sent him no message. He believed they had confidence in him, and he hoped he would never do anything which would lead them to withdraw that confidence. But if he were to vote with the Government to-night, he should regard this night as one from which to date his political outlawry in Ireland.

[Fifth Night.]

The vote of this night would be for years to come the starting-point of political criticism and denunciation in Ireland, for the Irishman who, by his vote now, should violate the trust placed in him by the people, would seal his own political extinction. For his own part, he would prefer that his name should go down to posterity with the Masseys, the Corydons, and the Armstrongs, than that it should be said that, as an Irish Member, he followed the Government into the Lobby—a Government which had filled the gaols with the leaders of the Irish people, and with their priests and women, and who struck thereby the deadliest blow at the rights and honour of Ireland.

MR. CHAPLIN: It did not need the stirring and eloquent address of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright), which we heard in the early part of the evening, to convince me that the Prime Minister was more than justified in asking the House to consider the existing Rules which govern the Business of the House of Commons. We, who sit on this side of the House, are in entire accord with the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster in this—that we acknowledge the propriety, and, I may say, the absolute necessity, of some change being made, unless the House of Commons is to sink beyond the power of recall in the mind and estimation of the country. I can only say this much in addition—that however much we may differ as to the mode in which this change is to be effected, however much we may be opposed to the particular proposal of the right hon. Gentleman, yet, not the less is the House of Commons indebted to him for seriously endeavouring to grapple with what is acknowledged, on all sides, to be a great, a growing, and an intolerable evil. Having said this much, I hope my motives will not be misconstrued if I say this also to the House—that while I am prepared, as far as I am concerned, to agree to almost any alteration of our Rules which can be shown to be requisite in order to restore the character and useful purposes of this Assembly, yet I am diametrically opposed to the 1st Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman. And I am opposed to it not only on its merits, and because it contains what I regard as the mischievous and dangerous principles of a general clôture, but because I consider that it is not the right mode of procedure; and, because, if carried to-morrow, it would not be an efficacious mode of dealing with the mischief we have to encounter. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has given us a description of these evils to-night; but before I proceed to examine them, I desire to say a few words in answer to the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, and then, with the permission of the House, I should like to point out one or two objections to the clôture which have not been raised, I think, up to the present time. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster commenced his observations by informing us that he could not conceive what was the cause of our attitude on this side of the House; and he followed that up by the frank admission that if he had been in Opposition he should have treated the question from a purely Party point of view. The right hon. Gentleman also told us that we ought to agree that some real and effective remedy is called for. Now, we do agree with that; but our point is this, that the remedy is not a real one, and that if carried it would not be effective. The right hon. Gentleman said—"Is this Resolution effective or not? That is the question you have to consider." Then he added—"It is a simple and moderate remedy; but it is not severe enough." I quite admit that it is simple. Whether it is moderate and wanting in severity is another question altogether; and that it is not likely to be effective, I hope to be able to show the House before I bring my observations to a close. The right hon. Gentleman ridiculed the idea that under any circumstances the Speaker could introduce the clôture when there was so narrow a majority as 1 in 200. If that is the case, what objection can there be to giving the majority of two-thirds, which is asked for by some hon. Gentlemen on that side of the House. In the second place, I would venture to point out to the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster that there are frequently a considerable number of hon. Gentlemen in the Lobby and the Smoking Rooms, and in other parts of the House, and that it would, consequently, be impossible for the Speaker to arrive at an accurate estimate of the evident sense of the House. There are two objections to the clôture, which seem to have escaped the attention of the right hon Gentleman, to which I wish to draw the attention of the House for a moment. The first of them is this—that if the clôture is to be habitually used in our debates—and if it is not to be so used I really do not see what is the object of passing it—then it is obvious that in future, in any considerable debate, only a limited number of hon. Gentlemen will be able to exercise what is at present their undoubted right of liberty to speak; that, in fact, whenever the intending speakers are more numerous than usual, only a certain number of them can be heard, and a certain number of them must be inevitably excluded. If that be so, then arises at once the very important question, how are these speakers in future to be selected? At the present moment that selection is left, by the universal consent and concurrence of the House, entirely to Mr. Speaker; because every hon. Member knows quite well that, however often he may be disappointed in his endeavour to catch the Speaker's eye, sooner or later his time will come, and that before the close of the debate he will have an opportunity of addressing the House, if he continues to think that what he desires to say warrants him in continuing his endeavour to address the House. But under the clôture all that will be changed. The time will come when the clôture will be demanded, and then it will be absolutely too late; and, whatever the impartiality of the Speaker may be, he will be unable, when the evident sense of the House is clear, and the clôture has been asserted, to call on any further speaker to address the House. It will practically come to this—that the first, the chief, and the greatest of all our privileges at the present time—namely, the right to speak—will be exercised in future, not as a matter we have a right to claim, but solely at the mercy or discretion or the vision of the Chair, or whatever you may be pleased to call it. Really, that is a responsibility so great, a power so novel, and so tremendous in its character, that, although I do not doubt that many of us, even in a case like this, would be disposed to make an exception, Sir, in your favour, as long as you are the occupant of that Chair, I do not believe that the House of Commons would ever be willing permanently to place in the hands of some unknown individual who may be your successor, however lofty his position, and however distinguished his ability and character; and then it comes to this—if I rightly interpret the sentiment of the House—that we should have to come to some arrangement by which everyone who desires to take part in a debate would have to ballot for precedence precisely as we ballot now with regard to precedence for Motions and Bills. Would such a course be likely to improve the character of our debates; or would it not be likely to lead to some curious and unexpected debates? For instance, the possible exclusion, if they were unlucky in the ballot, of the Leaders on either side of the House, who desired to take part in a debate; and it would lead to circumstances of a ridiculous or of a highly inconvenient character, and, as far as I can judge, in all probability, both. But, assuming that Mr. Speaker should never think it right to initiate the clôture before the Leaders of the House have spoken, and if you did not have this ballot, then I foresee that another inconvenience, quite possible, and, I believe, highly probable, would happen. And it is this. Whenever the clôture was imminent, and there were still many hon. Members who desired to speak, if the Leaders of the House rose to wind up the debate, in company with several other hon. Members who rose at the same time, and the Leader of the House was selected by the Speaker, then the clôture, almost immediately afterwards, would be naturally expected; and what would probably happen then would be this—that some Friend of an hon. Member who had risen, but who had not been called upon to address the House, would, strictly in accordance with the existing Rules of the House, immediately make a Motion to this effect—that the hon. Member who had risen, and had not been called upon, should be “now heard,” or “do now speak.” That would be a Motion strictly in accordance with our existing Rules; and the House will observe that, in a case like that, it would be made from no want of courtesy towards the Leader of the House, and from no disrespect to the Chair, but as the sole chance of obtaining for a Member the opportunity of speaking. It is evident that a matter of that kind would lead to wrangling, debate, and division. It would be repeated again and again; and I am convinced that in this way there would be absolutely a loss of more time than would be gained if your Resolution was carried as it is now. If the House will give me their patience for a very few moments—passing over many of the objections which have been urged to the clôture—I wish to examine the precise nature of the evils with which we have to deal at the present time. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster has described them at some length to-night; and he attributed them, perhaps with some justice, mainly to the Irish Members. The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the Prime Minister gave a somewhat different description of those evils on the opening night of the debate. And here, again, we are considerably indebted to the right hon. Gentleman, who has placed these evils clearly and distinctly before the House. I have carefully read the speech of the right hon. Gentleman again since I heard the statement which he made; and this is the description he gives of the evils. He said—

“There are two great evils which form the salient feature of the picture before us. One of them is the great increase in the labours of the House; the other is the diminution in power on the part of this Assembly to perform them.”

Now, Sir, I can say nothing in regard to the proposals of the right hon. Gentleman for delegating a certain portion of the labours of the House, because they are not now before us. But, with regard to the second great evil—the main evil we have to deal with—namely, the diminution in the power of the House to perform its labours, the right hon. Gentleman made this statement, which I beg the House to observe—

“By that diminution of power I mean this—namely, the diminution of power on the part of this Assembly over its own Members individually.”

Therefore, the loss of power of its Members individually is the main evil, according to the right hon. Gentleman, with which we have to deal, and which we have to consider at the present time. With that description I entirely agree with the right hon. Gentleman. Formerly the House had the exercise of power over its individual Members, not by any Rules or regulations, as the right hon. Gentleman pointed out on the occasion to which I refer, but by virtue of that deference almost invariably paid by the Members of the House whenever the will of the House is clearly and unmistakably expressed. Now, that power in great degree is gone. And why? Because—and I will again quote the authority of the right hon. Gentleman—the deference which was paid 20, or 30, or 40 years ago is no longer paid universally by individuals to the House. I can supplement that statement by experience of my own—experience, I am happy to say, which does not extend over more than half of 30 years, but which is sufficient to enable me to corroborate his view of the deference formerly paid. So far I go entirely with the Prime Minister in his description of the evil. I am ready to agree, and I believe both sides of the House are ready to agree, to almost any alteration in order to restore to this Assembly the power over its individual Members which it has lost, which can be shown to be requisite and adequate for the purpose. But I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that this power over individual Members is one thing, and the power of the majority to suppress a whole minority collectively is another thing altogether. And when I come to the remedies which the right hon. Gentleman proposes, then I am afraid that he and I must part company altogether. Let me now turn to a speech made by another hon. Member, a supporter of the Government, whom I do not now see in his place. I allude to the hon. Member for Glamorganshire (Mr. Hussey Vivian). The hon. Member, with a blunt and frank admission, which left nothing to be desired, said—“Formerly we always had a clôture, and a very effective one it was. In those halcyon days,” he said—

“Our debates were conducted in a good old-fashioned and gentlemanlike style, by mutual understanding. The Whips on either side arranged the day of division by an agreement between themselves; and if any hon. Member ventured to address the House after we thought we had had enough, why we simply howled him down.”

Whatever may be said of the old-fashioned practice of howling down, nobody can deny that there is a great deal of truth in what is said. Formerly hon. Members did yield to the manifest disposition of the House; and when that disposition was evinced, either by the howling of the hon. Member for Glamorganshire or in any other way, it was a clôture, and a clôture of a very effective kind. Let me ask the House this question—What kind of clôture was it that was found so effective at that time? That is a question which I desire to submit to the candid and impartial consideration of independent Members. Certainly it was not a general clôture, such as that demanded by the right hon. Gentleman. Nobody can deny that if a Minister or an ex-Minister, or a Member of great authority, thought it necessary to rise in his place, even after the Leader of the House had wound up the debate, to point out, perhaps, something of great importance which had escaped the observation of the House, the howling clôture would never have been applied to him. No one would have dreamt of it. On the contrary, he would have been listened to with all the respect his position demanded and deserved. Therefore, I say that it certainly was not a general clôture like that we are asked to sanction now, but a kind of clôture which was applied and limited strictly to individuals, and to individuals only, who, neither very wise nor very judicious, in all probability had failed to appreciate the general sense and disposition of the House. What is the only inference we can draw? Why, that the Prime Minister and his supporters, instead of proceeding with the 1st Resolution, ought to agree to an Amendment which was placed on the Paper almost immediately after the scheme of the Government was announced, and which, in place of a general clôture, substituted an individual clôture. Well, Sir, that is my answer to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster; and when he asks us whether we are not willing to make some small alteration in our Rules in order to maintain the character of this Assembly, I say that is what a great majority of Members on this side of the House would like to do. Now, Sir, what can be the objections to this proposition? The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department threw no light on the matter. He was followed by the hon. Member for Bedford (Mr. Whitbread); but he left the matter in very much the same condition as it was left by the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I do not wish to go into what these hon. and right hon. Gentlemen said, because I do not wish to detain the House a moment longer than I can help; but it seems to me that a proposal of this kind would really cover almost everything that we want; it would, at all events, exactly meet the evil which the right hon. Gentleman has so accurately described, and it was no small recommendation of it that it would enable us to dispense with all the other alterations in the Rules which were proposed by the Government. I am afraid that, in this respect, I shall be in a minority even on this side of the House, as far as I can judge from the speeches of right hon. Gentlemen sitting on the Front Opposition Bench; but none the less do I adhere to my own firm conviction that our existing Rules ought not to be lightly tampered with or altered. Depend upon it, they have been adopted in former days for good and weighty reasons, they have grown up from the wisdom and experience of ages, they are the guardians of our privileges, and the safeguards of our liberties and rights; and I, for one, should be most unwilling, as regards the major part of them, to see anything like a sweeping alteration in them, and especially because a system of individual clôture, such as I would like to see adopted, would render any material change in the existing Rules unnecessary. Take the case of Motions for Adjournment at Question time. The power of moving the Adjournment is a privilege which I value highly, as one which, under certain circumstances, may be of great use to the Opposition. At the same time, I frankly admit the privilege has been much and grossly abused very often of late; but see what would be the effect of individual clôture in a case like this. Now, the remonstrances of Mr. Speaker are often made in vain; but, then, if the admonition of Mr. Speaker be disregarded, I assume he would probably rise almost immediately and caution the hon. Member offending, and if that were not sufficient, it would be in the power of the House to instantaneously silence the hon. Member by a Motion that he be no longer heard. Well, Sir, I shall be told, I suppose, that that would involve a great waste of time in the divisions taken for the purpose of silencing such hon. Members. I do not believe it for a moment, and for this reason—that with this latent power in reserve divisions would become unnecessary. You may be certain that except in some cases of great importance, which might warrant a Motion for Adjournment, hon. Members would yield at once to Mr. Speaker; and if, in addition, the House should think fit to order that for the first offence the hon. Member should be silenced for the night, and for the second offence for a week or month and so on, I am certain that the House would very soon discover that it had found a new and simple, but a most efficient weapon, a weapon which would enable the House to instantaneously compel, by the exercise of its authority, that which formerly was invariably yielded by hon. Gentlemen in this Assembly—namely, submission to the dictates of good feeling and good taste. I am well aware, Sir, that I really have no right or claim to intrude upon the House at an hour such as this. It is not because I have not risen before, and if hon. Gentlemen will do me the favour to listen to what I have to say I promise them I shall not detain them more than a very few moments more. I was about to observe that all we desire at the present time, and what above all we ought, as far as possible, to endeavour to accomplish, is to restore, as far as may be, the tone and the temper which formerly prevailed in this Assembly. That is what we ought to aim at now, and that is exactly what your 1st Resolution never is likely to accomplish. Your 1st Resolution is a contrivance for punishing the many for the offences of the few; it is a contrivance, not for the suppression of offending individuals only, but for the suppression of an unoffending Party; and, consequently, it is also a contrivance to irritate a whole minority. Well, Sir, I ask the House, is that the way, do you think, to bring about a restoration of a spirit of conciliation and of general deference, such as we all desire to see? I must apologize to the House for having taken up so much of its time. I really would not have done so; but it does seem to me that this question is as essentially one for independent Members as it is for the Leaders of the House. This is not the first time I have offered my opinions to the House on the subject. More than once I have endeavoured to submit them to the House, with the fate which usually attends upon the efforts of private Members. During the last Parliament, and at a time when the proceedings in this House had already become the scandal and the amazement of the world, but when, I am bound to say, the subject did not possess the same paramount interest to the Prime Minister which it possesses at the present time, I submitted these views to the House. I am convinced that it is in this direction that we must look for the ultimate solution of all our troubles and our difficulties at the present time; and it is because I am convinced that, so far from having the effect which you anticipate, your Resolution will have a precisely opposite effect, and will lead to mischiefs in the future, worse even than the disease—mischiefs of every character and of every kind—I, for one, must give an uncompromising opposition to the Resolution which is now proposed. Well, Sir, I am not much disturbed, I must confess, by the rumours of a crisis which are hovering in the air. I do not believe a word about it, and I do not believe the Government will resign, even if the vote taken to-night is adverse to them. [“No!”] An hon. Member says “No!” I will tell him why. Because, if they did, they would occupy a most ludicrous position; and when the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India comes down to this House with a speech of menace and resignation in his pocket, he ought to remember that he serves under a Chief who has expressly declared, on the opening night of this debate, that this Resolution which is now before us is not the most important Resolution of the series he proposes. For a Government to talk of resignation on an Amendment which, on the showing of the Prime Minister, is more or less a subsidiary Resolution, is the most ludicrous thing I ever heard. The noble Lord ought to show more courage on the eve of a general engagement. If the case of the Government is a good one, what reason is there to be alarmed; if it is a bad one, I venture to say that the sooner they recede from their position the better. I think the noble Lord should be very careful for many reasons, for his action may be calculated to give colour to some absurd stories which have been going the round of the Lobbies, and which I have seen in the newspapers, as to the curious postscripts which the noble Lord is sometimes supposed to add to some of his correspondence. I do not believe it for one moment; but, whatever may be the fate which is in store for Her Majesty's Government, of this at least I am assured, that if the right hon. Gentleman persists in forcing upon the House of Commons a policy and a principle which is repugnant to the instincts of the great majority of the Liberal Party, and of Gentlemen of all opinions in the House, no long time will elapse before he will discover that he has again accomplished the political destruction of his Party and his Friends, that he has done this for the third and last time in a great career, the most brilliant, I admit, but the most strange and the most disastrous, in the political annals of our history and our time.

MR. DILLWYN said, that as one who had long been a Member of the House, and who had a reverence for its traditions, he wished to rescue it from falling into the position of a debating society. The right hon. and gallant Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley) had stated that a great number of Members on the Liberal side of the House thoroughly disliked the clôture, and, therefore, objected to this Resolution. That might be so; but, sitting among them as he (Mr. Dillwyn) did, he had certainly not heard them express their dislike, and, indeed, he failed to remember a time when there had been so general a concurrence of opinion. Even the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire must admit that, seeing that he had enumerated and accounted for the few hon. Members on the Liberal side of the House who would vote against the Government. He should not have ventured to obtrude himself in the debate if his name had not been mentioned as one of those who was formerly opposed to this measure. No doubt, he had always been anxious to maintain the rights of minorities in the House of Commons, and he had opposed the clôture, as it was called. But this was not the clôture pure and simple at all. If it were the clôture pure and simple he should oppose it now. Clôture pure and simple would enable the Government, at the end of the Session, to do as they pleased. Obstruction was often necessary at the end of the Session, when the House was thin, and the Government, with their own 40 or 50 Members, could command a majority and rule the country. That was what he objected to. He objected, at the end of the Session, to "small Houses" doing exactly what they liked, at the will of the Government. But he had never objected to a qualified clôture, which was all the present Resolution amounted to. All he desired was that care should be taken before a debate was closed that it had been thoroughly exhausted, and that it was only in a sufficiently full House that the clôture was declared. That was what Her Majesty's Government now proposed, and, instead of there having been any change in his opinions, he had himself, last year, proposed a measure almost identical with that which they were now discussing. Although he approved of the proposal made by the Government, he certainly preferred his own; but this was not a time for splitting straws in a great Constitutional crisis like this. His proposal was, that any Member, having obtained the consent of the Speaker, should be at liberty to move that the debate be closed; and he further proposed that the debate should be closed, not by a fanciful majority, but in the good old English way—namely, by the majority. He had made provision, however, that the majority should consist of not less than 150 Members. He said this in order to establish his own consistency, and to show that, in supporting the Resolution moved by Her Majesty's Government, he was still advocating and voting for a course of Procedure in that House which he had always been in favour of. No doubt the altered circumstances of the present times called for an altered method of dealing with them. The circumstances of the present were very different from the circumstances of the past. The right hon. Gentleman in the Chair, and others who had been in the House for a long series of years, knew that there had been a great change in their mode of Procedure; and he would mention one or two facts to illustrate the change. When the House met at the time Lord Eversley occupied the Chair—now so worthily filled by the right hon. Gentleman its present occupant—he always considered it necessary to count the House before taking the Chair; and there was frequently a difficulty in getting 40 Members present to constitute a House. The attendance was generally slack, and there were very few Members present except on great occasions. Consequently, it often happened that there was "no House." There was no difficulty then in getting seats; whereas now-a-days Mr. Speaker always took the Chair without counting the House, and there was no difficulty whatever in insuring the making of a House. All the seats were occupied, and many hon. Members who wanted them had great difficulty in finding them. That was one change. In the next place, how were the proceedings of the House conducted now? In olden times the debates were generally concluded within a reasonable time, because hon. Members who wished to speak refrained from repeating arguments upon points which had already been exhausted, knowing that it was useless to say that which had already been said before. The consequence was that the debates were brought to a close within a reasonable time. Now-a-days hon. Members, for reasons best known to themselves, never seemed to be tired of speaking. They never seemed to think that a debate could be exhausted as long as they were able to make another speech. Time after time it occurred that debates which ought to have finished in one night were carried over two or three nights, with nothing whatever that was new being added to the information of the House. This abuse—if he might so term it—this inordinate flow of talk, which had now become the habit of the House, was what necessitated this new Rule more than anything else. He entirely agreed with the opinion already expressed, that there was no injury any hon. Member could inflict on the public greater than that of wasting the time of the House. The Resolution was proposed in order to apply a remedy to that special abuse. Then, again, the Obstruction was formerly a special Obstruction, and was rarely resorted to, except on special occasions, to prevent particular Bills from passing—such, for instance, as the Bill for the admission of the Jews into Parliament. Obstruction was never the rule of the House. What was the case now? Obstruction, instead of being reserved for special occasions, was the rule. It was quite true that there had not been much Obstruction lately. The same thing happened last year. At one time there was a lull; but it was felt that it was a calm that could not last. The present circumstances were the same; and there could be very little doubt that the calm and quiet times they had been enjoying lately would not last long. He thought the necessity for an alteration in the Procedure of the House arose from the increased representation of the people in the House of Commons. Formerly the people of the country were not adequately represented; the privileged classes were in a great majority, and the working classes were in a great minority. The result was that the Privileges of the House were used as a bulwark to protect the rights of the people, and any infraction of the privileges, rights, and power of the minority was always viewed with great jealousy. Here, again, there had been a marked change. Instead of the masses of the people being in a minority in the representation of the House, they had now a much more efficient representation than they ever had before, and were in a large majority. He quite agreed that they were not even yet represented as largely as they ought to be; and he concurred in the views of the hon. Member for Salford (Mr. Arthur Arnold), who advocated the extension of household suffrage to the counties. Nevertheless, the representation of the people in the working classes was much greater now than it had ever been before; and, what was more, they had an additional protection for the free exercise of the franchise in the ballot. Should the Conservative Party say, "That is all very well, but how about our protection; ought not we to be protected now we are in the minority?" his reply was that that was an argument which ought not to be used. The privileges of the monied and landed classes needed no protection, because it seemed to him that those classes were always able to take care of themselves. But even if they were afraid of losing their protection in the House of Commons, they ought to support the Resolution, because the monied and landed interest had another Chamber ever ready, even to endanger the Government, or the peace and welfare of the country, in order to guard their own Privileges whenever they saw them in any way attacked. He should not have said this much if his opinions had not been personally referred to in the course of the debate. The Question before the House was, whether there was any real cause now for a change of their Rules? He thought there was a great demand for a change on the part of the people themselves, in order to restore to the House the character which it used to possess of being able to transact the Business of the country. It was also felt that it was absolutely necessary to push forward the Business of the country, which was of an urgent character, and had already got greatly in arrear. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India (the Marquess of Hartington) told them, on the 20th of February, that the Government had at that moment in contemplation various measures of the highest importance, and in which the country was deeply interested; and the noble Marquess further stated that it would be impossible to deal with them unless some alteration were made in the present mode of Procedure. He did not think the noble Marquess ever uttered truer words. He was sure there was an urgent desire for an alteration on the part of the country; and it was the duty of the House to pass such Rules as would enable the Government to forward such legislation as the circumstances of the times imperatively demanded. [An hon. MEMBER: Clôture.] He did not often trouble the House, and he had very few more words to say. It was freely admitted by hon. Members who had spoken against the proposition of the Government that some reform in the mode of Procedure was required. It was generally acknowledged that the mode in which the Business of the country had been obstructed was a disgrace and a discredit to the House of Commons. But hon. Members opposite wished to wait a little longer. He thought the House had waited long enough. It was on the 20th of February, about five weeks ago, that this very debate was commenced; and on that occasion, although he did not hear the words himself, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) was reported to have said—

“But I cannot sit down without making one appeal to the House generally. We are, as a House, on our trial. Nothing that can be done in the way of restriction or regulation will meet this evil properly. There is only one way in which to meet it, and that is by our own resolution to perform our duties in a sensible, in a workmanlike, and at the same time in a reasonable and gentlemanly manner.”—[3 Hansard, cclxvi. 1159.]

This was the third year of the present Parliament; and had their work been done in a sensible, a reasonable, or a workmanlike manner? He confessed that he was not of that opinion, and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman if he himself thought so? The right hon. Gentleman spoke these words on the 20th of February, five weeks ago, and the House was still engaged upon the very same debate. No doubt, part of the delay had been occasioned by proceedings in “another place,” which necessitated the opinion of the House of Commons being taken whether the other House should be allowed to override the feeling and judgment of the country. Personally, he confessed that Her Majesty’s Government were justified in refusing to accept the Motion of the House of Lords, and in appealing to the House of Commons for an expression of opinion upon it. At all events, there they were, on the 30th of March, still discussing a question which was introduced to the notice of the House on the 20th of February. Most hon. Members appreciated the conduct of the Government in their honest efforts to protect life and property in Ireland. [“Oh, oh!”] He had no wish to appeal to hon. Members below the Gangway; but he would appeal to the Liberal Members, and he was satisfied that there were very few Representatives of the people who would not support the Government when they were endeavouring to do their best to restore law and order in Ireland. These were some of the grounds which induced him to vote for the Resolutions of the Government. He would not prescribe which Resolution should come first. He left that to the Government, and it was only fair and reasonable that they should lay down their own course. But he did appeal to all Liberal Members to give their support to the Ministry in their honest endeavours to rescue the House and its proceedings from the contempt and ridicule which, he was sorry to see, were slowly but surely gathering around them.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Sir, I am sure that all those who have sat in this House for a good many years with the hon. Gentleman the Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), and who have marked his independent and, hitherto, consistent course as a defender of the rights of the House against successive and opposing Ministries, must have listened with mingled feelings—partly of amusement, partly of regret; I may say, also, partly of apprehension—to the speech which he has just delivered. It struck me that the hon. Member spoke almost as if he were under the sense of some embarrassment, and some little difficulty, in reconciling his present position with his past action; and that it was owing to this feeling that he hit out a little wildly. I am not surprised that the hon. Gentleman should have felt some difficulty in his way, because here is the position from which he started two years ago. His words then were very few, but they were very clear. This is what he said on the 26th February, 1880, with regard to the clôture—

“He trusted that there was no sort of possibility of its being adopted, and that any such proposal would meet with the most determined opposition.”—[3 Hansard, ccl. 1488.]

I can quite understand that he has had two years to turn round in; and let us hope that he has done it to his own satisfaction. It must be admitted that, although his change has been tolerably rapid, he has not been quite so quick in his movements as some others we see on the Benches opposite. Reference has been made to various instances. It is not necessary to repeat all the utterances that have been made on this subject; but there is one Member of the Government whom I am sorry not to see in his place at this moment—the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education (Mr. Mundella)—who appears to have made a sharper turn on this question than anybody else. I hold in my hand an extract from a speech which the right hon. Gentleman made at Sheffield on the 2nd of February in the present year, just four days before the Session opened, and this is what the right hon. Gentleman then said—

Well, Sir, this is a striking illustration of the wisdom of the advice given in an American book, and once referred to by the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright)—“Don’t prophesy unless you know.” Unfortunately, the right hon. Gentleman did not know at the time he made that speech that at that very moment Her Majesty’s Government had already decided upon introducing the clôture. “But,” says the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), “I never knew an occasion on which greater unanimity prevailed among the Members of our Party than prevails among us now.” I do believe that upon the main point there is a good deal of unanimity among hon. Members opposite. That is to say, that there certainly are a great number of hon. Gentlemen opposite, whom we expected to see take a different course, who are unanimous in the opinion that they must vote for the Government on this occasion. There is no mystery about the matter, because we have been told by one of themselves how it happens that they have arrived at that unanimous opinion. The hon. Member for Glasgow (Mr. Anderson) told us the whole secret. The hon. Member said—“I hate the clôture as much as any of you do,” and he gave uncommonly good reasons for doing so; but he added, “Although I hate the clôture, if I do not vote for it, the Government perhaps may go out.” It is evident, therefore, that if the hon. Member hates the clôture, he loves the Government more. It is not for me to blame hon. Members opposite whose consciences dictate that course to them. I am glad to see that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Committee of the Council on Education has returned to his place, and, as I would not say anything with reference to him in his absence that I would not say in his presence, I will state that I have just referred to a speech delivered by him at Sheffield on the 2nd of February last, in which he said—

MR. MUNDELLA: I beg to assure the right hon. Gentleman that what I said was, that the Government would never propose the clôture without proper safeguards.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I quoted the words precisely as they are given in the report of the right hon. Gentleman's speech in The Standard. I do not doubt for a moment that the words he has just stated were used by him on the occasion referred to, and I am glad to have had the opportunity of eliciting from him the fact that he made this qualification. But I must say, with regard both to that qualification and the distinction which the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn) drew between the clôture pure and simple and the clôture as proposed with certain safeguards, that I do not attach very much importance to those differences. It is, however, of importance that we should understand what is the particular form of clôture we are about to vote upon, because there seems to have been some little confusion with regard to the language of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott). As I understand, the hon. and learned Member moves that no alteration of our Rules of Procedure will be satisfactory which involves the voting of the clôture by a majority. By that I understand him to mean that he does not intend to name any particular majority that he would require to have, and that he simply asks the House to pronounce against the clôture being voted by a bare majority. That, I infer, is the distinction which he draws; and in that respect his Amendment differs from the Amendments, of which Notice has been given, by the hon. Member for Caithness (Sir Tollemache Sinclair) and the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock), both of which name the proportionate majorities which they require for the purpose of the clôture being voted. Well, Sir, as I have pointed out, the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton leaves the proportion of the majority an open question; it merely affirms that the voting of the clôture by a bare majority would not be satisfactory. ["No!"] An hon. Member says "No!" but that, at all events, is the meaning which the hon. and learned Member himself attaches to his Amendment. Such is the meaning also which, I believe, the House attaches to it, and which, I understand, is attached to it by the country. For my own part, I am bound to say that I have a strong objection to the clôture in any form. But I understand there are many hon. Members who take a different view of the matter, and who, while they are of opinion that the clôture is desirable, will join in the protest of the hon. and learned Member for Brighton against the clôture with a bare majority. There is another point upon which I should like to say a few words, because it has reference to a subject partly of a personal character. My right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson), I think, and some other Gentlemen, have made observations in the course of the debate as to the Government not having, as they say, made any "formal communication" to the Leaders of the Opposition in regard to these Rules. I think it is only right to state that, shortly before the opening of the Session, the Prime Minister did communicate to me a draft of the Rules which he was about to propose, and he gave me the opportunity of consulting with my Friends. He did not exactly come to me and say, "I wish to consult with you as to what we shall do," but he gave me the opportunity of making observations with regard to these Rules; and if I could have seen my way, by any communication with him, to facilitate the proceedings of the Government, I should have been most happy to have made that communication. But, as I explained to him, whilst I agreed substantially with almost the whole of the other Rules which the Government proposed, and upon which I thought we might have come to an agreement in the ordinary manner across the Table of the House, there was one Rule—namely, the first of the series—on which, I said, there would be a sharp divergence of opinion. I thought it right to give the right hon. Gentleman that explanation, and felt that in so doing I was meeting the communication of the Government in a spirit which I hoped they would see no reason to complain of. Now, I am quite of opinion with the right hon. Gentleman in the statement which he made at the beginning of this debate—that the question of some amendment of the Rules of Procedure was one which had forced itself on the attention of the House, and had been, for a considerable time, a matter of more or less anxious consideration. But he said, in the first place, that this was a matter not so much for the Government as for the House itself to consider; it was not a Party Question, but one in which the House was interested and had to decide. But, he added, experience proved to us that there was no use in multiplying Committees; because Committee after Committee sat, examined witnesses, and made Reports, while, really, little or nothing came from them. "In fact," said the right hon. Gentleman very properly, "you want a propelling power, besides Committees; and the Government are about to prepare it." I think the Government were quite right in offering to supply that propelling power. But I say, also, that while they rightly submit to the House those provisions which they think ought to be adopted, the House ought to be allowed freely to discuss and decide upon them. When I speak of freely discussing the Government proposals, I do not mean merely that we should be at liberty to discuss, to amend, or to oppose every proposal which the Government brings forward, because that is a kind of liberty which the right hon. Gentleman could not deny us—I have no objection, of course, to make to the Government using all their powers of argument, their influence and advice, for the purpose of inducing the majority to accept their views and to set aside ours—but I say it is not free discussion when there is imported into it considerations which have nothing to do with the merits of the question; that is to say, when you are told you are not to vote according to your view of its merits, but under the threat that unless a certain measure is passed something is to happen. The Government may be so rash and so ill-advised as to say—"In consequence of our being unable to have our way, we will throw up altogether the conduct of affairs, and thereby throw the country into a state of confusion." This, I say, is altogether contrary to free discussion; and the conduct of the Government in the present instance furnishes a very bad omen for the Rules we are asked to pass, if they are enforced by such arguments and accepted by Gentlemen under such a pressure as I have described. But let me turn for a moment to the argument which the right hon. Gentleman produced in support of his own Rules. We have had, of course, other arguments from the Colleagues of the right hon.

Gentleman, and some things have been said by them which have thrown light upon parts of the Government proposals; but I prefer to go as far as possible on the case of the Prime Minister. He told us that what the Government were about to propose were Rules for the purpose of meeting the normal condition and exigencies of the House in order to deal with cases of wilful Obstruction and Urgency. With regard to wilful Obstruction, he said that must be dealt with specially, and he referred to the Standing Orders that we passed three years ago, and which he proposed to strengthen; while, with regard to cases of Urgency, he did not propose to deal with them by means of these Resolutions, because, as he said, they must be dealt with as they arose. I should say we are perfectly ready to accept any reasonable amendment of the Rules of the House for the purpose of meeting cases of wilful Obstruction, and to concur in passing a Rule analogous to them for dealing with cases of Urgency. "But," says the right hon. Gentleman, "that is not the point I want to impress upon the House; I want to impress upon the House that for years past the Business of the House has been increasing, and the power of the House to get through its Business has been decreasing; I want to call attention to that, and to propose some remedy for the evil." Well, Sir, we want, as far as possible, to give the right hon. Gentleman assistance and co-operation in attaining that result. But the right hon. Gentleman says that the first and most important of all the proposals he has to make is that we should relieve the House of part of its Business by a process of devolution; and he emphasizes that by saying that no restrictive measures, even if we were prepared to give the Government all they asked for in that respect, would meet the case. This is a most interesting and important statement. It is one which, whatever our feelings may be, deserves careful inquiry and discussion, and is a subject of the highest interest. Unfortunately, the Prime Minister does not think it a matter which he can bring forward in the first instance, and so he puts it aside and takes up the most disputable and the most difficult of all the proposals he makes—namely, that with regard to the clôture. Now, in proposing the clôture, the right hon. Gentleman made this observation. He said that in times past the House had by degrees, as it found its Business extend, set aside, one after the other, the privileges of private Members in order to make better way for Public Business. The privileges of private Members have been dealt with, undoubtedly, in a summary manner. When I read the speech of the noble Lord the Secretary of State for India, it occurred to me that there was a considerable resemblance between the way in which he treated some private Members, and the way in which the constable treats the civilian when he says—"Now mind, if you kill me, it is murder; if I kill you, it is nothing." The noble Lord said, in effect, to the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton)—"If you obstruct me, it is clôture; if I obstruct you, it is nothing." But that is not the tone of the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister, who said that private Members had been called upon to submit to an invasion of their privileges. He gave us some instances—such as the Rule relating to discussion on the Orders of the Day; the Rule of Progress in Committee; and another, which I believe he mentioned. Now, all these are alterations which are entirely in harmony with the other Rules which he is now going to propose, or which, at least, I hope he is going to propose, for facilitating the conduct of Business and diminishing the number of occasions on which there might be discussions and expenditure of time; but they have nothing to do with the question of clôture, which goes far indeed beyond any of the Rules or precedents to which the right hon. Gentleman referred. Will the House consider for a moment what are the principal forms of Obstruction? You have one form of Obstruction in Members speaking against time; another, in Members speaking too often; then you have the frequency of repeated Motions for Adjournment; and the multiplying of frivolous Questions. These are the great heads under which you place the various forms of Obstruction. I am not now speaking of wilful Obstruction, which must be dealt with as a separate offence. There is the 2nd Rule, which deals with Motions for Adjournment before Public Business is reached; the 3rd Rule, which limits debate on Motions for Adjournment; the 5th Rule, which gives Mr. Speaker or the Chairman of Committees power to call attention to tedious repetition, and to direct a Member to discontinue his speech; and the Rule, that if Mr. Speaker considers any Motion for Adjournment is made for the purpose of delay, he may forthwith put the Question from the Chair. These Rules, I say, will largely diminish the opportunities for Obstruction; and when you take them in connection with the other provisions, such as for putting an end to discussions on the postponement of the Preambles of Bills, and on the Question of Mr. Speaker leaving the Chair, hon. Members will see that we have the means of greatly facilitating the progress of Business in the House. Now, Sir, we are prepared to accept the principle and spirit of almost the whole of these Rules; and I must say that the addition proposed to be made to the "Half-past Twelve" Rule is one which I consider of the highest importance, and I hope that when we reach that regulation, some further provision will be made so as to exempt from the operation of the Rule questions of appointment of Standing Committees. These are practical matters which, if you will deal with them in a practical spirit, and according to the practice and precedents of our Predecessors, you will be able to adjust without heat or animosity, and, as I believe, with a full knowledge of what the effect of the alterations you make will be. But I venture to say with regard to this Resolution of the clôture, that no man can say what will be its effect. It causes great animosity, great excitement, and, I will undertake to say, a good deal of dissatisfaction even amongst that unanimous Party which sits opposite. ["No!"] Hon. Members say "No!" Well, I am very sorry if it does not. Matters have gone farther than I was prepared for, if the consciences of hon. Members opposite have become so seared. But I will leave them to settle that point among themselves, and will only add that, however satisfied they may be, I am filled with greater apprehension when I see them entering with such a light heart on what appears to be so serious a matter. I say you are raising a false issue altogether, when you merely reply to our objections to the clôture by saying—"You must not deny that the present state of the Business of the House is unsatisfactory."

[Fifth Night.]

We do not meet you with that. We say we are prepared to accept the greater part—the practical part—of your proposals; but we object to one of them, the working of which we do not understand, but which we feel will be productive of a great deal of evil. I believe that Rule will have a bad effect upon the conduct of debates in this House; that it will tell for evil on the position of the Speaker; and I should think it will also tell badly, to some extent, on the character and conduct of Members of the House itself, because we shall be left in the unnatural position of not being allowed to discuss the various subjects presented to our consideration with that freedom to which we have hitherto been accustomed. We are told that the clôture will never be abused, and that we are always arguing on its abuse. But, Sir, the Forms of the House are abused; and it must be remembered that the clôture may be abused likewise, because you will be exercising this power under the eye of the public, under the pressure of the constituencies, and especially of the caucuses. You are extremely likely to find that the pressure of the caucuses and the comments which will be made on your proceedings by the Press, if those proceedings are disagreeable to the majority out-of-doors, will be of a character which will unfavourably influence your debates. But you will, perhaps, say—"That does not signify, because the opinion out-of-doors is the opinion of this House. Why are we the majority if we do not represent public opinion out-of-doors?" That is all very well if you are to look upon this as giving over the Government of the country bound hand-and-foot to the majority; but what we have always said was, that it was the high privilege of this House to stand up against the majority of the moment, or the power, whatever it may be, of the day, and demand that the opinion of the minority, however unpalatable for the moment, should have at least a fair and full hearing. We are told—"What has that to do now with the House of Commons? Things are very much altered. If you want to discuss go out-of-doors and discuss—discuss in the Press or on the platform." Are we really to take that as the advice of the Liberal Party? I think if that is to be the case, and if this House is to be turned into a mere

Sir Stafford Northcote

Court of Registration to register the decisions of the tribunals of the Press and the platform, you will, depend upon it, find a great falling off in the number of Gentlemen who will think it worth their while to come and take part in the Business and proceedings of the House. Another alternative has been offered us by the hon. Member for Swansea (Mr. Dillwyn), who is good enough to point to the House of Lords and say—"If you Gentlemen who are Conservatives find yourselves in a minority, and if you find you cannot argue your cases fairly and fully before this House, you have got another remedy, because you can go to the House of Lords." I should like to know if anyone is prepared to advise us to go to the House of Lords and say—"We have come to the House of Lords; the House of Commons refuses to give us freedom of speech, will you give it to us?" That is what the hon. Member for Swansea suggests; and what I say is, that I want to keep the power of free discussion in our own House. I do not want to go to the House of Lords; I do not want to go to the Press or to the platform—I want to have freedom of debate secured to us here; and I undertake to say that when you part with that, you part with what is the most precious jewel you have. But, then, it is said—"Oh! yes; you are arguing entirely on extravagant and extreme cases." Well, I do not know what "extravagant and extreme cases" are, when I see these sudden conversions taking place. It may be all very well this year, or next year; but two years seems to be a long time in the memories of some Representatives.

MR. GLADSTONE: Hear, hear!

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: The right hon. Gentleman cheers me. He says, rather pointedly, "Hear, hear!" but two years ago I was as strong against the clôture as I am now.

MR. GLADSTONE: And other subjects?

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: Oh; as to "other subjects," I do not know that it weakens my present argument, if it could be said that there had been a change. When we were in command of a majority in this House, we did not use the influence we had to bring about the clôture. On the contrary, under every temptation that way, we always protested against it; and so distinctly protested against it, that when a newspaper which supports the Government thought it desirable to call me in as a witness on their side, it was good enough to cut off just half the sentence I spoke. That does not alter what I was about to say. I am told—"You are taking extreme cases; and, after all, there is no danger, because this matter is not to be in the hands of the House, or in the hands of the Ministry of the day, but in those of the Speaker." I think it is a very serious thing indeed, a very serious question whether you ought to put the Speaker into this position. If this is to be a power which is to be frequently used, I venture to say the position of the Speaker will become intolerable, because, upon almost every occasion, he will be made the subject of comment and of attack—if not in the House, at any rate out of the House. He will be made the subject of comment and attack both when he exercises the clôture and when he does not. He may be as impartial as an Archangel; but he will always be charged with partiality by those who feel disappointment at the course he has adopted. I venture to say, moreover, that this is not an imaginary danger. I heard the Chancellor of the Duchy speak just now of the Speakers he remembered in the course of his Parliamentary career. No doubt, the Speakers whom he recollects, and whom he mentioned to us, and who are always held in great honour, have been men upon whose impartiality we could thoroughly rely, and in whom we were justified in placing implicit confidence. I remember the circumstances under which they were elected. They were elected under circumstances which would remove them from great temptation to anything in the nature of impartiality. The right hon. Gentleman will remember the circumstances under which Sir Charles Manners Sutton was set aside, and Mr. Abercrombie was chosen, at the commencement of a Parliament in which, I think, the Prime Minister himself held a seat in the Ministry. What were the grounds on which Sir Charles Manners Sutton was objected to? He was objected to because he had taken some improper part in the action of the new Ministry; and when that charge was disproved and abandoned—and here is the point to which I wish to draw attention—the ground on which Mr. Abercrombie was particularly recommended was this, that in the Reformed Parliament it was very desirable, for the well-working of the Reform Act, that there should be a Speaker in sympathy with that measure which had just been passed. That is drawing matters very fine indeed, but it is an indication of the sort of danger that may occur in the present case. It may be found necessary, when a new Speaker is elected, to appoint one who is in sympathy with the New Rules that have been passed, so that they will not be mere dead letters, but will be worked in accordance with the spirit of the Party who might then be in a position to nominate the Speaker of the day. I am told that the Speaker might be in a difficulty, in judging by the mere Business of the House, or by the mere cries from one Party or another, as to what is the evident sense of the House. But let me ask what is to be done in this case—which I have not yet heard mentioned—Suppose, after a debate has gone through one evening, a question arises as to an adjournment, and supposing the Ministry of the day think it undesirable that the debate should be adjourned, and divide against it, and have a majority against it? As matters now stand, if the minority are tolerably strong, and they think they have a good case, they will divide over and over again. The Speaker, after two or three divisions, will have had a clear indication that the body of the House, or the majority of the House, do not desire to have an adjournment, and, therefore, desire to close the debate. What is the Speaker to do in such a case? He almost necessarily, I think, would have to put the Question, and then you would have the clôture adopted, on the very first evening, perhaps, of the debate, when the Opposition has not had time to master the facts brought forward, or to array their forces. That is what may happen when the Speaker is in the Chair. But what I think much more serious and much more difficult is the case of the Chairman of Committees. I cannot help observing that all through this debate the Government, and those who have spoken for this proposal, have, almost studiously, omitted to mention the case of the Chairman of Committees; and yet I will undertake to say that nine-tenths of the cases of Obstruction have taken place in

Committee. In the Chairman of Committees you have an Officer of the House who is always a Gentleman of ability and standing in the House, a Gentleman in whom we always have had confidence, and who—as far as we have had experience of a large number of Gentlemen who have been Chairmen of Committees—we have always found to be fair and impartial in the discharge of his duties. Still, the weight and authority of the Chairman of Committees are by no means those of the Speaker, and the questions which will come before him are innumerable. How are you to deal with those questions of Obstruction which will take place in Committee? How are you going to deal with repeated Amendments on clause after clause which you will not be able to put a stop to by exercising the clôture once or twice? You will have to repeat the clôture at every turn; and when you have done that you will find, in a large proportion of cases, that Members will indignantly resent it, and endeavour to defeat your object by making new proposals such as they have it perfectly in their power to make in Committee. It does seem to me that the position of Chairman of Committees would be a most painful one. He would very soon find himself in the position of having remarks made about him, and the House might be put into relations with him which would greatly enfeeble his authority. I must apologize to the House for having detained them so long at this hour of the night; but the question is one of the very highest importance. We are taking a step of which it is impossible to calculate the consequences. It does seem to me, in spite of the manner in which this Resolution has been pressed upon us, and the urgency with which we are told we must adopt certain measures to deal with the Obstructive Party, that these are measures which we might easily adopt to get rid of a momentary difficulty, but which would leave greater difficulties behind them. It is the old fable of the horse and the stag. The horse allows the man to mount him, and never gets rid of him—“Non equitem dorso, frænum non depulit ore.” But I have attempted to argue; and there are occasions, of which I am afraid this is one, when argument is of little or no use—it is now no question of argument, except of argument with the master of many legions, all of whom are sworn to obedience. I can but raise my voice; I can but urge the House to consider; I can but press upon them my strong conviction that, in taking the step we are now asked to take, we are taking one that endangers the position of this famous House and the liberties of which we have been so proud. I will not venture to detain the House by reading more than one line or so; but I hope I may be allowed to read just one quotation from a book written by a famous Foreigner who studied the condition of England some years ago—I mean M. de Montalembert. These are his words, speaking of the difference between the English and the Foreign system—

“England is not like these Continental gardens and parks with straight avenues and well-trimmed trees, where you look forward and backward, right and left, and see on all sides neat lanes watered by vigilant gardeners; it is a vast forest, with roads both straight and crooked, abominable sloughs, charming lakes, centenary oaks and scented briars, where all is spontaneous and vigorous, abounding in every part with life and vigour.”

Sir, I object both to the French word and the French institution.

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad to see, Sir, that the right hon. Baronet, though he objects both to the French word and the French institution, does not object at all to a quotation from a French writer; and I myself was struck with the peculiar appropriateness of one of the most marked phrases of that quotation, over which it appeared to me that the right hon. Baronet travelled rather lightly. He said that England had, amongst other figures he described, an “abomi-able slough.” Our contention, put in a homely phrase, is this—that the House of Commons has got into one of these abominable sloughs; and that the question is, How is it to get out of it? Now, Sir, at this hour of the night, I shall endeavour to select, as carefully as I can, the points on which I may have to touch; but, after a debate so lengthened, and on a question so important, there are several points on which I must touch clearly and distinctly. I am very glad my right hon. Friend (Mr. Mundella) came into the House at a very opportune moment—not, indeed, in time to save 200 or 300 Gentlemen sitting opposite from enormous vocal exertions, but in time to show that the right hon. Baronet had quoted from an incorrect and untrue version of his speech. ["No, no!"] Not incorrect and untrue? Then I will give hon. Members the advantage of further light on the subject. The right hon. Gentleman was reported to have said some brief words to the effect that he would not have the clôture absolutely; but what he did say was, "that he would never have it without qualifications—that we should never propose it without qualifications." Those were his actual words, and the difference is important, because I, myself, am ready to adopt and make my own the declaration of my right hon. Friend, and say I should not have proposed, and should be most averse to proposing, and in the present circumstances—or in any circumstances I can anticipate—should refuse to propose, the closing power without qualifications. Now, what are the qualifications we have introduced? The first point on which I must join issue with the right hon. Baronet is the point upon which he has touched—namely, the question upon which we are going to vote. He says the question upon which we are going to vote is only whether the closing power may be brought into operation by a bare majority; and he says that that is the construction which my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Brighton (Mr. Marriott) puts on his Motion. I must say I did not hear it; but, whether it is so or not, I apprehend it is totally impossible for him to construe his Motion. He must accept the authoritative interpretation which may be put upon the Motion by those who are qualified to interpret it for the House, and whose interpretation cannot be disputed. I venture to assert with considerable confidence the direct reverse of what has been said by the right hon. Gentleman. I say that the question we are to decide to-night is not the question whether the clôture, by a bare majority, as it is called, is or is not to be had. The question is—Whether we are to introduce into our system, in any form, a limitation of the quantity of debate? And in order that I may give hon. Gentlemen every advantage, I will state in a still more definite form that which I have to state, and which I state with the utmost confidence. I hope my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Brighton, if he be in his place, will do me the favour to listen to what I say. It is this, if the Amendment become the Main Question, and, after having become the Main Question, be recorded it as it stands—and the words we are debating are the present words of the Amendment—if the Amendment as it stands be recorded as the deliberate and final decision of the House, then it will not be competent to anyone to move the introduction of any closing power by a majority in any shape whatever. That is the question; and let it be distinctly understood what we say is that matters in this House have reached a state which is not adequately appreciated by right hon. Gentlemen opposite. I hope they will do me the justice to admit that in introducing this subject to the House I did not introduce it in the spirit of controversy and Party, and I shall endeavour strictly to adhere to that position as well as I am able; and all that I charge against them now is this, that I do not think they have looked as closely at this matter as we have. ["Oh, oh!"] Surely that is an innocent thing to say. We are more bound to look closely at the matter than they are, and that is the extent of my charge against them. If they had looked at it as closely as we have, I do not believe they would have indulged in the exaggerated predictions which have formed the staple and substance of nearly all the speeches we have heard from them. What we contend is, that there are certain technical amendments which you can make in your Rules which will do good. There are great schemes of a division of labour, and devolution of power, which may, perhaps, be patiently elaborated, carefully tried, and gradually developed, and which will be of immense importance, but of which it is impossible at this moment to assume the acceptance or success upon any large scale. But, in addition to all that, although it be true that you may deal with offences of Obstruction penally, that is not enough. We have reached a point when you must look at the quantity as well as the quality of debate, and see whether the time has not arrived when, in moderation and with carefully-devised guarantees, some limits ought not to be administered. That is the contention upon which we are to decide to-night—we on this side being pledged to the affirmative, and those who oppose us—the hon. and learned Member for Brighton and any others with him—being pledged to the negative. The right hon. Gentleman says this question ought to be freely discussed, and that it cannot be freely discussed unless the Government are prepared to accept any results of the discussion at which the House may arrive. Now, Sir, I put it with some confidence to the right hon. Gentleman, with the experience he has of the working of political authorities in this House, that he is here in contradiction with himself. He was good enough to quote what I had said in a description in which I endeavoured to convey to the House, that the House itself, through its Committees—its natural and legitimate instrument—had totally failed in dealing with this question, and why? Not because the Committees were incompetent to discuss it; not because the arguments were not brought here and there with great ingenuity and pains; but because there was a want of a guiding authority and a propelling power; and unless the House could supply that power itself, no choice remained to it but either to continue in its present embarrassments, or call in that kind of authority and influence which belongs of necessity to the Government of the day, having the confidence of the House. The right hon. Gentleman commended me for that. But what is the meaning of the authority and influence of the Government of the day, if, after all, it comes only to this, that we are to submit our arguments, but we are wrong if we attach our existence even to the most vital portions of this plan? I am not one of those who have any exaggerated anticipations of the working of this scheme. I have not described it as being invested with magic powers; and I will by-and-bye state how far I think it is, in its intention and possible power, from producing some of the results ascribed to it. Still, we have undertaken the responsibility—and it is a great responsibility—of proposing to the House the introduction of a measure which is in principle novel; and in making that proposal under the circumstances under which we make it, and considering the necessities of the case, I say it is our duty, as was said by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for India, to support that proposition by every legitimate means we can bring to bear. As to threats, I know not what the right hon. Gentleman means; and, judging from the vagueness of his language, I do not think he knows himself. If the right hon. Gentleman means what was stated by my noble Friend, I say it is not fair to call that a threat. The Government have a right to be the judges of their own honour and integrity in a case of this gravity, where the House of Commons is in danger of being reduced to impotence and to a disgraceful state of things; and when the Government undertakes the task of endeavouring to retrieve it from that mischief, I say it is impossible to conceive an assumption of graver responsibility; and no Government which do not, as to their main outlines and principles, know their own mind on such a subject as that, is fit to hold for a day the reins of power. At the same time, I am very far from admitting that on that account there is any need for our discussing this question in a spirit of Party, or for our framing our measures with a view to Party aid; and here I will refer briefly to what was stated by the hon. and learned Member for Launceston (Sir Hardinge Giffard) in his able speech. The hon. and learned Member put a question, I think not unfairly, and I will endeavour to meet him in terms as explicit as his challenge to me. He said—"One of two things; either this is a measure for the common good of all, or it is a measure for putting forward Party measures." Just let us see how that stands. In one sense I admit that these plans for the reform of Procedure are favourable to legislation such as may be agreeable to the majority of the House. Do you consider that to stamp them with the character of Party measures? I say no; and I confidently say, in answer to the hon. and learned Gentleman, that this is a plan devised for the common good of all. But if you are to improve your Procedure, and relieve the House of Commons from its present deplorable condition, you cannot possibly do otherwise than increase the power of the majority to perform its work. Although, happily, it is always the case in this country that there is much which is dissociated from the interests of Party, yet, unquestionably, the majority has opinions of its own which it is sent here to propagate; and I do not hesitate to admit that in that sense a reform of Procedure is favourable to legislation in the spirit of the majority. But would that be a reason why the Procedure should not be reformed? It is a very different question indeed, as I think, which the hon. and learned Gentleman had to review. I do not think, when he stigmatized this as a Party measure in one of the alternatives, he at all intended that. I think he meant—Is it a device for restraining liberty of speech on the part of the minority of the House of Commons? That is a question you have a right to put, but which I do not hesitate to answer wholly in the negative. There is not a word said by the hon. and learned Gentleman in his speech with regard to the privilege of speech, and its priceless value as an absolutely essential condition of our political life, which I do not accept and am not ready to echo. But I go further, and assure the right hon. Baronet and others who have spoken that it fills us with astonishment to understand by what process hon. Members opposite have filled their minds with the dire apprehensions and horror they entertain. It has been said that there will be tyrannical Speakers—tools of the Government—who will use this cloture, one after the other, to put down liberty of speech. Is that so? The right hon. Gentleman knows something of Speakers, and he has not accepted the idea of a tyrannical Speaker. He knows perfectly well that there never can be a tyrannical Speaker in this House. ["Oh!"] I am glad to observe, and I think it right to record, that that expression of dissent came from a very peculiar quarter.

MR. HEALY rose to Order, and said, the remark did not come from the Irish Members, but from the Conservative Benches.

MR. NEWDEGATE: I beg to say it was I who made the exclamation.

MR. GLADSTONE: I sincerely apologize to the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) for the assumption I made; but I am bound to say, not as an apology or an extenuation, but in self-defence, that the local association, symbolizing, perhaps, political accord, has become so great that it is impossible in every case to know from whom an exclamation comes. With regard to the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Newdegate), I must say that I think, from his long experience, he ought to have known more of the position of the Speaker than to suppose it possible that such a case could arise. But I will give my view of the position of the Speaker. The Speaker does not govern this House by the exercise of power. He governs it by influence, and his influence depends upon his winning the confidence of the House. Without the confidence of the House, he cannot continue Speaker for a month; and the confidence of the minority is as essential to that as the confidence of the majority. It is on that account that I am surprised when I hear the references that are made to the possibility of the exercising an oppressive power, not by the present Speaker, but by the abstract Speaker who looms in the distance. Even the matters to which the right hon. Baronet referred, so far as they go, support me in what I say. The circumstances were very peculiar circumstances under which Mr. Abercrombie (afterwards Lord Dunfermline) was elected to the Chair of this House. There was more political colour in that election than there was in subsequent elections to the Chair. It was only fair to those who at that time constituted the Liberal Party to say that they felt—as I have always been assured they felt—that the act required special justification, and the justification they gave was alleged political intrigue on the part of Sir Charles Manners Sutton, while Speaker, in conjunction with the Ministry of Sir Robert Peel, but anterior to the operations which brought about a change of Ministry. But what was the consequence? The consequence was this—and it is well worth recording—that Lord Dunfermline, though, I believe, a man of the strictest honour, and, undoubtedly, of very great ability, and to whom we owe some of the greatest Parliamentary services ever rendered by a Speaker, yet allowed his Speakership to be coloured by something like political partizanship, and it terminated after four years' duration. Does not that support the doctrine I lay down—that every Speaker, who desires to be firm in his position, must possess the confidence of the entire House, and if he were inclined to abuse his power he would find it impracticable to do so? The fact is this—You have painted pictures of a tyrannizing majority; but if there were a tyrannizing majority in this House, does not everyone know that the minority of the House, constituting the regular Opposition, has in its hands the means of resistance not justifiable under ordinary circumstances, but justifiable against a tyrannizing majority, which are amply sufficient for its defence? Have you not seen what can be done by a body of some 20 Irish Representatives; and do you suppose it is not in the power of 200, or sometimes 300, Gentlemen, by using the Forms of the House against a tyrannizing majority, to secure themselves against oppression? As far as I am able to form a judgment, it is impossible to conceive apprehensions more entirely dreamy and groundless than those which have possessed the minds of hon. Gentlemen opposite. They seem to think there is some transformation about to pass over the spirit of English life. They seem to suppose that henceforward all majorities are to be actuated by this abominable spirit; are at once to renounce the traditions of Englishmen, in which they have grown and passed their political existence. I will, if you like, allow that monstrous paradox. I will grant that improbability, reaching to incredulity, to be a realized fact. I say, if it were a realized fact, you would still have in your own hands the amplest powers of self-defence, and no person could work the House of Commons upon any principles that would ever allow of the doing of systematic injustice to those who constitute the Opposition in this House. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman seemed annoyed because someone had referred to the House of Lords, and pointed out that the Gentlemen opposite are the very last persons who need conceive these exaggerated alarms. What is their case? Their case is that they are to be a minority of the House, who are to be absolutely oppressed. Is it no satisfaction to know that they have the House of Lords at their back? If they think that the House of Lords would have no power for their defence in the extraordinary case that they have supposed, all that I can say is, that they must then believe something else more outrageous still—namely, not only that the Speaker, not only that the majority are engaged in this nefarious enterprize, not only that the House of Lords is impotent, but that the whole nation is perverted and corrupted, for, unless that were so, sound public opinion would support the House of Lords in defending, at least as far as legislative measures were concerned, the rights of an oppressed minority. Well, Sir, I must say it is always a sign of an instructive character when I observe Gentlemen entirely contradict themselves in the course of their own speeches; and within the space, I think, of two minutes I have heard a Gentleman who is a very temperate and much respected Member of Parliament—the Member for Mid Kent (Sir William Hart Dyke)—after having propounded boldly and confidently that this closing power would be ineffective, and would fail for the purposes he ascribed to it—and, I must say, it would entirely fail for any such purposes—immediately went on to say—“We are now asked to make so vast a change that is nothing more or less than a revolution.” First of all, the right hon. Gentleman said the power asked for would wholly fail to produce any serious results, and in the next breath he characterized the change as revolutionary. Another contradictor of himself was the hon Gentleman the Member for Longford (Mr. Justin M’Carthy), on whose speech I wish to make a few comments. He, too, coolly announced that the proposal to introduce a closing power was made with the view to renew the Coercion Bill of last Session. I think I can convey information to the hon. Gentleman. He thinks that it is closure which renders coercion possible in this House. I tell him that it is crime which renders coercion possible. This power was, he says, introduced for the purpose of coercion, and on that account he is going to oppose it; and then he proceeded to say that, after all, it would totally fail when it was met by a determined and, what he called, a malignant Obstruction; so that at the same time that he ascribed to us its purpose, and on account of which purpose he intended to vote against the measure, he said—“The scheme is absurd, and never can attain the end for which it is devised.” I am exceedingly indebted to the hon. Member for ascribing to us this most absurd proposition, this proposition which I denounce in stronger terms even than he has used, if it be considered as a means of passing coercion upon the House; and here, Sir, I will venture to refer to a misconstruction of the actual words of the Resolution. According to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Leicestershire (Major General Burnaby), when a discussion on a clause in Committee had begun, and there is a long series of Amendments on the clause, the first happening, perhaps, to be frivolous, the others, possibly, may be very valuable, and if the closing power is applied to the first Amendment it affects the whole of the Amendments, and there is no more debate upon the clause. That, he seriously says, is the effect of the 1st Resolution. He hopes that we shall be able to satisfy him that it is not the effect of the Resolution. Why, Sir, the Resolution is so plain that it cannot be made plainer. What is to happen in the case of the exercise of the closing power? This, and this only, is to happen—the question under discussion shall be put forthwith. What is the question under discussion? It admits of no doubt whatever. It is the question which the Speaker or, in Committee, the Chairman will next put from the Chair. It has no possible application to any other debate or any other question whatever, and has not the smallest effect, therefore, upon the moving of subsequent Amendments. With regard to what the right hon. Gentleman has said concerning the position of the Speaker, I will not say that from one point of view it is not worthy of notice. We must deal in cases of this kind by endeavouring to make that selection of propositions which is, on the whole, the best. I admit it is a new responsibility added to the Chair; but I feel perfectly certain that if the responsibility is found too heavy, the consequence will be the power will be rarely, and perhaps insufficiently, used. From the first I ventured to state, and I re-state most confidently, the power never will be used except in comparatively rare and in very clear cases. And if it overloads the Speaker, or overloads the Chairman of Committees, the consequence of that will be that, in order to maintain the essential conditions of their Office, which absolutely require the confidence of the House in general, they will be obliged to pass by many opportunities and occasions when the reasons of the case would justify the exercise of the power. Even now it is notorious that many things that might be justly taken exception to on the ground of Order are, of necessity, passed by, because it is impossible for anyone in a position like that of the Speaker of Committees to interfere incessantly with the proceedings of the House. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Longford makes an assertion that by means of the closure it is intended to bring in coercion. When the hon. Member takes upon himself to speak of the motives and intentions which are in the minds of Members of the Government, I think I am entitled to meet his assertion with a strong and positive denial. He has no right to make it. He knows nothing of our intentions; he cannot read the interior of our minds; and it is not fair nor just to impute to us an intention which he himself denounces as not only guilty, but absurd, in defiance of our declarations. I can tell the hon. Gentleman, if he is to be the interpreter of our conduct, I will be the interpreter of his. I make no complaint of his junction with hon. Gentlemen opposite; it is a perfectly natural course in his position. He and the “no rent” Party—for that is the best name for them—are but a small fraction of the Irish nation; and, though they are a small fraction, they are a fraction determined to go all lengths. They have one great object in view, and they pursue it with fidelity, constancy, and courage, and that is to enervate the power of this House and to reduce it to impotence. They have another object, subordinate, perhaps, but not unimportant. It is to eject the present Government from power. I make no complaint of them whatever for that. It is part of the policy they pursue. Their policy of “no rent” I look upon as mad and guilty; but they choose their own starting point, and, having chosen it, I cannot wonder I cannot complain that they take steps the best fitted to advance it. They know what is going on in Ireland. They know the views which the present Government entertain as to the means by which the “no rent” Party can be coped with. They know that the Gentlemen who sit opposite do not concur in our views—and most naturally—and with perfect consistency they desire to get rid of the present Government and the supporters of the Land Act, because that Land Act is an Act which they fear. They believe and apprehend that it will win—and it has in some degree won—the people of Ireland away from the Land League. Let me remind the House that the proposition which is now made to the House, though new in form, is not new in substance. I have described it as a proposition intended to limit, with proper guarantees, the quantity of debate even apart from the offence of positive and wilful Obstruction. That is not the first time it has been done. There are two modes of limiting the quantity of debate. One is to stop the length of particular debates. The other is to abolish the opportunities. We have been busy ever since the Reform Act in limiting the quantity of debate by abolishing the opportunities of debate; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach), in an able speech delivered the other night in a spirit of candour and comparative moderation, actually recommended that we should diminish the opportunities now afforded for debate. I ask whether that in principle is not the same thing? It may not be, perhaps, from your point of view; because I admit that if you are determined to say that this closing power is a power to be exercised against the minority of the House, it is not, from your point of view, the same thing. We utterly disbelieve it; for us, it is quite natural to say that the power of free speech, on which you insist for the House at large, is diminished by diminishing the opportunities. If we had proposed that the power of raising a debate on the Question that the Speaker leave the Chair should be taken away, that would be to an extent, at all events, an invasion of the right of free discussion. We are told sometimes that there are many hon. Members on this side of the House who do not like these proposals. I am not surprised that it should be said, because I admit that to me nothing can be more repugnant than the introduction of any limiting proposals whatever. But when I have to choose between two evils, I prefer to take the smaller of the two, and hope to get rid of the greater; and therefore I class myself amongst those who, in that sense, do not like any of these limiting proposals. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire spoke very fairly when he made an admission very different, I must say, from the other statements that have been made. The right hon. Gentleman said—I cannot be sure I quote his exact words, but I do not think I deviate from his intention when I say he said—that if this Rule were passed as it stands, and if it were abused by the majority of the House, the effect would be that the majority of the House would suffer at once in the estimation of the people; and that if we came back to Westminster next year as a Government, we would come back as a Government weakened in our hold upon Parliament and public conscience. That means that the people of the Three Countries would disapprove of this tyrannical use of power, and would cause that those who were guilty should at once discover the result in the comparative weakness to which they were reduced. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for South-West Lancashire (Sir R. Assheton Cross) said that we ought not to make the folly or misconduct of the few the measure of the privileges of the many. It is a very sound sentiment, and it is exactly the sentiment which we quote in favour of our plan. What we allege is, that at this moment the misconduct which interferes with our progress is the misconduct of the few, and that the many are the victims of that misconduct. The many came here to perform the duty with which the nation intrusted them; they came here to watch and criticize the Government; and they came here to conduct the Business of Legislation; but the conduct of a few, of an insignificant minority—not absolutely, perhaps, of one political complexion, but certainly not amounting in all to one-twentieth part of the House of Commons—has been the main cause of bringing about this state of things. It is an actual fact, and not a remote apprehension, that the misconduct of the few has measured and has limited the privileges and the powers of the many. I do not at all disguise the fact that we have to deal with other matters besides wilful Obstruction and gross irrelevancy. There is amplitude of speech. It is very necessary that something should be done in that matter. I myself am charged as an offender in this respect. The other day I was taken to task by an hon. Member for the length of my speeches, and I am not prepared to deny it. I think there is good ground for the complaint which the hon. Member made. A great deal of responsibility attaches to one who holds high Office, or is the Leader of a Party; but look at the condition at which we have arrived! The hon. Member for Londonderry (Mr. Lewis) reproved me for amplitude, in perfect good faith, though he is not the Leader of a Party nor the holder of a responsible office—he reproved me for amplitude in a speech which was itself two hours long. Can it be that some change of a mild and reasonable kind is desirable in these respects. You say, and say truly, that the multitude of speakers is constantly increasing, and, with the further extension of the franchise, may still more increase. A cruel aggravation has presented itself to Gentlemen sitting on this side of the House. They have been subjected to pressure which is almost intolerable, and which, I confess, I have wondered at as much as I have admired the patience with which it has been borne. If hon. Gentlemen sitting on this side had spoken during the last two years in the same proportion as the other fractions of the House, I do not believe we should have made any progress at all. This is a matter which is not at all invidious; but one which requires a dispassionate examination. Is it necessary for the House to handle questions at such length as they are usually handled now? The House of Lords determined in a night to appoint a Committee to inquire into the Irish Land Act. We object to the proposal, and offer a Resolution, which is intended to express an opposite conclusion; but that Motion is not disposed of in one night, but it requires four nights. [An hon. MEMBER: Five.] I think it was four, but if it was five it is so much the better for my argument. And why is this? It is not because the House of Lords has less time at their disposal than we have, because they have a great deal more time; but they did not find it necessary to enter into the subject at length. We, however, cannot dispose of it under four nights. If it is to be considered as a political Motion, I have already pointed out that a far graver Motion was disposed of, 51 years ago, as rapidly as the House of Lords disposed of the question to which I refer. That was the case of Lord Ebrington's Motion in 1831, in this House, after the rejection of the Reform Bill by the House of Lords, which was disposed of in a single night. Last year we had 11 nights' debate on the Address, and this year eight nights. Is that really necessary? We ask how is this closing power to apply to it? In my opinion, it will apply to it, not only by a gentle action, but by a double action. I believe that it will be judiciously, cautiously, and fairly exercised by the Speaker in the Chair; and I believe that, as in the case of railways in regard to competition, the mere expectation of competition did a good deal to keep down abuses, the mere apprehension of the exercise of the power will have a gentle but material effect in checking the tendency to inordinate speaking. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) has seen that there are the greatest difficulties in the way of abusing a power of this kind. What is our exact position? We see the case as he does; but I think we see it on both sides. We see the House as it now stands, exhausted with its labours, failing in the performance of its duties, beginning to lose somewhat of its estimation in the public mind, and lapsing by degrees into a slavery to its own system. This House has conquered every external foe, and now it runs the risk of being vanquished itself by those who, perhaps, are not the noblest of its children. What do we ask? We ask you to apply, or to endeavour to apply, a remedy to this specific mischief, the growing amplitude of debate, which, even apart from positive disgrace, and apart from increasing mischief, is rapidly tending to a point which will soon make the transaction of Business impracticable. We have endeavoured to make the remedy mild and moderate and practicable. We do not ask you to assent to our remedy to-night. The words of the Resolution before you to-night are merely a few words necessary to form a peg upon which to hang our Resolution. We do, however, ask you, by negating this Amendment, which shuts the door against every application of a remedy—we do ask you, by rejecting that Amendment, to assert a principle which means, and which assures the House, that this House is able, casting sophisms aside, to look at the substance of things. That it means not phrases, but work, and that neither individual folly nor combinations shall be allowed to stand between the House of Commons and the discharge of its great duties to the Crown and to the nation.

MR. HEALY, who rose amid interruption, remarked that hon. Gentlemen opposite need not be impatient, because he only wished to make a short reference to the speech delivered in the early part of the evening by the right hon. Member for Birmingham, the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster (Mr. John Bright). In the course of the night he had risen several times for the purpose of getting an opportunity of doing so. He had not intended, otherwise, to interpose in the debate upon the cloture. It was a question in which he took a very limited interest, for he had no objection to see the English House of Commons, having destroyed the Irish Parliament, now degrading their own. He should confine his remarks to the statements which had been made by the Chancellor of the Duchy. The right hon. Gentleman stated that his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) and himself (Mr. Healy) were present and spoke at the Chicago Convention, at which subscriptions were made for equipping soldiers to fight against the Crown, although both hon. Members had taken the Oath of Allegiance at that Table. He had informed the right hon. Gentleman, by a negative sign, that neither the hon. Member for Galway nor himself spoke at the Chicago Convention. They were simply present at a meeting in Chicago which was held later, and which was held altogether independent of the Convention. So far as he was concerned, the cause of his not speaking at the Convention at which they were present was not that he was afraid in the smallest degree of being involved in any responsibility for its proceedings, but because it should not be said that any of the Irish Representatives had interposed any authority or influence they might possess to induce the Irish people in America to come to any conclusion whatsoever. That was the sole reason of their silence. He fully and entirely endorsed every one of the resolutions come to at the Chicago Convention; and as to the subscriptions which the right hon. Gentleman said were raised to equip Irish soldiers, he must candidly say that he never heard a word about them until, on his way back from America, he read a speech delivered by the right hon. Gentleman at Birmingham, of which the speech made by the right hon. Gentleman in the early part of the evening was simply a re-hash. While he was upon his legs he was also anxious to contradict another statement which had been made by a Liberal Member—namely, that his hon. Friend the Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor) subscribed £200 towards the objects of the Chicago Convention. He only wished that his hon. Friend had such a sum of money that he could afford to be so generous. His hon. Friend, no doubt, considered that he did sufficient for Ireland in devoting his time and his services to the Irish cause for five or six months in America; but his hon. Friend had promised no subscription whatever. But, of course, like another contradiction, in which a statement made by the hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Herbert Gladstone) was repudiated, the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster would not condescend to notice this one, but on some future day would go down to Birmingham and repeat his assertions in spite of what was now said; and in due course of time the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman would be handed down to his heirs, executors, and assigns in the Liberal Party of the future, to be utilized by them in their dealings with the Irish Members. Before he sat down he wished to make one remark upon a point in regard to which it was necessary to associate the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster with the Prime Minister. The Premier said the intention of the Irish Members was to enervate the power of the House of Commons and to reduce it to a state of incapacity for the discharge of its proper functions; and the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster said there was a Party in the House whose sole object was to insure the degradation of that Assembly. Now, he had no desire to place the Irish Members in a position which was not clearly intelligible, or to be laid open to the witty expression once applied by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Devon (Sir Stafford Northcote) to the hon. Member for the City of Cork (Mr. Parnell)—that he was “un homme incompris.” He would simply remind the House that the position of the Irish Members was not by any means the position which either the Premier or the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster asserted, and for this reason—that while those right

hon. Gentlemen attributed to them disaffection, disloyalty, murder, and outrage there happened to exist in the background in Ireland a Party who were 10 times — aye, 1,000,000 times more opposed to the British Crown and Constitution than any Irish Member in that House. ["No!" and "Hear, hear!"] He did not expect that that declaration would be received with unanimous consent. The Irish Members in that House occupied a central or an intermediate position. If they were supposed, in their attacks upon the House of Commons, to represent the disloyalty of Ireland, then he confessed that he knew nothing about disloyalty. He frankly told the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and Her Majesty's Government that, so far as the action of the Irish Members in that House was concerned, they might be thankful for the fact that it was only a very small portion—merely the half-notes of the minor key of Irish disaffection—that reached them from the Benches on which he sat. He would tell the Government that there was a power beyond the Irish Members in that House, and despite of them, with which they had nothing to do—with which they had no connection; and that it was well for the Government that they had only the Irish Members to malign. Her Majesty's Government could not reach these other men; and the Irish Members were not responsible for them. He had now explained what the exact position of the Irish Members was. It had been said that the Irish Members had been returned to the House for the purpose of breaking up and degrading Parliament. The fact was simply this. Their endeavour—certainly his endeavour—had always been to impress upon the Irish people that Parliamentary agitation was, to a large extent, of little avail unless they were themselves prepared to keep up the agitation outside the walls of Parliament. He had pointed out, over and over again, that, so far from the agitation of the Irish Members in the House of Commons being of any use whatever, it was a waste of energy, unless they were backed up outside. Trusted men at times were returned there, year after year, to oppose the Government in that House; and, year after year, the Government, by their strategies, had been able to win them over. There was the same probability of their turning round now as there was in bygone times. Hence he always told the Irish people that Parliamentary agitation was only, so to speak, the left arm of Ireland. If Parliament were to expel all the Irish Members to-morrow, he should care very little for it; because he knew that, although Parliament might gag the voices of the Irish Members to-morrow, they could not impose a clôture on the voice of the Irish nation. The Government must remember that they had not to deal only with the Irish Members in that House, but with 20,000,000 Irishmen outside the walls of Parliament. That, then, was the position of the Irish Representatives; and to-night, if his words could reach those hon. Members who attributed to himself and his Friends extraordinary ideas about Parliamentary government, he would ask them what the Irish Members possibly could be if they had not behind them the voices and the support of the Irish people? Personally, he should be but the fractious and vulgar humbug which he was continually told he was by the English Press, if he had not behind him the force, and the voice, and the feelings of a nation. With what courage could the Irish Members stand up in that House, before the exponents of "British fair play," drawing forth offensive speeches and derisive cheers, if they did not occupy the position of persons who knew they were suffering in a good cause, and that that cause had behind it the memories of the oppression, injustice, and misrule of seven consecrated centuries?

Question put, "That the words 'when it shall appear to Mr. Speaker,' stand part of the Question."

OBSERVATIONS. QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE, in rising to call attention to the Report of the Committee appointed to inquire into the operation of the Irish Jury Laws, and to ask, Whether Her Majesty's Government propose to act upon any of the recommendations of the Committee? said, their Lordships would recollect that, during the last Session of Parliament, a Select Committee of the House was appointed to inquire into the operation of the Irish Jury Laws. There was little difference of opinion as to the necessity of such an investigation. Ten years had passed since a revolution had been effected in the jury system of Ireland—a revolution which was a good deal questioned at the time, and had been a good deal discussed since. The legislation of his noble and learned Friend (Lord O'Hagan) was an attempt to popularize trial by jury in Ireland. Up to the year 1871 the jury system had existed somewhat as an exotic on Irish soil. The qualification for service on the jury was so high, the system of selection by the Sheriff so little suited or convenient to the habits of the people, that it had very little hold of their sympathies. But the legislation of his noble and learned Friend the late Lord Chancellor of Ireland changed all that, and substituted for the high and exclusive qualification then in force a low rating qualification, and for nomination by the Sheriff selection through the mechanical agency of the ballot.

The first question which the Select Committee had to consider was whether the general direction of those changes was right or wrong; and he believed he might say with confidence that the Committee were unanimously of opinion that no reversal of the spirit of that legislation could be contemplated at the present time. He thought there were many reasons why such a conclusion was irresistible. What was the real justification of a recourse to trial by jury? They did not resort to the assistance of the 12 persons who chanced to be called together into the jury-box because it was impossible to ascertain the law, or to enforce it without their assistance, but because their finding gave them some guarantee that the average intelligence of society was in sympathy with the law, and that the action of the Courts, enforced with this sanction behind it, would be approved and supported by public feeling outside. The jury was the connecting link between the dry technicalities of the law and the common sense of the people of the country generally. He did not think that anyone would contend that the old unreformed juries had fulfilled that condition. The old qualification was so high that it was at times necessary to ignore it altogether; and the selection by the Sheriff, though he could not say that there was evidence to show that it was used corruptly, yet was undoubtedly open to suspicion. The Committee, therefore, were of opinion that the general direction of his noble and learned Friend's legislation could not be reversed.

Admitting, then, the principle of the Acts of 1871 and 1876, the Committee had to consider how far the juries brought together under those Acts had performed their duties satisfactorily or not. What, to begin with, was the composition of those juries? He was sorry to say they found very considerable reason for dissatisfaction with the manner in which they were composed. The structure of common juries in Ireland was a reflection of the weakness of the structure of Irish society generally. Irish society in most parts of the country was purely agricultural; and the Committee found that, as a rule, and in most parts of Ireland, the common juries were composed exclusively, or almost exclusively, of persons belonging to the farming class. There was a complete want of that variety in the composition of juries which was found in this country. It was, no doubt, to be expected that in a country such as Ireland, with a low rating qualification for service on the jury, that there should be a predominance of farmers in the jury-box; but that did not account for the complete absence of any representatives of the better educated and more independent classes. Such an exclusion, most certainly, was no part of Lord O'Hagan's intention. Lord O'Hagan had, indeed, expressly stated his conviction that those classes ought not to be, and would not be, excluded by his Act. The Committee had endeavoured to discover how it came to pass that those persons of better position—the representatives of property and education—came to be so completely absent. They found that there were several causes that helped to keep them out. In the first place, a certain number of the higher class of jurors were required for service on the Grand Juries; others, again, were absorbed by the special juries. Again, it was the fact that among the higher classes there were many who, no doubt, had a great disposition to shirk service on the jury. He did not know that they could be much surprised at that, because service on a jury was not particularly attractive in any part of the United Kingdom; and in Ireland there were various reasons why such service was specially unattractive. The Committee, at any rate, found that the fines imposed upon jurors who were not in their places when the panel was called over, though perhaps sufficient to insure the attendance of the humbler jurors, did not deter their wealthier brethren from absenting themselves. There was another reason which operated in the same direction. The accused person in every case of felony had a right to challenge 20 names on the list; and there was the strongest evidence to show that that right was generally made use of in order to exclude from the jury any person who, from the fact that he belonged to a class somewhat superior to the ordinary run of jurors, might be expected to be a man of particular independence of character, and likely to hold opinions at variance with those which might happen to be prevalent in the locality. In this manner, and by the combined action of these different causes, the panel, originally deficient in variety and in respect of the representation of the better educated and more independent classes, came to be, in the end, entirely denuded of them, until in nine out of ten juries they were almost unrepresented.

Such being the composition of the juries, the Committee had to discover how they performed their duties. He was glad to say they had received evidence from several districts tending to show that the conduct of juries was all that could be desired; but from many other districts—and notably from those in which the present agrarian agitation was going on—they found that the disquieting rumours which had reached their ears were only too well founded. He had often heard it said that the break-down of justice in many parts of Ireland was due, not so much to the misconduct of the juries, as to the difficulty or impossibility of obtaining evidence. It could not be denied that there was the greatest difficulty in obtaining evidence. No one who read the statistics, and saw how large was the number of crimes committed, and how small the number of persons in proportion who were made amenable could doubt that that absence of evidence was one of the great difficulties with which they had to contend. How could it be otherwise? How could they expect those terrorized peasants to come forward and tender evidence when they knew beforehand that their evidence would be disregarded by the juries? The persons who were in a position to supply evidence knew that if they did tender it, it would lead, not to the conviction of the person accused, but to their own punishment by that terrible organization which now pervaded too many parts of Ireland. They were in a vicious circle. They did not get evidence because they did not get convictions, and they did not get convictions because they did not get evidence. He thought it, however, his duty to impress upon their Lordships that, although there was a great difficulty in obtaining evidence, there were a large number of cases in which the evidence was forthcoming, and in which the jury, in spite of it, refused to convict. He would read to the House an extract from the evidence of Mr. Justice Lawson. This was Mr. Justice Lawson's account of his own experience—

“Three men attacked a house at night near Tralee, with their faces blackened and disguised; they were knocking at the door, calling to have the gun brought out. While they were engaged in this operation three policemen came up, and the head constable instructed his men each to capture a person; he himself captured his man, and held him; the other two persons escaped.

“In that case the accused person was caught red-handed?—He was caught red-handed. I said to the jury—‘This is the man before you now whom the constable caught at the door and took to the barracks. He has been brought from the barracks here, and there he is before you.’ That was of no avail whatever. When that verdict was announced the court-house rang with applause from all the spectators present. The sub-sheriff informed me that on the way down from the court-house the men were followed by a shouting multitude, who cried out—‘We know they would not dare to find you guilty.’ That is case No. 1. Now to give another case, which is a remarkable one. Four or five men came to a house at night; they knocked up the inmates, they took the man of the house out of his bed, put him down on his knees, and cut his ear; they were persons well known to the inmates of the house, and were living not very far from them. The inmates of the house identified them all. There were five of them there, and they were all acquitted.

"Was any defence set up in that case?—Yes; there was the usual fabricated alibi."

"May we understand that you quote these cases as cases typical of the prevailing state of things in that part of Ireland?—I think so; quite."

Evidence to the like effect was given by Mr. Justice Fitzgerald.

"I should mention, with the permission of the Committee, two remarkable cases as illustrating what was going on. One was a prosecution against two persons for retaining forcible possession. The evidence was quite clear. . . . The defence was that they were put back by a blackened, and armed, and disguised party, which is a common excuse; but it turned out that the leader of the blackened party was the son of one of the defendants, and the brother of the other. I pointed out to the jury that, even though they might have been excused for being put back forcibly in possession, they were not excused for forcibly detaining, which they had done, and saying that they would never give up possession. To my surprise in that case, after giving proper direction to the jury, without turning round, they acquitted both prisoners, and acquitted them amongst thunders of applause in court. I observed myself that the applause came from a particular direction, and that was the place set apart for jurors in waiting; and the applauders were the jurors in waiting. Upon that occasion I addressed very strong remonstrances to them, and those words have equally been interpreted as words of menace, whereas they were words of warning only. I told them that if that kind of thing went on it would lead to a suspension of trial by jury."

Now, the evidence given by these witnesses was entirely confirmed by the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland in the House of Commons. That hon. and learned Gentleman, in August last, said that there were then 192 "suspects" in gaol; and he added that in 119 cases which he had picked out from the gross number of offences it would have been the duty of any honest and impartial jury to convict the persons accused.

The Committee had to consider these facts, and to endeavour to obtain some explanation of the causes to which they were attributable. They had to consider, in the first place, whether the misconduct of the juries could be attributed to a want of intelligence on the part of the jurymen. That was not an explanation which the Committee was able to accept. There had, no doubt, in the early days of the new system, and before the jurors became familiar with their duties, been several grotesque exhibitions of ignorance on their part. The evidence, however, went to show that in this respect the common juries were steadily improving; and he was bound to add that he did not believe that anyone acquainted with the character of the Irish peasants would accuse them of being deficient in point of intelligence.

Then, again, there was the question of intimidation. Beyond all doubt there were cases in which fear had operated. How could it be otherwise, at a time when terrorism was so prevalent, and when persons in every class of life, and in regard to every kind of transaction, were deterred by threats from acting according to their own judgments. They had had, within the last few days, a striking illustration of this. The Government had been obliged to offer a reward of £100 for the detection of persons who had, in the city of Cork, posted placards threatening with vengeance any jurors who should venture to do their duty during the recent Assizes. There could, therefore, scarcely be a doubt that jurors were at times liable to such intimidation. The conclusion, however, to which the Committee had come was that, if there had been miscarriages of justice, they were due not so much to the ignorance or to the fears of the jurors as to a third cause, partly connected with the unfortunate history of the country, partly resulting from the pernicious influences which had lately been brought to bear upon the uneducated classes in Ireland. He was afraid they could not shut their eyes to the fact that in many parts of Ireland the sympathies of the people were entirely opposed to the law of the land, and that, in judging of certain questions, they adopted a standard of right and wrong which was not the standard of any Act of Parliament. It had been stated to the Committee by witnesses that the people habitually spoke of one class of crime as being "dirty," and of another class as being "clean." They would say—"Yes; I was convicted, but not, thank God, for anything disgraceful." The kind of crime which was considered as specially venial was, in the first place, any offence arising out of political or social differences. Then it appeared that the whole class of aggravated assaults were looked upon in a particularly favourable light by common jurors. One witness spoke of the "usual Tipperary fracture," which involved not only the breaking of the law, but the breaking of another person's head, as being regarded with exceptional indulgence. But it was, above all, in cases arising, directly or indirectly, out of land that juries could not be depended upon to do their duty. In such cases there could be no doubt that the jurors entered the box having made up their minds to acquit the accused. As the Prime Minister said, last summer—"In agrarian cases the whole judicial system had completely broken down;" and Mr. Justice Lawson said that—

"To send such cases for trial, and to send Judges round to try them, with a certainty of a failure of justice, was a great deal worse than useless, because it was the worst public manifestation of the impunity with which crime might be committed."

It came, therefore, to this—that they had in Ireland to deal with a society which was purely agricultural, with a great epidemic of agrarian crime, and with a system of trial under which criminals were tried by juries composed almost entirely of persons who, as a rule, belonged to the same class as the criminal; and who, in many cases, entered the jury-box with the deliberate intention of disregarding the law. In view of such declarations and such cases, the Committee had to consider whether they could suggest any remedy for this deplorable state of things. They had, first, to deal with the manner in which the juries were composed. As to increasing the rating qualification of jurors, they thought that was not possible, because, while a large increase in the rating qualification would in a great number of districts get rid of the jury panel altogether, a slight increase of the qualification would certainly not lead them into the stratum of jurors whom they could depend upon as free from the influences to which he had referred. They considered, therefore, that if anything was to be done in the direction of improving the composition of the juries, it should be attempted rather by infusing into the panel some of that variety in which, as he had stated to their Lordships, it was at present so lamentably deficient. The Committee, with that object, made certain recommendations. They recommended that the panel should be strengthened by adding to the qualifications now in force certain special qualifications by means of which persons who had not the necessary rating qualification, but who were otherwise fit for service on the jury, might be admitted. They also proposed a diminution in the number of exemptions; and in order to make sure that those jurors who belonged to a class superior to the rest should be represented, not only on the panel, but in the jury-box, they recommended that the fines now imposed for non-attendance should be enforced with more strictness than at present. They further suggested that upon every common jury there should be three jurors with the higher qualifications required for service on the special jury—an arrangement which, he believed, prevailed in Scotland, and which it was considered worked very well. They also proposed that persons on the common jury should be relieved of their duties as grand jurors in connection with the criminal business of the Assizes; and, finally, they suggested that the right of challenging the jury panel in cases of felony should be reduced from 20 to six. They believed that these modifications in the law recommended by the Committee would tend to improve the composition of the juries.

Although the Committee thought that these changes would be useful, and would do something towards removing the imperfections which experience had disclosed in the existing law, they could not shut their eyes to the fact that these changes alone would be absolutely insufficient to improve the state of things which was found to be in existence. They believed that if any improvement was to take place they would have to go further. They had, in the first place, to consider the fact that during a time when agitation was prevalent in Ireland, a great number of offences were being continually committed—not, perhaps, in themselves of a very serious nature, but very serious when they were considered as being the manifestations of deeply-seated social disorganization. Such offences as those of intimidation, assault, interference with persons engaged in carrying out the law, and so forth, were the kind of offences from which the agitation in Ireland derived its real strength, and it was clear that something must be done to deal effectually with them. And what was the most effective way of dealing with them? Their Lordships would agree with him that such offences should be dealt with, not necessarily with inordinate severity, but with promptitude and a certainty of justice. What was the case now? He was afraid that an exactly opposite state of things prevailed in Ireland; so that, although the law might award a severe punishment, it was either very tardily inflicted, or not inflicted at all, to the complete frustration of the ends of justice. Either through unwillingness to incur the odium of deciding the cases, or through such cases not being actually within their jurisdiction, or because they believed that the penalty they could impose was insufficient, the magistrates nearly always sent these cases for trial. The person suspected probably would be let out on bail. Weeks and months passed by, and in the end, when the accused was tried before a jury, he was, very likely, acquitted, amidst the applause of those assembled in Court. To remedy such a state of things, the Committee suggested that the summary powers of the magistrates should be revised, and made sufficiently extensive to enable them to deal with such offences as cases of rioting, aggravated assault, cases of forcible possession where the question of right had already been decided by a Court of Law, assaults on process servers and all agents of the law, posting or sending threatening notices, intimidation, and other offences of a like character. They also recommended that the magistrates should be bound to deal with such cases, and should not send them for trial by jury, unless by special direction of the Public Prosecutor. They further suggested that when such cases were dealt with by the local magistrates, they should be assisted by the resident, and that in this view additional resident magistrates might be appointed—a recommendation which had been partly carried out by the recent appointment of special stipendiary magistrates.

Such an enlargement of the jurisdiction of magistrates could only be applicable to comparatively insignificant offences, and they had to consider how offences of graver character should be dealt with. As to these, it was suggested that, as miscarriages of justice were often owing to local and social influences, these influences might be avoided by transferring the trial, in all cases where such influences might be expected to operate, to places beyond the reach of such influences. That was a suggestion which had much to recommend it; the more so because such a course had already been resorted to under the existing law, and with good results. Where proof was forthcoming that there was no prospect of a fair trial in the place where it would naturally proceed, an application might already be made to the Court of Queen's Bench for permission to change the venue. The success which had lately attended the Winter Assizes, at which offences were tried away from the local venue, offered further encouragement in this direction; and the Committee were of opinion that every facility should be given for such changes of venue wherever the circumstances called for it. There were, however, obvious limits to the extent to which such an expedient could be resorted to. The removal of a trial from one part to another of a district suffering from the effects of the agitation would be useless, while its removal to an entirely different district, such as from Cork to Belfast, might not be fair to the prisoner. The consideration of these facts forced upon them the conclusion that, if anything was to be done to stem the tide of agitation in Ireland, and to avoid the recurrence of abuses which had come to their knowledge, it would be necessary to take steps of a considerably more stringent and far-reaching character; and, after carefully weighing all the circumstances, the majority of the Committee had agreed to insert the following paragraphs in the Report:—

“The evidence which we have taken has forced us to the conclusion that as long as a large portion of Ireland continues under the influence of the present agitation, the adoption of the steps we have suggested will probably not prove sufficient to insure the punishment of crime, and to restore public confidence in the minds of the law-abiding portion of the population.

change so stringent as that which they conditionally recommended should be resorted to. What he thought they had to ask Her Majesty's Government was, whether the success of that measure, and the success of their policy in Ireland, had been such as to render it possible to govern that country without some further steps for securing the enforcement of the law? What had been their experience since the Report of the Committee was written? They had had, in the first place, the Winter Assizes. He knew that the conduct of the juries during the Winter Assizes was a subject of a great deal of congratulation; and, no doubt, that conduct did present a marked contrast with the conduct of other juries; but their Lordships must remember that the experience of the Winter Assizes was absolutely worthless as any indication of what the conduct of the juries in ordinary Assizes was likely to be. In the Winter Assizes the juries were composed, to a great extent, not of persons of the farming class, but of tradespeople and shopkeepers. In fact, the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant had stated publicly that the Cork juries were doing their duty because the shopkeepers were beginning to find out that non-payment of rent meant non-payment of debts. That was the real explanation of the improved conduct of the juries at the Winter Assizes. Then they had the Spring Assizes. Of course, there were no statistics yet open to the public with regard to them; but he had given attention to the reports of what took place in the different districts, and he observed that there had been in most of the Circuits a very large increase of crime, notably of agrarian crimes, and that a very few persons had been made amenable—while of those who had been made amenable, a mere handful, whom they count over on their fingers, were convicted. He saw that the acquittals were specially numerous in agrarian cases, and that when there was an acquittal, although the evidence might be of the strongest possible character, the result was generally accompanied with those scandalous scenes, the verdict of acquittal, or the disagreement of the jury, being again and again received with the tumultuous applause of crowded Courts. In one or two cases, moreover, he had observed that the Judges had rebuked the jurors for the manner in which they performed their duties. All these were ominous and disquieting facts, and he would be glad if any Member of the Government could re-assure the House with regard to them. If the Government could not re-assure them, if the tide of disaffection was not receding, if the juries were still deliberately disregarding their oath, then their Lordships might depend upon it that they would have to make out a debtor and creditor account against trial by jury in Ireland; and if they found that its advantages were outweighed by the miscarriage of justice and by the outrages to common decency to which it had given rise, then they would have fearlessly to find some other means of trial to put in its place. Above all things, they should divest their minds of the superstition that to replace trial by jury by trial without jury was necessarily a great infringement of public liberty. It might well be asked what room there was for public liberty in Ireland in the present condition of that country? Public liberty was being crushed out of existence in Ireland between the repressive measures to which the Government had been driven to resort on the one hand, and the domestic tyranny of the Land League on the other. They had on the one side intimidation, terrorism, and outrages of every kind—"Boycotting," mutilation, panic, murder; they had on the other suppression of the freedom of public speech, the prohibition of free discussion, and the imprisonment without trial of large numbers of the Queen's subjects. Which of the two was the greatest interference with liberty—to keep a man for months together in prison without any trial at all, or to put him on his trial before a properly-constituted tribunal, even although that tribunal was not aided by a jury? It seemed to him that the moment was not one for squeamishness in regard to liberty in Ireland; and he was only afraid that, in this and in other matters, they might be found clinging to the mere semblance and shadow of liberty long after the substance of it had lost its place in their midst.

After all, was it quite clear that trial by jury was so essential in the interests of liberty and of the rights of individuals? Had their Lordships considered the enormous number of cases which were already in the United Kingdom disposed of by magistrates without any juries at all? In England, speaking roughly, 517,000 cases were so disposed of by magistrates without a jury, against 14,000 sent for trial before a jury; in Ireland there were nearly 200,000 cases dealt with summarily by the magistrates, and only 1,600 cases sent for trial—that was to say that, taking the whole United Kingdom, out of every 46 cases, 45 were already tried without any jury at all. Then, again, in civil cases, they had but to consider the enormous amount of business transacted in the County Courts in the United Kingdom. There were about 750,000 cases tried in the County Courts, of which only about 1,000 were tried before a jury. He observed, further, that the Report of the Committee on the Law of Judicial Procedure recommended additional changes in the direction of superseding trial by jury in civil cases. He did not think it could be contended, in face of these facts, that trial by jury was really and absolutely essential to the protection of litigants or to the preservation of public rights. Trial by jury was a means to an end. The end was to secure public sympathy on the side of the law, and to have the law effectually enforced. If trial by jury failed to obtain those ends, they must provide some means which would do so. He had put this Notice on the Paper because he thought the evidence collected by their Lordships' Committee too important to be consigned to the limbo of forgotten Blue Books. He would not ask Ministers for a premature disclosure of the policy of Her Majesty's Government, for he knew the difference between the position of a private Member who asked a Question and a Member of the Government who had to answer it. Still, he felt that upon some of these points Ministers might vouchsafe the House a little information. The Committee had recommended, unconditionally and apart from the concluding portions of their Report, certain alterations in procedure intended to remedy grave defects which experience had disclosed in the working of the jury system in Ireland. He could not help thinking that the Government might tell their Lordships whether, upon the whole, they agreed in the recommendations of the Committee upon these points, and whether, when the state of Public Business permitted, they would consider the propriety of taking some steps in order to give effect to those recommendations. As to the further and more serious recommendation of the Committee, the House would bear in mind that it was made conditionally. The suspension of trial by jury was advocated only in the event of the state of Ireland showing no improvement, and of a continuation of the scandals which he had described. They had, he thought, a right to ask Ministers whether those scandals still continued; whether it was still the case that owing to the conduct of the juries "crime can be committed with impunity, and justice publicly outraged;" if so, if there was no alteration in the state of things disclosed to the Committee in August last, they had no choice but to ask Her Majesty's Ministers what steps they proposed to take in order to make good those words of the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal, in which he had solemnly pledged the Government to provide necessary means for the due maintenance of the law and the punishment of offenders? The noble Marquess concluded by asking the Question of which he had given Notice.

LORD CARLINGFORD said, he was not surprised that his noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne) should have thought it well to make the able statement which he had made to the House with respect to the proceedings and the recommendations of the Committee of last Session upon the Irish Jury Laws. That was a Committee of great importance; and he (Lord Carlingford) might be permitted to say that the Report prepared by his noble Friend was as well-considered a Report as ever was adopted by a Committee of that importance dealing with so weighty a subject. That Report consisted of two parts. The larger part, upon which the Committee were happily unanimous, consisted of recommendations of various reforms in the system of Irish Jury Laws. The smaller and latter part of the Report, and one of the greatest and most critical importance, was of a very different nature. It did not recommend reform, but the suspension of trial by jury in Ireland. That recommendation was made in the most guarded and most careful terms, and evidently with the fullest conviction of the grave and serious character which it bore. It was not even a recommendation made positively to the Government, or by way of direct advice to Parliament. It was made in terms which left it to the responsibility and discretion of the Government as to whether it should be adopted or not, and as to when it should be adopted. It did not attempt to recommend or suggest what mode of trial should be substituted for trial by jury. Of that recommendation, however guarded, however cautious it might be, the minority of the Committee, including his noble Friend the Lord President of the Council and himself, were not able to take the responsibility, or to concur in it. His noble Friend (the Marquess of Lansdowne) had been very critical as to the language of the Amendment which was moved by himself (Lord Carlingford), and which was concurred in by the minority of the Committee, and it was very possible that the mere words of the Amendment were not the best that could have been chosen. He did not deny that that might be so. But the noble Marquess said that the difference between the majority and the minority of the Committee appeared to be infinitesimally small. The difference was this—that the minority, including himself (Lord Carlingford), declined to concur in the advice and recommendation which his noble Friend desired to offer; while the majority concurred with him in giving that advice, and in making that recommendation. This, he thought, was a distinction and a difference which hardly could be described as infinitesimal. He did not complain in the least of the appeal that had just been made to the Government on the subject of the suspension of trial by jury in certain districts in Ireland; but he was bound to say that his attitude towards the recommendation must be the same that day as it was on the day when the Report of the Committee was adopted. He was not able, on the part of the Government, to take a different attitude at the present moment. He was not able to do what his noble Friend invited him to do, for it was impossible for him, on the part of the Government, to announce further legislation in connection with the subject at that critical period in Ireland. The Government had already, by the aid of Parliament, furnished its Representatives in Ireland with laws of the most vigorous and exceptional kind. They had been, and were still using, the powers so given to them, and all other powers, to the very utmost of their ability; and, as he had already said, it was not his duty now to announce to their Lordships any further legislation upon the subject. Their Lordships, therefore, would probably not blame Her Majesty's Government if he (Lord Carlingford), on their part, declined to discuss with his noble Friend under these circumstances, and at that time, the question of the suspension of the Jury Laws in Ireland. He would only make one observation connected with the part of his noble Friend's speech that related to the experience which they had had of trial by juries in Ireland since the sitting of this Committee, and since the adoption of its Report. He referred to the experience gained at the Winter and Spring Assizes. He thought his noble Friend had underrated the importance of the experience gained at the Winter Assizes. As far as his own experience went of the Winter and Spring Assizes in Ireland, it appeared to him that the remarkable success of a good many trials in strictly agrarian cases in the South of Ireland showed more strongly than ever the important effect of removing the trial of agrarian offences from the district in which they had been perpetrated, and the associations of the place where they were committed. He could not help thinking that if these facts had been then before them the Report upon that point would have been considerably stronger than it was at present. As to the Spring Assizes, he was obliged to agree with his noble Friend that the results had been of a different kind. The number of cases tried had not been large; but in many of them undoubtedly the results had been most unfortunate, and there was every reason to believe that during these Assizes there had been serious and lamentable failures of justice, though the contrary had been the case in some few remarkable exceptions. He wished, at the same time, to add that the main and salient fact in connection with these Assizes was undoubtedly the extremely small number of cases which had been brought to trial. That was the first fact that struck one in examining the circumstances—namely, the lamentable absence of evidence, and the deplorable unwillingness of the sufferers themselves to prosecute.

Passing now from the question of the suspension of trial by jury in Ireland to the valuable suggestions made in the Report for the amendment of the Irish Jury Laws, and for strengthening the weaker points of the system which had been so carefully investigated by the Committee of their Lordships' House, he wished to say that with respect to that part of the Report he was of the same opinion now as he was at the time. The Government felt fully both the importance of the subject itself and of the recommendations of the Committee; and it was their belief that those recommendations would form important materials for the improvement of the Irish jury system when time and opportunity could be found for dealing with the subject. With that qualification he could assure his noble Friend that the Government acknowledged the weakness and imperfections, in some important respects, of the Irish jury system; but he must say that the time and opportunity had not yet arrived when, with the assistance of the Report of their Lordships' Committee, those defects might be removed, and those weaknesses might be cured.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL: My Lords, I do not think many of us will be disposed to find any very serious fault with the answer which has been given by my noble Friend the Lord Privy Seal (Lord Carlingford) to the very able and powerful statement of the noble Marquess (the Marquess of Lansdowne). I do not think we shall be disposed to find fault, when we consider the position of a Minister of the Crown, that the Lord Privy Seal is not able to announce any measures on behalf of the Government—the Government, perhaps, not having made up their minds, or, if they have, considering it inexpedient at present to disclose them. But, having said so much, I feel that thanks are due to the noble Marquess for having brought the subject forward; and I should deem it almost a neglect of my duty if I failed to express the obligations we are under to my noble Friend, on behalf of this House, and on behalf of this country, and, I will add, on behalf of the people of Ireland, for the dignified, thoughtful, and temperate statement which he has made. I should like, also, to say a few words with regard to the alleged failure of the measures of coercion which last year were taken by the present Government. It is commonly said that these measures of coercion have wholly failed. I cannot see the justice of that observation. They certainly have not succeeded in preventing terrible outrage and crime in Ireland, or the continuance of crime in Ireland; but those who say that these measures have failed forget that but for these measures crime might have been ten-fold more rampant than it is at present. They have failed in this sense, certainly—that they have not produced a complete reform; but it does not follow that they have failed in diminishing crime. I must point out, however, what is the real character of these measures of coercion to which the Government and Parliament have had recourse. The noble Marquess asks us to come to the conclusion that trial by jury has failed in Ireland. Is this a very terrible thing, when the Government has come to the conclusion long ago that it was necessary to give them arbitrary powers to arrest and imprison men without any trial whatever? It is a far more arbitrary system of coercion which you have had recourse to than that which is pointed to by my noble Friend. It is a course of coercion of which the country has reason to be ashamed, in this sense, that the Government of Ireland should be compelled to resort to such measures. Well, now, it is quite evident that the measures of coercion to which we had recourse last year are in some danger of producing a re-action in the public mind. It is inevitable, in the circumstances of the case, that when, under these powers which Parliament has committed to you—I am not arguing that Parliament was wrong—I believe it was a necessity—but the consequence of these powers, to a very large extent, has been that men's minds have become shocked with the fact that 500, 600, or 700 persons are or have been in prison in Ireland without having had any trial whatever. It is inevitable that there should be a re-action in the public mind. But one cannot help looking forward with some alarm to the Parliamentary condition of things. These powers of coercion which the Government possess are limited in point of time, and, therefore, we shall have to consider what is to be done. The Government will very soon have to make up its mind whether they will ask Parliament to renew them. I ask, is it possible, in the face of the facts brought before us tonight by the noble Marquess, to deny that strong powers are necessary in the hands of the Government in regard to agrarian crime in Ireland? Then you must make your choice between continuing a purely arbitrary system of arrest without any trial at all, or so strengthening the ordinary law that through the law you can strike the wrongdoer. You are holding in prison some 600 or 700 men whom you suspect of having incited to crime. That is a very strong power; it is a power which you have been compelled to use to a large extent, and no one has confessed more frankly than the Chief Secretary for Ireland that he has been obliged to exert those powers to a much larger extent than he expected when Parliament intrusted them to him. It may be that those powers will have to be renewed; but I, for one, frankly state that I would infinitely prefer to see a strengthening of the ordinary law in the direction pointed out by my noble Friend than any indefinite prolongation of these arbitrary powers. I agree very much with all the arguments and statements which have been made by the noble Marquess. I think there is an undue superstition with regard to trial by jury. It has been a great bulwark, no doubt, of political freedom, and I believe and trust it will continue to be so; but there are conditions of society—and really the condition of Ireland is one—in which trial by jury is practically useless for the detection and punishment of crime. You have passed a great remedial measure, and you have given a great deal of the property of Ireland over to the farmers, and you ought now to insist upon it, by a judicious strengthening of the ordinary law, that crime shall be repressed; and I, for one, would recommend the remedy suggested by my noble Friend, that in agrarian cases, well-defined, and in districts well-defined also, those offences should be tried before a Commission of Judges. I believe that is the only way in which you can repress crime. The state of things in Ireland is really frightful. My noble Friend, since he sat down, has put this telegram into my hands. In some of the morning papers your Lordships may have seen that there has been another terrible agrarian murder in Ireland. This information has been forwarded to him. I do not give the names of the persons from whom it comes; but it bears so directly on the condition of things we are now discussing, that I will read it to the House—

“ You may state that Mr. Arthur Herbert was shot dead yesterday, because he told the Judge at the last Assizes that a fellow-juror had stated he would hold out for a week before he would find a verdict of guilty.”

Here is a case where there is every reason to believe that this murder has been committed because one man insisted on doing his duty as juror in giving information to the Judge in regard to the conduct of his fellows. I do not wish to make a speech, following up this matter, further than to say that when such is the state of Ireland, none of us would wish to say anything which would embarrass the Government. I wish to say everything that I can to help the Government in expressing the opinion of at least many who stand around, and on this occasion I must say that I heartily concur in the speech of my noble Friend.

LORD INCHQUIN said, that, in his opinion, trial by jury, as it now existed in Ireland, was in no sense efficacious. The liberties of the people of Ireland would be very much better preserved than they were at present if some temporary change were to be made in the direction which the Committee of last year pointed out. The evidence which came before that Committee was so convincing, backed up as it was by the opinion of the most eminent Judges in Ireland, that they reluctantly came to the conclusion that if things remained in the same state as they were when the Report was made, they had no other alternative than to make the recommendations in question to the House. He believed if such changes were carried out at the present time, they would shortly find that the state of affairs in Ireland would rapidly improve. The tenant farmers, the labourers—in fact, every class in Ireland—were anxious that the present terrorism should cease; and he would ask their Lordships and the Government to say how such a state of things could be put an end to. As long as crime was committed with perfect impunity, and as long as people were compelled to obey the unwritten law—which their Lordships knew was really the present law of Ireland—of course he could not expect that Her Majesty's Government should be prepared to make such changes prematurely; but he would ask them to consider them. There were at present 600 or 700 men in gaols in Ireland without trial. If many of those imprisoned were not guilty of murder, they were guilty of inciting to murder; and if a Commission of Judges were sent down to districts such as that with which he was particularly acquainted to try those men who had been taken up by twenties, thirties, and fifties, it would be much more satisfactory to everyone concerned, and would soon put an end to the lawlessness which was kept up by those wretched secret societies which existed in Ireland. It would be a good thing for Ireland, and have a much better effect than imprisonment without trial. He therefore trusted the Government would consider whether it was not much better to have a ready and prompt trial by a Commission of Judges, or even the establishment of martial law, than to allow the country to drift into a still more dangerous state than it was at present. No one was better pleased than he was by the success of the Winter Assizes; but he was much afraid that its effect would be to prop up the Irish jury system for a while longer. He could not agree with the noble Lord the Lord Privy Seal that the difficulties which they now experienced would be put an end to by a change of venue, and the opinion of all the Judges was to that effect.

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, he was delighted to hear the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll), with his usual eloquence, advocate what he (the Earl of Dunraven) had himself long looked upon as the only common-sense view of that matter, and declare that, in view of the valuable evidence and the most able Report of the Committee which had inquired into the Irish Jury system, and taking into consideration what they knew to be the state of Ireland, the only thing that could under the circumstances be done, with any practical effect, would be to substitute some other form of trial, instead of trial by jury, for dealing with cases of an agrarian nature. The Committee said that justice had almost completely failed in Ireland owing to various reasons. They reported that in many cases juries were subject to such intimidation that they dared not convict; that in others they were so completely in sympathy with the accused that no intimidation was necessary; and also that many of the acts which were considered crimes by us, and which were rightly considered crimes, were not considered crimes at all by the jurors who had to try them. As regarded the last, if a crime was not regarded as a crime by jurors, trial by jury became a meaningless farce; while the only practical way in which jurors who were intimidated could be saved from that intimidation was by relieving them from their duties; because, whatever alteration of the law was made, and however much they hoped that the state of Ireland would improve, no reasonable man could be sanguine enough to expect that intimidation would become impossible in Ireland in a short time. Even if the rating qualification for jurors could be made much higher—and the Report showed that that was impracticable—the effect would be bad, because it would be indirectly superseding trial by jury whilst retaining the form, and it would tend very much to increase that bitterness between class and class which already prevailed too much in Ireland. Various alterations were suggested by the Committee, which would no doubt be beneficial. But to suppose that those alterations could possibly work such a change in the condition of the country and in the temper of the people, and in the view they took of crime of an agrarian nature, was to ignore the whole modern history of Ireland. The case of the “suspects” in prison had been commented upon, and he would wish to add a word or two on that point. He felt very deeply how discreditable it was to England, and especially, as it seemed to him, to the Liberal Party, that between 600 and 700 men should now be in prison in Ireland without any trial whatever, and without either themselves, their friends, or the public having any opportunity of knowing the particulars of the crimes of which they were accused, or the evidence which could be brought against them. He did not mean to say that strong powers of the kind taken by the Government were not necessary; but he had thought from the first that there were two alternatives open to the Government at that time. They could either have asked Parliament to give them power of trying prisoners for certain offences by some other mode than by jury, or they could have obtained strong and exceptionally arbitrary powers. The Government adopted the latter course and obtained the powers they required, though it was doubtful whether Parliament would have granted them if they had foreseen how they would be used; but he believed that the former course would have been very more efficacious, and it would have saved this country from that which had happened—namely, that, owing to the way in which they had exercised their powers, the Liberal Party had been utterly discredited in Ireland. Trial by jury in Ireland in certain cases had long ago been shown to be useless. How many times had it not been found necessary to suspend the Habeas Corpus Act in Ireland; and would it be contended that Ireland, under those circumstances, was in the enjoyment of those liberties which were looked to be secured by trial by jury? It would be absurd. Trial by jury, without the Habeas Corpus Act, became a mere name and nothing more. Men's liberties would be much better guarded if there were some kind of trial instituted whereby justice might be meted out to those offenders who now got off scot free, than when men could be imprisoned without any form of trial whatever, and when the Lord Lieutenant or the Chief Secretary for Ireland could incarcerate any man without he himself or his friends knowing what was the charge that could be brought against him, or what was the nature of the evidence to be adduced. Trial by a Commission of Judges would be infinitely preferable to a system under which men were punished without any trial at all. At any rate, the whole circumstances of the case would be known to the accused and to the public. He thought the question of the "suspects" was a very serious one. To some of the "suspects" imprisonment, as now carried out, was scarcely any punishment at all; while to others, owing to their circumstances in life or the effect it had on their business, the deprivation of personal liberty was a very great punishment indeed. So far as he recollected, the object of the Coercion Act was that persons who were reasonably suspected might be held in gaol in order that they should not incite the people to commit certain crimes; but he saw that the Chief Secretary for Ireland the other day said in a speech which he made in County Clare that the "suspects" would not be released until the people of Ireland behaved themselves better. That appeared to him to be quite another matter. He did not know whether it was that, having reverted somewhat to mediæval ideas in our system of dealing with land tenure, it was also thought right to revert to mediæval notions in other matters, and to take hostages for the good behaviour of people. According, however, to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, those 600 or 700 men were to be held in prison until their countrymen learned to behave themselves more decently. He agreed with the noble Duke that strengthening the present law would, besides being more Constitutional, be much more efficacious than that system of arbitrary arrest. There was a difficulty in dealing with the "suspects;" but there would not have been such a difficulty if Parliament had boldly grasped the question, and endeavoured to come to a conclusion at first. If England was to continue to govern Ireland, and if remedial measures and measures such as the Land Act were to have a fair trial, it was absolutely necessary that the weak should be protected against the strong, that those who were guilty of crime should suffer punishment, and that the law-abiding should not be afraid to range themselves on the side of law and order. From the experience of many years past, that appeared to be impossible in Ireland under trial by jury. It was the first duty of any Government to see that the weak were protected, that law-abiding citizens did not suffer for ranging themselves on the side of law and order, that the innocent should be unmolested and the guilty punished; and if that could not be done by trial by jury, it was the first duty of a Government to see that it was done by some other means.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that he agreed with almost every word uttered by the noble Earl (the Earl of Dunraven), and in none more emphatically than that it was the first duty of a Government to use all its power for the preservation of law and order, for the protection of the innocent and the punishment of the guilty. He did not, however, believe that the obviously desirable measure of superseding trial by jury in a considerable number of cases, and especially those of an agrarian character, would have rendered unnecessary the Coercion Act, or, as he preferred to call it, the Act for the Protection of Life and Property, which had been only too tardily introduced by the Government last Session. He had been one of those who had, early in the autumn of 1880, publicly called upon the Government to take efficient steps, or, if necessary, seek the additional powers requisite, for at once suppressing the lawlessness which had already commenced showing itself in agrarian outrages, before, encouraged by impunity, it became too widely and strongly developed to be put down. To him, as a consistent supporter of civil liberty all his life, it was most painful to see hundreds of men kept imprisoned for months by the Government without being brought to trial; and nothing would have reconciled him to this but his conviction, contrary to that of the President of the Board of Trade, that the maintenance of law and order was the first duty of Government. He did not doubt, however, that the number of "suspects" imprisoned would have been much diminished if Judges had been sent down to certain districts to try prisoners without the aid of juries, which he quite agreed involved far less sacrifice of liberty than shutting up men indefinitely without trying them. In this, as in other instances, the Government timidly sacrificed the object to the name, the substance to the shadow, of liberty. Dispensing with juries was not without precedent in Ireland. It had been adopted in 1822 or 1823, he believed, with great advantage. He did not doubt that, sooner or later, the Government would have to follow the recommendations of the Committee presided over by the noble Marquess who had rendered such valuable service in so ably bringing the question under their Lordship's notice to-day. But, as usual, the Government would have lost much precious time. The conduct of the Irish Executive put him in mind of an anecdote, which he read some years ago, of Troughton, the famous optician. It appears that he had promised George III. to make and send him a certain instrument by a certain day of a certain month; and he duly did so on that day of the following year, when the King said to him—"Very well made, very well made, Troughton; and punctual to a day, too, punctual to a day; only mistaken the Anno Domini." So, he said, the Government had mistaken the Anno Domini. Even when they had done or said what was right in Ireland, they had always been at least a year, or six months, or six weeks too late in doing or saying it. The Chief Secretary had just made two energetic speeches, one in Ireland and one in "another place." But how doubly valuable they would have been in March last year! For more than a year process-servers had from time to time been ill-treated, wounded, and even murdered in different parts of Ireland. Yet it was only this year that Government, in concert with the Judges, adopted the obvious remedy of rendering service by post legally valid under certain circumstances. It was only yesterday that the Lord Privy Seal tardily acknowledged the valuable public service rendered by the Property Defence Association in doing what neither the Government nor mere private individuals would have been able to effect. He hoped the Government were at last beginning to be awakened to a perception of the right way of dealing with Irish lawlessness, and he felt confident that in that they would have the support of both political Parties in both Houses of Parliament. Only they must lose no time in taking effectual steps for the pacification of Ireland, for restoring it at least to the state in which it had been undeniably handed over to them by their Predecessors, orderly and tranquil, though, as Lord Beaconsfield had rightly warned them, profoundly disaffected.

LORD DENMAN said, that their Lordships might remember that when a Select Committee was moved for on the Jury Laws of Ireland, he had requested that more attention might be given to the discussion of the subject at the Social Science meeting, which was to take place in October, in Dublin, than to any evidence brought to this country. Their Lordships might recollect that no change in the Jury Laws could be made, except by Act of Parliament; and if the intentions of the Government prematurely were known, all juries would be put on their mettle, and no conviction could be obtained until the change was complete. He had heard the persuasive explanation of the whole state of the Jury Laws by the Right Hon. Dr. Ball, at Dublin, and he believed that safe measures could be carried if his views on the subject were fully considered. If any sudden outbreak should prevail, martial law might be proclaimed; but no hasty declaration of intentions could do any good.

ENGLAND AND FRANCE—THE CHANNEL TUNNEL SCHEME.

OBSERVATIONS.

LORD STRATHNAIRN, in rising to call attention to the danger of establishing railway communication with the Continent, in connection with the widespread disaffection now and constantly prevailing in Ireland, and the uncertain reliance to be placed on the immature soldiers of our army as lately exemplified in South Africa, said, it was impossible to comprehend the great danger of England's changing her insular position, which had always protected her freedom and her independence, and made her the greatest naval and commercial nation in the world, for a railway communication—that was, a land communication with France and the Continent—unless they contemplated the question by the light of past and present times. That contemplation was most discouraging as regarded Ireland, which he had mentioned in his Notice, and was the perpetual cause of England's weakness and anxiety. Ireland's proverbial and treasonable watchword was—"England's difficulty is Ireland's opportunity." Then foreign affairs indicated, he feared, a change of that national policy which for centuries had upheld their possessions in India, and their commercial and maritime rights in the Mediterranean and the East. The disaffected masses in Ireland had never been able to take the field against our organized troops; but they had been able to organize Riband Societies and carry on agrarian campaigns. They had asked for and obtained no fewer than 11 times foreign aid, for war against England, in men, arms, and munitions of war. They had also instilled into Irish soldiers treasonable disaffection. Our distrust of the Irish Militia prevented their being called out for training. It was dangerous to allow the first-class Army Reserve in Ireland—all Irish trained soldiers—to remain without officers or military organization, scattered through the country; and it was all the more dangerous now that their numbers were increased. In case of difficulty or invasion the Irish Militia could not remain in Ireland. All this evinced the deep-rooted disaffection of the Irish masses, and the intensity of their hostility to English government, law, and connection, which proved that it would be a misprision of common sense and every principle of the art of war and strategy to give to a foreign enemy the means of a successful invasion of England by the Tunnel—afforded him by traitors in the camp, such as Fenian soldiers. To show the bad spirit which prevailed amongst Irish soldiers at times, he would state that during his period of command in Ireland, which began in 1865—the commencement of the Fenian period—it was his painful duty to bring to courts martial no less than 80 soldiers for different degrees of treason. In all the foreign quartermaster-generals' departments, Ireland was noted, on account of her disaffected population, as the point of descent, either for diversion in favour of a descent on some part of the English coast, or as the base of an actual invasion; and he had no doubt if a foreign enemy attacked us on the shores of Ireland, we should have to contend against an enemy from within as well as one from without. Under such circumstances, what was to be done with the Irish regiments? He would not go into all the details of how these numerous regiments, with sympathetic masses in the towns and districts, might operate. Favoured by night, the Tunnel might fall into the hands of an enemy, who would lose no time in entrenching the heights above it as a defence for the first invaders, reinforcing them to any extent with concentrations carried through the Tunnel. All this would be accompanied, as a matter of course, by continued feints along the coast, which, as frequently happened, might divert from the Tunnel attention and troops. The strategy would be facilitated by the probable collapse of the moral courage of our under-aged soldiers enrolled under the short-service system, which gave us immature and inefficient men, whose numbers were increased by fraudulent enlistment. But, besides the under-age of the troops, which might cause a Tunnel disaster, there were other causes which would operate unfavourably in similar circumstances. That was the mistaken instruction of officers under the present system. He had so often had the honour to submit opinions in proof of this, which had never been contradicted in the House, that it would be superfluous to enlarge upon the subject on the present occasion, especially as he intended to bring forward a distinct Motion upon it as soon as possible after the Recess. The remaining causes were the want of reconnoitring, of the knowledge of the ground, and of a second line of fortifying heights, through which the disasters of South Africa might be repeated on our coasts and in front of the Tunnel.

LORD WAVENEY said, the question why the Irish Militia was not called out had not received a satisfactory answer. He could not understand why that step had not been taken, seeing the disturbed condition of the country. The Duke of Wellington showed no distrust of the Irish Militia when, at the beginning of the century—in 1806 or 1807—it was said that the Irish people generally were only waiting for an invasion of the enemy. He brought the Irish Militia, then a very powerful body, numbering 26,000, under arms. He (Lord Waveney) did not believe in the policy of not calling them out, and he was convinced that the Irish Militia would do their duty as well as any other servants of the Crown.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said, he felt some difficulty in dealing with the subject, owing to the confusion arising from the combination of the two questions of the Channel Tunnel and the state of Ireland. The noble and gallant Lord (Lord Strathnairn) had travelled over a very wide field; and he would excuse him if he (the Earl of Morley) did not go into the various topics affecting the condition of Ireland, short service, &c. With reference to the Channel Tunnel, he could say no more than he had said on two former occasions—namely, that a Scientific Committee was inquiring into certain points connected with the defence of the Tunnel; and until that Committee had reported, and the Military Authorities had had an opportunity of advising the Secretary of State for War on the general policy of the construction of the Tunnel, he could not but regard any discussion of the subject as premature, and he could take no part in it.

ARMY (AUXILIARY FORCES) — THE EASTER VOLUNTEER REVIEW.

QUESTIONS.

LORD STRATHEDEN AND CAMPBELL asked the Under Secretary of State for War, On what principle it is intended to distribute brigades between officers of the Army and officers of the Volunteer Force at the Easter Monday field-day?

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN said, before the Question was answered, he would like to ask the noble Earl who had a previous Notice on the Paper (the Earl of Dunraven) why he had not been called upon—why the matter had been postponed?

THE EARL OF DUNRAVEN said, that, as the Question had been asked, he must state that he had postponed calling attention to the statement of the Prime Minister relating to the decision of the Court of Appeal in the case of "Adams v. Dunseath" for obvious reasons—the length of the discussions on the previous questions and the state of the House. When he brought on the matter after Easter, he hoped there would be more time for its discussion.

THE EARL OF MORLEY, in reply, said, the principle on which the appointments were made was that the officer commanding a regimental district should also command a brigade composed of battalions localized in the district. Two exceptions, however, had had to be made owing to the absence of officers, and in those cases two distinguished Volunteers (Lords Bury and Ranelagh) had been appointed to commands.

VISCOUNT BURY said, he agreed that, as a general rule, it was perfectly right that the Regular officers commanding the districts should command the brigades; but for more than 20 years Volunteer officers had been regarded as eligible for employment as brigadiers, and he hoped that the plan of which his noble Friend had spoken of giving commands generally to Regular officers of the Army would not be carried to such an extent as to exclude Volunteer officers when duly qualified.

LORD TRURO said, he could assure his noble Friend (Viscount Bury) that he expressed the feeling throughout the whole Volunteer Corps, when he said that the course which the Government had in its wisdom thought proper to pursue had had the effect generally throughout that Body of depriving it of officers of that social position which it was most expedient that it should have if the Force was to continue what at its commencement it unquestionably was. This was not the occasion for any lengthened comment on the Volunteer Force; but he would take some future occasion to point out what were the particular drawbacks which had had the effect generally of lowering the condition of the Volunteer Force. He submitted that that Force would have to be placed in a better position. Sooner or later it must become the National Army as contrasted with the Imperial Army; and if the Government meant to do the Force justice, it must provide better officers.

LORD WAVENEY hoped that the noble Lord (Lord Truro), in his estimate of the National Army, would not entirely forget the Militia. He (Lord Waveney) had great respect for the Volunteer officers; but he thought that the Militia officers were also entitled to recognition.

GIBRALTAR (RELIGIOUS DISSENSIONS) —DR. CANILLA—THE PAPERS.

QUESTION.

THE EARL OF MILLTOWN asked the noble Lord the Secretary for the Colonies, When the Papers would be laid on the Table relating to the religious dissensions at Gibraltar?

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY, in reply, said, that the Papers in question were in course of preparation, and would be laid before the House after Easter.

LYNN AND FAKENHAM RAILWAY BILL (by Order).

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Sir Charles Forster.)

MR. E. STANHOPE said, he thought that the ground of the opposition which he had to offer to the Bill might be stated very shortly. In the first place, he wished to explain that he gave an entire adherence to the principles which usually governed the proceedings of the House with respect to Private Bills—namely, that unless some novel principle were involved, or unless some very special conditions existed in a particular case, it was desirable, as a rule, to send a Bill upstairs in order that it might be threshed out by a Select Committee. That was undoubtedly the rule, and he should be glad to follow it now; but he believed he should be able to show the House that special circumstances existed in this case, and that there were vital principles involved to which the House ought not to assent without full consideration. The fact that the House consented to read these Bills a second time at all was a proof that the House desired that, when necessary, they should receive full consideration. He admitted, however, that the case of sending a Bill upstairs was somewhat strengthened when the Bill itself was in the nature of an Omnibus Bill, because they could not reject such a Bill without defeating a good many parts of the scheme which they had no real wish to reject. He had endeavoured to get rid of this difficulty by placing on the Paper a Resolution precisely defining the limits of his opposition; and, having done so, he was ready to say to the promoters of the Bill that if they were prepared to meet him by striking out that part of the Bill which dealt with the particular portion of the line to which objection was raised, he would at once withdraw his opposition to the Bill so amended, and allow it to be read a second time and sent to a Committee upstairs. He had heard it stated that there existed a strong feeling in Norwich in regard to the defective nature of the present station accommodation. He could very well believe it. He could very well understand that great advantage would accrue to the inhabitants of Norwich from the construction of a central station; but, as a matter of fact, it would be easy to show that this particular scheme was not the only one possible, and that by rejecting one part of the Bill they would only be postponing the matter for a year, and enabling the promoters to apply to Parliament another year for an amended scheme. The grounds of his opposition to the Bill were clearly expressed in the Resolution on the Paper. In the first place, it was contended that the Bill unnecessarily interfered with the precincts of Norwich Cathedral. There had been circulated among the Members of the House within the last day or two a map which he ventured to describe as a very misleading map. It had been prepared by the promoters of the Bill, and its object was to show that although, technically, the line would interfere with the Cathedral precincts, yet, as a matter of fact, it passed at some distance from the actual precincts of the Cathedral. The truth of the matter was, that it was proposed to carry the line through an inclosure commonly known as the Cathedral precincts, although he readily admitted that the part of the inclosure through which the line would run was not occupied by Cathedral buildings. But he might venture to rest his case in regard to this Cathedral property entirely on the tenderness which Parliament always manifested in regard to places of this description. That tenderness might be based on the higher ground of the associations which these places created in the minds of all of them, even in these somewhat too practical times; or it might be based on the desire to preserve the privacy of places devoted to repose and study, and the desire to keep open spaces in the neighbourhood of our large towns. But, whatever the feeling might be, nobody would dispute the special tenderness of Parliament in this matter. If they wanted an instance, it would be found in the case of the Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge, and the grounds and gardens connected with them. Parliament had always anxiously guarded the people connected with those Colleges from the intrusion of the Railway Companies. It was upon similar grounds that he trusted the House would show its tenderness in regard to the present Bill. The fact was, that he was opposing the Bill not mainly upon the extent of the interference with these precincts, but on the ground of the principle of the interference; because he believed, if this part of the Bill were to be passed, the thin end of the wedge would be introduced, and a vital precedent would be created, which might be used in a damaging manner hereafter in dealing with similar cases. The second ground of opposition was the interference of the Bill with the historical gateway. Now, the gateway within the precincts of Norwich Cathedral was one which belonged formerly to a Benedictine Monastery, and it was supposed to bear date as long ago as the beginning of the 14th century. It was one to which a special interest was attached by antiquarians; and yet it was included, he was told, within the limits of deviation of this Bill. It was quite true, as stated by the promoters, that it was not intended to pull down the gateway. The promoters alleged that they were not going to interfere with it at all. But what was the fact? They were going to run an embankment, from 18 to 25 feet in height, immediately in front of this gateway, isolating it entirely from the rest of the precincts and the close, and shutting it up in a narrow space between the river and the embankment, entirely destroying all the beauties of the spot which had been so much appreciated. He did not wonder, then, that a strong feeling had arisen in Norwich and elsewhere against the Bill. All of them knew that the feeling was not confined to Norwich, but that it extended all over the country. The Society of Antiquaries in London felt strongly on the subject, and desired most anxiously that this gateway should be preserved. Of course, they would all admit that if it was absolutely necessary for the sake of public improvement, and if it could be shown that the requirements of the public were paramount, and that, in spite of all the objections he had urged, it was essential that the railway should be brought in at this particular spot, then he would be one of the first to admit that the Bill must be passed. But that was not so. Anybody who took the trouble to look at the map could satisfy himself in five minutes that the construction of the line in this particular spot was not in the least degree necessary, but that a small deviation would carry it across the river at another point, without interfering with the gateway, and consequently removing all objection. It was on these grounds that he ventured to move the Resolution which stood in his name, believing the House did not desire to establish so dangerous a precedent; and that, while anxious to give all reasonable facilities for the extension of railway enterprise where it could be proved to be necessary, the same jealous care which had always been displayed where interests of such great importance were affected would continue to be exercised.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "it is not desirable to proceed with a Bill which unnecessarily interferes with the Cathedral Precincts at Norwich, and with the ancient historical gateway there,"—(Mr. E. Stanhope),—instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

MR. THOROLD ROGERS said, the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House had entirely covered the ground which he (Mr. Thorold Rogers) had proposed to occupy in the Motion for the rejection of the Bill which stood on the Paper in his name. If the House accepted the Amendment, as he trusted it would, his Motion would be rendered altogether superfluous. But, beyond the points urged by the hon. Gentleman, it was as well to add this also—that, although the course which the line was proposed to take would only touch portions of the precincts of very little importance, yet, as it was intended to construct a central station in Norwich, which would be very close to the Cathedral buildings, it would seem to be absolutely impossible but that, at some time or other, the contingency to which the hon. Gentleman referred must come, and the extension of the central station, with sidings in the direction of the Cathedral precincts, would be inevitable. He did not object to the Bill on general grounds. He knew it was necessary to the town and city of Norwich that there should be a central station, and he disclaimed all hostility to the Bill. But he did think that, under the circumstances, the House should be invited to pronounce an opinion whether they would sanction an entirely novel course in regard to the lines on which railways in future were to be constructed; so that if they were to permit Railway Companies to invade these open spaces, they should in this case do it with their eyes open, before sending the Bill to the House of Lords.

SIR JOHN KENNAWAY said, he had the honour to act as Chairman of the Committee by which the extension of this line into Norwich was sanctioned two years ago, and he therefore hoped that he would be allowed to state a few facts. The railway was one which had had a stormy existence during the time it had been before the world. It was originally a small line through Lynn to Fakenham; but the promoters saw that it was possible by its means to open out a fresh communication between Norwich and the great Midland districts. It was strongly approved by the landowners, who were anxious to break down the monopoly of the Great Eastern Railway Company, and in spite of great opposition and contest, lasting over four or five weeks, the Committee unanimously decided to sanction the Bill. They were told that there was not the slightest chance of the line ever being made; but within the two years which had since elapsed he believed it was rapidly approaching completion, and that it would shortly be opened into Norwich itself. He need not say the line passed through a very important district—important to the agricultural industries of Norwich, and to the much larger connections it opened up. It was now naturally exciting a great deal of alarm by the proposal to enter, in however small a way, into the Cathedral precincts; but he thought that a greater objection to it in the minds of many was that it had committed the greater audacity of attempting to compete with the Great Eastern Railway in that district. As the line was originally passed, a station was sanctioned in the north part of the city of Norwich, and one chief recommendation of that station at the time was that, although not central or convenient, it would be the means of clearing away some very bad rookeries and some very poor buildings which it was most desirable to remove. But it was always felt that it would be a great advantage if the station could be brought to the southern side of the town, in the hope of connecting it with the other railways. The reason of the alteration now proposed was that it was felt desirable to bring this railway, feeding a very important agricultural district, into immediate communication with the Cattle Market of Norwich. That was felt to be a most important object by the Corporation of Norwich, who would, no doubt, be represented in the House that day, and who, by a large majority, had passed a resolution approving of the Bill. At the same time, he could not wonder for a moment at the jealousy which had been excited by the proposal, both on the part of the Dean, who was the natural guardian of the Cathedral and of its precincts, and of the public, whose interest was naturally and laudably on behalf of those ancient monuments of which the people were so proud in England, and for the preservation of which the hon. Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) was constantly asking the sanction of Parliament. But the question was really whether they were in a fit condition in that House to decide the matter on ex parte statements, either on one side or the other. If they took upon themselves the responsibility of accepting the Amendment, the case made out in its favour ought to be an absolutely unanswerable one. In this case there was something, at all events, to be said on the other side. His hon. Friend who moved the rejection of the Bill said that it unnecessarily interfered with the precincts of the Cathedral at Norwich. He (Sir John Kennaway) held in his hand a letter from a Norwich clergyman—Prebendary Brereton—in which that gentleman said that the proposed railway would be nearly a quarter of a mile from the Cathedral, and that, although it crossed a portion of the precincts, it would do them no injury. Indeed, it was in the very position of the railway at Oxford, with which the hon. Gentleman had compared the proposed line. It would no more interfere with the Cathedral precincts at Norwich than the line at Oxford did with the gardens and Colleges there. And, further, he was told that these precincts at Norwich were neither ornamental nor attractive, being nothing more than tumble-down buildings and groups of pigsties. Nor was it intended to isolate or intercept the interesting old water-view; but the railway would pass at a convenient distance from it, and so high as to leave the gateway uninjured. He did not vouch for these statements; but, as he had told the House, there was a Norwich clergyman who did vouch for them. Of course, the statement about the thin end of the wedge they had often heard before. This, however, was a case that ought to be decided on special merits; and where there were these strong differences of opinion, the best place for settling them was a Select Committee upstairs, where every statement could be thoroughly examined, and a fair hearing given to all the parties concerned.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he sympathized with the feeling of the Dean and Chapter with regard to the sacredness of these precincts, and he should certainly support the Amendment of his hon. Friend, if he did not hope that he could see his way to a very fair compromise between the Dean and Chapter and the promoters of this railroad. He had been spoken to on both sides of the question, and he therefore desired to effect a compromise. The question was this. There was really a double opposition to the proposed line. There was the opposition of the Great Eastern Railway with regard to competition in Norwich, and also the opposition of the Dean and Chapter, founded on the more reasonable grounds so eloquently stated by his hon. Friend the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope). He wished to have the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Lyon Playfair) for a few moments while he stated what the nature of the compromise he had to suggest was. The objections raised to the line by the Dean and Chapter were because the line went right across the Cathedral precincts, and proposed by an embankment to shut out the water-gate. That water-gate was a monument of great historical value, and therefore, in the first place, the Dean and Chapter did not wish the precincts to be touched; and secondly, they did not wish to have the water-gate shut out from view. He was authorized by the promoters to state that if his hon. Friend would withdraw his Amendment, they would undertake entirely to abandon the line through the precincts of the Cathedral, to carry the line over the river and back again, so as to skirt the precincts without in any way affecting the Cathedral property, except in two small corners, which it would be absolutely necessary to cross in order to avoid blocking up a public road and destroying some vinegar works, the compensation for which would be very large. By this means there would be no embankment in the Cathedral precincts at all, and no shutting out of the water-gate from the public view. The deviation would go to the other side of the river, and the line would run then upon the south side, and thus approach the central station which it was proposed to make near the Cattle Market. The promoters proposed to carry out this compromise in the following way. There would be some difficulty in carrying it out this year, unless they could make private arrangements with the owners of property. They would therefore withdraw that portion of the Bill this year, on condition that the Dean and Chapter would not oppose their application next year for a Bill in the terms he now suggested—namely, to leave the precincts entirely free except at these two corners which it was a matter of public necessity to take. The water-gate would not be interfered with, and the embankment and other works would be carried to the other side of the river. He thought the offer was a fair one, and he hoped his hon. Friend, on the assurance he now gave, would withdraw his opposition to the Bill.

MR. TILLET said, he held in his hands a Petition from the Corporation of Norwich in favour of the Bill. After referring to the project contained in the Bill, it went on to state that the proposed railroad would be of great advantage to the city. It had been stated by the hon. Gentleman who moved the rejection of the Bill that there was considerable alarm in the locality in regard to the provisions of the measure. He (Mr. Tillett) was rather surprised to hear such a statement; and it was a singular fact that no Member representing the locality had come forward to move the rejection of the Bill in the place of the hon. Gentleman. He observed on the Paper three Notices of Amendment—one by the hon. Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope), another by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Thorold Rogers), and a third by the hon. and learned Member for Bridport (Mr. Warton); neither of whom in any way represented the district. Surely it was remarkable, if so strong a feeling existed in Norwich and the neighbourhood against the measure, or against the particular part of it to which reference had been made, that neither of the Members for Norfolk, nor either of the Members for the City of Norwich, had been induced to come forward to move the rejection of the Bill. The fact was, that the strong feeling in Norwich was in favour of the Bill. The inhabitants desired to have a central station, as the hon. Gentleman had rightly observed; and he (Mr. Tillett) thanked the hon. Baronet opposite (Sir John Kennaway), who was Chairman of the Committee two years ago, for the reference he had made to the actual facts of the case, because he was quite convinced that a considerable number of hon. Members who had cheered the statements made in opposition to the Bill did not know the locality, or the nature of what was called the contemplated invasion, or what was the real aspect of this picturesque water-gate. The fact was, that there would be, as things stood, three railways in the city of Norwich—one of them with a station at a place Heigham, in the north-west corner of the city; another with a station called Victoria, on the south side; and a third in connection with the Company opposing the present Bill. It was extremely inconvenient and perplexing to the public to have these distinct and distant termini for approaching the city of Norwich; and this Bill proposed to construct a central station, and to extend the terminus of the Lynn and Fakenham Railway from somewhere about Heigham in the north-west corner to the foot of the Cattle Market. Norwich being the Metropolis of a large agricultural district, and one of the principal Cattle Markets in the Kingdom, it would be of great advantage not to Norfolk only, but to the Northern and Midland districts, to have this station constructed. It was because the Bill proposed to give to Norwich the prospect, and also the assurance, of a central station that the people of Norwich were strongly in favour of its being sent to a Committee. In 1845 the Great Eastern Railway Company, or rather the Associated Companies that were afterwards amalgamated under the name of the Great Eastern, did actually project an extension of this railway to this very spot, or near to it. They applied to Parliament for a Bill in 1845, and obtained the sanction of Parliament to it. They thereby recognized that it was important and desirable for their own interests and the interests of the community that this central station should be made. But from 1845 down to the present time not a single step had been taken in the direction of carrying out that which was the implied purpose of the Railway Company. And now that Norwich saw the chance and the promise of a central station, the inhabitants were very anxious indeed that the House should not allow the Bill to be strangled in the way now proposed, but that it should be sent upstairs and be inquired into, so that the real interests of the public and the real interests of the agriculturists might be considered in the matter, and that it should not be made a mere question of bargaining between the Dean and Chapter and the promoters of the undertaking. He held it to be exceedingly inconvenient that questions should be raised upon the details of Private Bills in this way. The House was already overcharged with Public Business, and questions of urgent importance in which the entire nation was concerned could hardly be advanced a single step. There were now before the House some 180 or 200 Private Bills upon which questions of this kind could be raised and the Business of the country be almost put a stop to. That would not only be a source of great inconvenience to the House, but it would be a source of injustice to the country, because hon. Gentlemen would attend the Sitting of the House at 4 o'clock who had received private letters and been invited to discuss these questions upon ex parte statements, without having been able to hear the evidence of the engineers or to look at the proper plans. If this course were to be sanctioned, there was extreme peril that undertakings of the greatest importance to particular localities and to the community at large might be put an end to by an opposition raised in this way. He had no wish to pronounce an opinion in favour of every detail of the present Bill. If it could be shown that it was not necessary for the line to go through the precincts of the close; if there was a wanton and unnecessary invasion of what was called the sacred close; then let a Committee ascertain the fact on the evidence of the engineers, and let them decide accordingly. But the question ought not to be decided by the House upon a one-sided statement. He was able to confirm the assertion already made, that this railway did not propose to go within a quarter of a mile of the Cathedral at the point where it passed the property of the Dean and Chapter. He believed that 400 yards, or thereabouts, was the distance at which it passed the meadows, and it did not touch a single building upon the property of the Dean and Chapter. It came up to a street called Cathedral Street, at a distance of more than 300 yards from the Cathedral. He was prepared to concede that if the line unnecessarily intruded upon the privacy and seclusion of the Cathedral precincts, it ought to be resisted; but that was a question for a Committee upstairs, and he should not complain if, after hearing all the evidence, a Committee arrived at the opinion that such an objection was a fatal objection to the Bill. What he objected to was, that in that House, upon mere ex parte statements, they should be called upon, without having before them the substantial facts of the case, to reject the Bill.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that, by the indulgence of the House, he wished to say one word in regard to the compromise which had been offered by his hon. Friend the Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff). He was afraid that he was not able to accept that compromise. The proposal of his hon. Friend was, first of all, that the line authorized to be constructed by Part No. 6 of the Bill should be withdrawn for the present year. So far he had no objection to make. But his hon. Friend went further, and proposed that he (Mr. Stanhope) should give an undertaking that no opposition should be given by the Dean and Chapter, or any other person in whose interests he had been speaking, next year, when a Bill was to be brought forward for a railway which would cut the Cathedral close in two different places. [Sir H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: Only two corners.] It must be obviously clear that he could not accept a conditional scheme of which he knew nothing whatever upon a mere statement of this kind by his hon. Friend. Such a scheme, when submitted to Parliament, might be found to be in the highest degree objectionable; and, therefore, he must reluctantly press the Resolution.

MR. BULWER said, he should not have troubled the House if it had not been for the speech of the hon. Member for Norwich (Mr. Tillett), who had stated that no Member who had any connection with the county of Norfolk had been found to put down his name in opposition to the Bill. Now, when he looked at the Notice Paper, and found that three Notices had already been given for the rejection of the Bill, he considered it unnecessary, although a Norfolk man, to add another, or otherwise he should undoubtedly have done so. It was scarcely necessary to remind the House that this was not a case of opposition to the whole Bill. The Company promoting the Bill had a station already at Heigham, and the opposition was only directed to a portion of the present scheme—the portion delineated on the map by a red line. No objection was raised to the construction of a line to Norwich from the station at Heigham, but only to that portion of it which ran through the precincts of the Cathedral. He agreed with his hon. Friend on the Front Bench, the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope), in all the objections he had so eloquently urged against the invasion of the precincts of the Cathedral, and also to the contemplated appropriation of open places in that already crowded city. At the same time, he should have thought that the compromise suggested by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) would have been in many respects a reasonable one, because the railroad would then be carried on the opposite side of the river, and there could be no very great objection to the slight invasion of the Cathedral property which would then be necessary. The junior Member for Norwich (Mr. Tillett) said the great object of promoting the line was to bring the station into the Cattle Market in the centre of the city. He should have thought that the Corporation of Norwich would themselves have been extremely jealous of having this space in the centre of the city occupied by a station of that kind, and that they would have preferred a station in another and more convenient place, exactly opposite the station of the Great Eastern Railway Company, which led to Yarmouth and the Eastern Coast. He felt it necessary to point out that if the Bill was to pass in its present form, and if this was to become a great cattle line, passing cattle through Norwich to the Northern and Midland districts, it was quite obvious that an increase of station accommodation would be required as the cattle trade developed, and if that accommodation could not be found in the city it must be found somewhere close at hand. They would not be able to obtain this increased accommodation in the direction of the river, as the hon. Member for Norwich had shown; and if it was hereafter found necessary to provide it, the provision must be made not on the river side, but by further encroachment upon the precincts of the Cathedral. He thought that was a fatal objection against allowing the Bill to pass in its present shape. At the same time, he would repeat that the compromise which had been suggested was not an unreasonable one to consider. As to the question in dispute being one between two Railway Companies, he had nothing to do with that. He had no interest in either of the Companies, and he ventured to think that getting two railroads into Norwich might, after all, be of no very great advantage to the citizens of Norwich, so far as competition was concerned. Hon. Members knew very well, from past experience, that even where the public had two Railway Companies to deal with, those Companies had only to put their heads together, and the public found themselves ground between two millstones instead of by only one.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, he thought the promoters of the Bill must see that there was a strong feeling in the House against interfering with the precincts of the Cathedral more than was absolutely necessary. The compromise suggested by the hon. Member for Portsmouth (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) was practically a new suggestion, and was altogether outside the limits of deviation contained in the Bill. He would suggest that the promoters should withdraw Part 6 of the Bill, which authorized the construction of the works that were objected to, and go on with the other parts of the Bill against which there was no contention. If this suggestion were accepted the Bill might be read a second time, and the promoters would be able to bring forward a Bill next year without any pledge on the part of the Dean and Chapter. He would, therefore, suggest that the promoters should give an undertaking that Part 6 of the Bill should be withdrawn, and that the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mid Lincolnshire (Mr. Stanhope) should then withdraw his opposition to the Bill.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he had no right to speak again; but, with the indulgence of the House, perhaps he might be permitted to say that the promoters of the Bill authorized him to state that, in accordance with the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Chairman of Committees (Mr. Lyon Playfair), they would withdraw that portion of the Bill which affected the precincts of the Cathedral.

SIR WILLIAM FFOLKES, as Vice Chairman of the Company who were promoting the Bill, said, he would be happy to give a guarantee on their part that that portion of the measure which referred to the precincts of the Cathedral of Norwich should be withdrawn.

MR. E. STANHOPE said, that, upon that understanding, he begged leave to withdraw the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time, and committed.

QUESTIONS.

DUBLIN CITY MARKET COMPANY.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, under a Bill obtained some years ago by the Dublin City Market Company, authorising them to buy houses in South Great Georges Street, Dublin, Mr. Joseph Fishbourne was appointed arbitrator, but resigned without making the awards; whether Mr. Posnet was appointed arbitrator in the room of Mr. Fishbourne, and, in several cases heard by him about a year ago, has not yet made awards; whether the Market Company are throwing down houses adjoining those in respect of which, after a period of a year since hearing, awards have not yet been made; and, whether he can say how soon Mr. Posnet may be expected to discharge his functions?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he had no responsibility in the matter, which lay within the province of the Board of Works. He believed that as much progress was being made as possible.

LAW AND JUSTICE (IRELAND)— MESSRS. CROTTY AND OTHERS.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is true that seven persons, namely, Messieurs Crotty, O'Brien, Clune, Scanlan, Hogan, and Marogire, of Scariff, county Clare, and John Gregg, of Tulla, in the same county, were arrested under the Coercion Act on the 17th ultimo, and confined in the lock-up, or "black-hole," of the Police Barrack at Tulla from about 11 a.m. on the 17th ultimo, till about 3 p.m. on the following day; whether, during the time referred to, none of the seven men were permitted to leave the "black-hole" for any purpose whatever; and, whether this "black-hole" is a place that measures eight feet by seven?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, these men were not arrested under the Protection Act. They were arrested on a charge of treason-felony. They were brought to Tulla on the 17th ultimo, and were committed on the 18th. In the meantime, they were detained in the Tulla police barracks. He was sorry to say that the room in which they were kept was a small one; but there was no probability of obtaining cars on the same day to remove them, the police having been "Boycotted" by the car-owners. They were removed to Ennis the next day on cars brought out from that town. During the time they were in the barracks at Tulla they were allowed to see their friends, and relieved of as much restraint as was consistent with their safe custody.

STATE OF IRELAND—OUTRAGE AT DERRY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that a serious outrage, said to have been committed upon some of the servants at Government House, Derry, during the visit of the Irish Society to Derry in August 1880, was reported to the Constabulary; whether said outrage was ascribed as a party one to the Roman Catholics of the neighbourhood; whether, during subsequent inquiries by a detective into an alleged larceny of spirits and wine, the property of the said Society, it transpired that no such outrage had been perpetrated; whether the supposed outrage was not an act done by the servants themselves; and whether this is the first occasion that strong suspicion has attached to some of the employés of the Society in connection with serious party outrages in Derry not long since; and, whether, in view of the stigma placed upon the Catholics of Derry, he will order an independent investigation into the circumstances?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the occurrence referred to in the Question took place in August, 1879, and was believed at the time to have been a party outrage. A magisterial investigation, however, failed to elicit any evidence implicating any parties. He believed some time, the property of the Irish Society, as alleged to have disappeared at the railway station at Londonderry; but it subsequently transpired that it had been correctly delivered. He saw no necessity at present of ordering an investigation.

INLAND REVENUE STAMPING DEPARTMENT (SCOTLAND).

DR. CAMERON asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the inconvenience suffered by persons in Glasgow requiring forms to be stamped, through the necessity of sending them to Edinburgh, and the great delays which frequently occur through the inability of the Edinburgh office to overtake its work; whether it is a fact that on the 9th of March the Controller of Inland Revenue at Edinburgh advised the Department at Glasgow, that, owing to the demand for penny forms, consequent on the adoption of limited liability by the Scottish banks, large orders for "one penny" forms could not be supplied from Edinburgh in less than three weeks, while by sending them to London or Manchester for stamping they could be obtained in one week; and, whether he will consider the propriety of establishing in Glasgow an independent stamping department?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: I regret to learn that there has been some delay in obtaining the necessary stamped forms in Glasgow. It was due, I am informed, to the adoption of limited liability by the Scotch banks; and, in order to meet it, the assistance of the Stamping Departments in London and Manchester has been called in. This arrangement, it is believed, is approved by the principal persons concerned. The pressure due to temporary causes would not, in my opinion, justify the expense of a Stamping Department at Glasgow, in addition to that at Edinburgh.

DR. CAMERON: Would the noble Lord recommend the Committee to send the press of work to London, or somewhere else, where it could be done, so as to enable the work to be got through?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: That is what I have stated is being done. The work is sent to Manchester and London.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JAMES DOOLEY.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. James Dooley, at present detained under the Coercion Act in Clonmel Gaol, had at the time of his arrest a licence for the sale of arms; whether such licence was revoked fourteen days after his arrest; whether all his arms and ammunition were at once given up to the police ; whether he has since been unable to obtain payment, as provided by the Arms Act, for such arms, although four months have elapsed since they were surrendered ; and, whether he will inquire into the cause of this delay ?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that this prisoner was arrested on the 18th of November, his licence for the sale of arms was revoked on the 19th of November, and the arms and ammunition which belonged to him given up to the police on the 14th of December. The person acting on his behalf sent in a bill for the price of the arms, £54 odd, and he was asked for the invoice, which he failed to produce. That was the reason of the delay.

MR. REDMOND asked if the man was to be left without the price of his arms until he produced the invoice, which, perhaps, was lost ?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he could get another from the person from whom he purchased the arms.

VACCINATION ACT (1867), SEC. 31.

MR. BURT asked the President of the Local Government Board, Whether he is aware that section thirty-one of the Vaccination Act of 1867 was obtained from Parliament on the express understanding that it was needed in order to give jurisdiction over children born before the new Act came into operation, but since the Act of 1853 ; and whether, as the section is no longer needed for its original purpose, and as there are no children now to whom the rest of the Act does not apply, he will consider the propriety of ordering the use of Section 31 to be discontinued ?

MR. DODSON: The Question of my hon. Friend is based upon an erroneous assumption. There is nothing in the Act of 1867 limiting it to the children referred to ; and, so far from there being any understanding that Section 31 should be limited as suggested, it is so drawn as to include all children, whether born before or after the passing of the Act. I cannot, therefore, assent to the conclusion that the section in question is no longer required for its original purpose. I am desirous that the powers of the section should not be abused ; but I have no authority to order the use of it to be discontinued.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. RICHARD HODNETT.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Richard Hodnett, suspect, while in Cork Gaol, was called on by two gentlemen on the 3rd February ; whether the gentlemen were informed by a warder that Mr. Hodnett refused to see them ; whether he is aware that Mr. Hodnett denies having given any such message ; but, on the contrary, states that he was anxious to see his friends ; and, what notice the Government propose to take of the matter ?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that two men called on Mr. Hodnett, while in Cork Gaol, on the 3rd of February. He was informed of their arrival, and he stated to the warder that he could see no visitors that day. The warder informed the two visitors accordingly.

MR. HEALY said, the truth of this statement was altogether denied by Mr. Hodnett.

INTERNATIONAL LAW—THE SPANISH STEAMER "LEON XIII."

DR. CAMERON asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether it is a fact that the master of the Spanish Steamer "Leon XIII." having been imprisoned by the British authorities at Singapore for refusing to produce the engineers of the vessel, British subjects, whom he had arbitrarily placed in irons, the vessel a fortnight ago "escaped" from Singapore, carrying off the engineers in question ; whether, before escaping, she complied with the Law as to clearance at the Custom House ; if not, whether he will insist upon the Spanish Government restoring to British jurisdiction the British subjects thus piratically carried off ; and, whether he will instruct our representative at Manila, whither the "Leon XIII." is bound, carefully to watch over their interests ?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: The statement of my hon. Friend with regard to the imprisonment of the master, and the escape of the engineers, of the Leon XIII. is substantially correct. No Custom-house exists at Singapore ; but the engineers in question have been handed over to the British Consul at Manilla.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—SUPERANNUATION OF DR. ALEXANDER SMILEY, MEDICAL OFFICER AT BALLYCURRY.

MR. MELDON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Dr. Alexander Smiley, who had served for nearly thirty years as medical officer of the Ballycurry Dispensary district of the same Union, had been compelled by broken health (brought about by the arduous duties he was called on to discharge) to resign his office, had been recently refused any superannuation allowance by the guardians of the said Union, although the dispensary committee of the district had unanimously recommended him for a pension; and, if so, what was the reason assigned for such refusal; and, whether, considering the public disadvantage that a medical officer should, at the age of sixty-four, after thirty years' service, and in ill health, be compelled to persevere in the attempt to perform his duties, night and day, in a district the area of which is 14,215 acres, with a population of 4,533 persons, mostly in poor circumstances, he would take some steps to avoid this public evil?

MR. W. E. FORSTER understood that, in the main, the facts, as stated in the Question, were correct.

MR. BIGGAR asked by what evidence the right hon. Gentleman said the last portion of the statement was correct?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, he thought it almost spoke for itself. It would be very hard that an officer who had attained the age of 64 years should be obliged to perform the duties of such a district.

MR. BIGGAR said, he asked the Question with reference to the two last lines, which stated, "with a population of 4,533 persons, mostly in poor circumstances."

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am afraid it is the case with many people in Ireland.

MR. BIGGAR: No; it is not.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE, SCHEDULE VI.—PUPIL TEACHERS.

MR. SALT asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether any representations have been made to him as to the inconvenience that will arise in certain of the elementary schools in arranging the daily school-work, if the teaching hours of the pupil teachers are reduced from thirty hours to twenty-five hours per week, as proposed in Schedule VI. of the new Code; and, whether he will consider the possibility of some modification of this general restriction, under the authority of the inspector or otherwise?

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, that representations had been made to him as to the inconvenience that would arise in certain elementary schools if the teaching hours of the pupil teachers were reduced from 30 to 25 per week, as proposed in Schedule VI. of the new Code; but he thought they were made under a misapprehension. Existing contracts were not at all affected by the change. It was only the contracts of the pupil teachers in the future that would be affected; and they should be very loth indeed to increase the hours, for they believed pupil teachers had been greatly over-worked, and that there had been a great deal of suffering in consequence. If inconvenience were found to result from the regulation, it could be modified; but he would wait for experience of its working before taking any step in that direction.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. THOMAS BRENNAN.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Thomas Brennan was suddenly removed, a few days since, from Kilmainham to Naas Prison, after an imprisonment in the former place for a period not far short of a year, many months of which he had spent in the infirmary of the Prison, where he was at the time of the order for his removal; whether the removal of Mr. Brennan was so suddenly executed as to prevent him from seeing, before his departure, his regular medical adviser, Dr. J. E. Kenny; and, whether the removal to Naas cuts Mr. Brennan off from Dr. Kenny's care; whether Mr. Brennan has been for some months in a precarious state of health; whether he will lay upon the Table Copies of the Report on Mr. Brennan's condition, made by Dr.

Robert MacDonnel about three months ago, and, since then, by Dr. Carte, the official medical attendant at Kilmainham Prison; and, whether any reason can be assigned for the removal of Mr. Brennan, in his dangerous state of health, from a prison, in which his own medical adviser had daily access to him, to one in which he is totally deprived of the exercise of that gentleman's skill and care?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that Thomas Brennan had not been removed to Naas Gaol, but to Kilkenny. It was not the fact that he had been so suddenly removed as to prevent his having been seen by a doctor before he left. He was informed two days before of his intended removal, and, in accordance with his wish, Dr. Kenny saw him before he was removed. Dr. Carte also saw him. Thomas Brennan was in his ordinary health, and for some time back no reasonable complaint had been made on the ground of ill-health. Instead of the change being dangerous to Mr. Brennan, it was thought it would be beneficial. He did not consider he was called upon to lay upon the Table the certificate of the doctor.

MR. SEXTON: Perhaps the right hon. Gentleman will tell the House why Mr. Brennan was removed to Kilkenny?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, the reason Mr. Brennan was removed to Kilkenny was that the Executive found it necessary to secure the safe-keeping of the prisoners; and also to prevent their carrying on practices for which it had been found necessary to detain them, and to prevent them carrying on communication with outside parties.

MR. SEXTON gave Notice that he would move for Papers bearing on this question.

STATE OF IRELAND—RIOT AT BALLYRAGGET.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Mr. Adams, of the Munster Circuit, who acted as counsel for the next-of-kin of James Marsfield, in respect to whose death the jury at the inquest, held in Ballyragget, returned a verdict of wilful murder against the sub-inspector in charge of the police, which has been lately quashed by the Court of Queen's Bench, on the application of the Attorney General for Ireland, stated that when the first witness on behalf of the next-of-kin, John Delaney, of Abbeylaix, attended at the police barracks, pursuant to the coroner's directions, in order to identify the sub-inspector who gave the order to charge, Delaney, on entering the police barrack, was threatened, and it was stated his name would be taken down for the purpose of having him prosecuted; whether, during the inquest, and within forty-eight hours after this threat, John Delaney was in fact arrested under the Coercion Act, and has been since detained in Naas Gaol; what is the date of the warrant under which the said John Delaney was arrested; was not the said John Delaney at the time conducting a considerable business in Abbeylaix, which has been greatly injured by his detention; and is it the intention of the Chief Secretary to prolong the imprisonment of Delaney, which has now continued over five months, or to direct an inquiry into the circumstances of his case?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON), in reply, said, he was not informed Mr. Adams was present. Delaney was arrested under the Protection of Person and Property Act, on the 17th of October, under a warrant dated the 14th instant. His case was under the consideration of the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN asked whether, if it was proved to the satisfaction of the right hon. and learned Gentleman that Mr. Adams and the Coroner were present, any steps would be taken for the release of Delaney?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON) said, he thought not, and for this reason—he thought it would be a bad precedent to establish—that of making counsel in a case a witness in the case.

MR. PATRICK MARTIN asked whether, in point of fact, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had received information to the effect that Mr. Adams was not present?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. W. M. JOHNSON): I have received no information at all about Mr. Adams.

QUARTERMASTERS SERVING IN INDIA.

EL ALEXANDER asked the y of State for India, Whether make Clauses 198 and 201 of the Warrant applicable to Regiments in India, with a view to enable masters of those Regiments to be advantages to which Quarter-serving elsewhere are entitled; he will state the reason why masters serving in India, who rank of Captain, do not receive wances always granted in India rs of that rank?

MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON, said, that, so far as their Eng- was concerned, Quartermasters ents serving in India came under litions and rates of the Royal War- ferred to in the Question. With to their Indian pay and allow- the Government of India would ressed in view of their reporting subject of the hon. and gallant r's Question; but he had to ob- that the rank held by Quarter- s serving in India, as elsewhere, norary and relative only, and did erefore, necessarily carry with it y and allowances of substantive

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE—ARTICLE 109, G.

GEORGE HAMILTON asked ice President of the Council, er, under the New Code (Art. IV.), it is intended that scholars ay choose to remain at school assing Standard VII. should con- to the Grant made to their either by their attendances (Art. by their passes on re-examination dard VII.?

MUNDELLA, in reply, said, was the intention of the Depart- hat scholars who remained at the after passing Standard VII. should ute to the Grant.

MUNDELLA: Certainly.

EGYPT—ROBBERY OF BRITISH SUBJECTS.

RAIN AYLMER asked the Under ary of State for Foreign Affairs,

If he has received any communication from our representative in Egypt regarding the robbery, reported in the "Globe," of all the effects of six English gentlemen, who have been travelling in the Atbara Mountains, by an Abyssinian tribe; and, whether the Egyptian Government have been asked to send assistance to these gentlemen?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: No information has been received from Her Majesty's Agent in Egypt with regard to the robbery of Englishmen by Abyssinians in the Atbara Mountains; but as it is known that some of the party are personally acquainted with Sir Edward Malet, there is no doubt that he will do all in his power to assist them.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—THE NEW WAREHOUSING SCHEME.

MR. SPENCER BALFOUR asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, If it is still intended to enforce the superannuation of those upper division clerks of the Customs Warehousing Department in the prime of life who do not wish to undertake service in the Outdoor Department, while retaining in other departments some thirty clerks who are upwards of sixty years of age?

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, Whether he will inform the House what are the immediate and prospective savings, if any, in the Estimates, from the impending changes in the Customs Department; and, whether they will not involve the superannuation of many public servants in the prime of life?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH: It is impossible, in the present state of affairs, to give a definite answer either to this Question or to the latter part of that of my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark. When we know how many of the warehousing clerks are willing to accept posts in the re-organized Department, and how many wish to retire, we shall be in a position to consider whether it will be necessary to compel any officers under 60 years of age to retire. I hope it will not be so necessary; and we shall endeavour to avoid this result by every means consistent with the interests of the public service. As regards the former part of the Question of my hon. Friend the Member for Southwark, I have to state that the Estimates now before the House are framed on the basis of the old establishments. The changes are expected ultimately to produce a considerable reduction of expense; but the amount of that reduction cannot yet be stated. Economy was not the first motive for making the change.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. ALLIS, CULLINANE, FLOOD, AND DALTON.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he will have any objection to allow the four Poor Law guardians of Tipperary Union, at present confined as suspects in Kilkenny Gaol, Messrs. Allis, Cullinane, Flood, and Dalton, to be released on parole in order to take part in the election of officers for their union on Tuesday next?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he did not think that was a ground for releasing the prisoners in question.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—OUTBREAK OF FEVER IN CLONMEL GAOL.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can give the House any information as to the outbreak of fever in Clonmel Gaol, and as to the disposition or removal of the suspects therein confined? The hon. Member said he put the Question in consequence of a telegram he had received stating that this was the second outbreak of fever in the prison, and that prisoners were put in the cells next those where the sick prisoners were, and no attention had been made to complaints.

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that he had sent a telegram that morning directing the Governor to inform him if fever had broken out in Clonmel Gaol, and, in reply, he had received a telegram which stated that a case of typhoid fever had occurred. The inspector and architect of the prison had gone to see what could be done for the safety of the prisoners; but he had not yet received their Report.

In reply to MR. HEALY,

MR. W. E. FORSTER assured the hon. Member that he would do all he could in order to prevent a spread of the fever; and he should at once telegraph to inquire as to how the prisoner was who had been attacked by the disease.

Lord Frederick Cavendish

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. MARTIN O'SULLIVAN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Martin O'Sullivan, who was arrested on the 23rd June 1881, was deprived by the Governor of Limerick Gaol of his necktie; whether, although Mr. O'Sullivan demanded it several times, the Governor refused to give it up; whether it is true that the flags in one of the yards in Limerick prison on a wet day are so covered with water that the yard cannot be exercised in, and that in another yard there is a closet which sometimes emits such an odour as to prevent the suspects from going within a long distance of it; whether it is a fact that, when letters are stopped by the Governor of Limerick Gaol, he will not return to the suspects the penny stamps on the back of the envelopes; and whether it is true that, in this and other gaols, suspects are charged for having their cells cleaned?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that when Mr. O'Sullivan was arrested he wore a large green tie with "Land League" and a harp without a crown worked in with white silk. The Governor took the tie from him. He asked for its return, and it was refused; but when he was discharged it was returned to him. There was a closet in the yard; but it was a good one. During alterations portion of the yard was exposed to the bad weather; but it was now enclosed. In future, when it was necessary to stop a letter at Limerick Gaol, the stamp would be returned to the sender. It was quite true that the "suspects" were charged 1d. a-day for having their cells cleaned, unless they did it themselves; but that matter was discussed last year, and he did not see any reason now for making a change.

STRAITS SETTLEMENTS—SLAVERY IN THE MALAY PENINSULA.

MR. GORST asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether he will lay upon the Table of the House Papers which will show the policy in reference to slavery pursued by the British Government in the protected Native States in the Malay Peninsula; and, what steps have been taken subsequent to the Despatch of the late Secretary of State of March 5th 1879, to promote the Abolition of Slavery in Perak?

MR. COURTNEY: Papers on this subject shall be prepared and laid upon the Table of the House. The existence of slavery in the Malay Peninsula attracted the attention of the late Secretary of State, who took steps to secure its gradual extinction; and in the despatch of the 5th of March, 1879, gave orders to prevent the application of the system of debt-slavery to any new cases. In a despatch written on the 4th instant the Earl of Kimberley directed the Governor of the Straits Settlements to report on the progress that had been made towards the extinction of debt-slavery since the despatch of his Predecessor.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881, SEC. 8

MR. HEALY asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the case of Cullen, tenant, Bunbury, landlord, reported in the “Freeman’s Journal” of the 24th instant, in which Judge O’Hagan commented on the “extreme difficulty of the task imposed on the Land Commission” by section eight, sub-section five of the Land Act, which requires the Court, on application, to fix a specified value of a tenancy with a view to a subsequent sale, and expressed a wish that he could, if possible, evade the difficult task thus imposed on the Court; whether he is aware that the same difficulty has arisen before the Sub-Commissions all over Ireland, and resulted in extreme divergence of practice and procedure among those bodies; whether it is the case that the Sub-Commission has decided that its duty, under the circumstances referred to, is to fix the highest market value of the tenancy as the specified value, while Mr. Justice O’Hagan has expressed an opinion that the specified value should not be the highest market value; that another Sub-Commission was in the habit of fixing, as the specified value, the maximum amount of compensation or disturbance which the tenant would be entitled to if arbitrarily evicted, and without any reference to the tenant’s improvements, but was subsequently compelled to change this practice; that one of the Sub-Commissions has refused to fix a specified value at all, unless specific evidence on the point is offered, while all the other Sub-Commissions fix the value without any evidence on the point having been offered, and discourage the practice of offering such evidence; whether it is the case that the Lord Chancellor and the Master of the Rolls, in their respective judgments in the case of Adams v. Dunseath, expressed contrary opinions as to the meaning of the phrase “true value” of a tenancy; whether it is a fact that the power of fixing a specified value does not apply at all when a holding is subject to the Ulster Custom; and, whether, having regard to the difficulties and contradictions which section eight, sub-section five of the Land Act has given rise to, the Government will take steps to have it repealed?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have telegraphed to Dublin; but, unfortunately, in consequence of the absence of Mr. Justice O’Hagan, it is impossible for me to obtain either the verification or the correction of any of the recitals contained in this Question. I may, perhaps, remind the hon. Member that when the Land Act was in Committee, this rather important subsidiary provision of the Act was almost the only one which passed through the Committee without any opposition or discussion whatever. I do not think a single word was said on the subject. If the hon. Gentleman were correct in the allegations contained in the Question, we should be very desirous to know what are the views of the Judges and Commissioners about it—what light their experience may have thrown on the question; and we shall consider all information so obtained on that and other points without any prejudice whatever. With respect to the closing paragraph of the Question, and the engagement to make an amendment on the Act, I must refer the hon. Member to what I ventured to say a few days ago, and repeat that the Government must depend on the co-operation of the House with respect to their passing measures through the House, and be cautious as to engagements on that subject until they have secured an opportunity.

STATE OF IRELAND—MURDER OF MR. A. E. HERBERT.

MR. BOURKE inquired of the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he can give any information to the House with respect to the report which appears in the papers of the murder of Mr. Herbert, J.P., of Killentenna, Castleisland, county Kerry; and whether any arrests have been made?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am sorry to say that the report is true that Mr. Herbert was murdered last night. He was fired at, and one of the shots struck him in the right lung. I have not heard whether any arrests have been made.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE
THE DEBATE OF THURSDAY.

PERSONAL EXPLANATION.

MR. LEWIS said, he had to ask the indulgence of the House for a few minutes while he referred to a statement made with reference to him on the previous evening by the Premier, and which he was perfectly astonished to read in The Times that morning. The Prime Minister said—

“We have to deal, for instance, with an amplitude of speaking. I am myself charged as an offender in that respect, and the other day I was taken to task for the length of my speeches by the hon. Member for Derry. I am not at all prepared to deny that there is ground for the complaint which the hon. Member made. A great deal of responsibility attaches to one who holds high office, or is the Leader of a Party; but look at the condition at which we have arrived. The hon. Member for Derry reproved me for amplitude in perfect good faith, though he is not the Leader of a Party, nor the holder of a responsible office, and yet the speech in which he reproved me for amplitude was very nearly two hours long.”

Now, he wished to assure the right hon. Gentleman that he was wholly and entirely mistaken with reference to the person whom he supposed to have made those remarks. Neither in the House nor elsewhere had he ever charged the right hon. Gentleman with “amplitude of speech”—[Mr. WARTON: Hear, hear!]—and the only speech of any length that he had himself delivered this Session was on the occasion of the Motion censuring the House of Lords, when he had spoken, not for two hours, but for one hour and 10 minutes. He had looked at the report of this speech, and he found there was no trace whatever of the suggestion which the right hon. Gentleman had made. He had only further to say that in this speech there was only one reference to the Prime Minister. He spoke of the right hon. Gentleman’s speech as reminding him of one of those fitful Atlantic storms, through which he had frequently passed—it was very fierce, very grand, very short, and left no trace behind it. He was, in fact, a most intense admirer of the oratory of the right hon. Gentleman. He should, therefore, be glad if the right hon. Gentleman would either give him some reference to correct what must be his very bad memory, or would withdraw what he had said.

MR. GLADSTONE: I had no knowledge that the hon. Member was going to raise this question, or I would certainly have referred to the reports, in order that I might have been able to verify the accuracy of, or to withdraw, what I said. The House will bear in mind that in referring to the criticism of the hon. Gentleman, as I supposed it to have been given, I fully and frankly acknowledged its justice; but I observed that the criticism was delivered in a speech which I believed approached two hours in length. In the first place, then, I will give the hon. Gentleman my recollection, which, I think, is pretty accurate. He did say the speech was very short; but he added the very significant words, “for him”—a very concise and very effective criticism, of which I make no complaint whatever. In respect to the speech of the hon. Member, I really spoke according to what I believed to be the case, and I had paid some attention to the clock in the course of the speech. If I have over-stated the case against the hon. Member, I am sincerely sorry for it.

HOUSE.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I beg to ask the Prime Minister, Whether the time has been fixed for taking the Navy Estimates; and whether there is any other information the Government can give us as to Business?

MR. GLADSTONE: I am glad the Question has been put. I will state what I think ought to be the course of Business. The House is aware that we propose to take the Miscellaneous Estimates on Monday. It will, however, be necessary, in consequence of circumstances that the House knows very well as to the date before which the annual Mutiny Bill must pass, that we should put down the second reading of that measure as the first Order on Monday. If the second reading be not taken to-night, it will be the first Order on Monday. We are already pledged to take the discussion upon the Army Estimates on Monday, the 17th—the first day after the Recess. We have considered whether it will be most convenient for the House that after that day we should proceed on Thursday with the Resolutions relating to Procedure, or whether we should consider further financial questions which have to be discussed. In the first place, we have a pledge, not so definite in point of time, but we have pledged ourselves to the Navy Estimates; and, in the second place, the time of year will have arrived at which it will be desirable to make the Financial Statement. Upon the whole, I think it would be most convenient and most satisfactory to the House if we take those subjects which are more or less allied together; and we therefore propose to take the Committee on Navy Estimates on Thursday, the 20th of April, and the Financial Statement on Monday, the 24th. After that we shall have the ground comparatively clear; and it will be more convenient to the House to take the subject of Procedure consecutively, so far as we can make it consecutive.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON asked when the Education Estimates would be taken?

LORD FREDERICK CAVENDISH said, these Estimates would be taken first on Monday.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked what Business was to be taken at the Morning Sitting on Tuesday?

MR. GLADSTONE: That must depend, in some degree, on the proceedings on Monday.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MR. DILLON.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary for Ireland a Question with regard to Mr. Dillon. It would be in the recollection of the House that Mr. Dillon was not a robust man. He was suffering from a hereditary illness, which was intensified by his confinement. Mr. Dillon was not a complaining or squeamish man, although the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. W. E. Forster) once called him a coward. Mr. Dillon had, he believed, made no request for release in consequence of ill-health; but he was a medical man, and as he (Mr. Cowen) was informed that, in his own judgment and that of his friends, Mr. Dillon's health was now in a serious condition, he wished to ask the Chief Secretary whether he had received any representation on the subject; and, if so, whether he was inclined to entertain it favourably?

MR. DAWSON said, he had an opportunity of seeing Mr. Dillon a few days ago, and he could corroborate all that had been said as to the state of the hon. Member's health.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I wish I had received Notice of this Question, for I should have brought down a Report of an independent medical man of considerable position as to the state of Mr. Dillon's health. The medical man examined Mr. Dillon, and certainly he gives a Report which is an encouraging one. He is better than he has been. But, apart from this, I have no objection to state here what I have stated before—and Mr. Dillon has been informed of it by one acting on my behalf—that the doors of Kilmainham are open to him if he is willing to go abroad.

MR. SEXTON: Would you state the name of the medical man?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I cannot recollect it; but I know it is a gentleman of high position.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN: Does the right hon. Gentleman mean that he will release Mr. Dillon if he goes abroad from Ireland or from the United Kingdom?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Abroad from the United Kingdom.

MR. HEALY: Shame! you offer transportation.

MR. W. E. FORSTER: I am informed by his friends that it would be for the benefit of his health that he should go abroad. I again say if he likes to go to the Continent he can.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE (RULES OF PROCEDURE)—THE DIVISION ON THURSDAY NIGHT.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Prime Minister a Question of which I have given him private Notice. I beg to ask him, in view of the fact that the Government majority of 140 was in the division of last night reduced to under 40, and of the fact that a large number of the supporters of the Ministry voted only under severe pressure, and in fear of dissolution—[Cries of "Oh!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is now importing into his Question matter of debate.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Very well, Sir; I shall only ask, Whether it is the intention of the Government to press further their Resolution which establishes the clôture by a bare majority?

MR. GLADSTONE: In the Question of the hon. Gentleman, as he has just given it, he call my attention to certain matters and allegations which he conceives to be of very pregnant importance with regard to the state of the Government majority; but in the Notice which he says he was good enough to send me, there is no reference to these great and important facts which he thinks it necessary to introduce as a preamble to his Question. With regard to the Question in the form in which I have received it, I have only to say, Sir, that the 1st Resolution is before the House in the form which the Government think best, and that we have no change in regard to the decision of last night to announce.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

ECCLESIASTICAL COMMISSION.

MOTION FOR A SELECT COMMITTEE.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD, in rising to call attention to the Lands in charge of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England and Wales; and to move—

"That a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the position of the Ecclesiastical Commission with reference to the Lands and other Property vested in the Commissioners, and also into the work, in connection with real property, of the Church Estates Commissioners and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England and Wales," said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the affairs of the largest, the most wealthy, the most widely-operating, the most powerful, and the most dignified Corporation under the Crown. The business of the Ecclesiastical Commission was conducted by gentlemen of much respectability, while in the Commission were included 52 persons who were the highest functionaries in the State, the Church, and the Judiciary. The connection of those great personages with the Ecclesiastical Commission was, however, simply ornamental, except in the case of the Bishops. Five Ministers of the Crown were placed upon it to show that the Commission had public and official sanction; and it was on record that Lord Palmerston, while occupying the Office of First Minister of the Crown, did on one occasion attend the business of the Board. [Mr. GLADSTONE: I have done it.] That occasion was one in which this House had given some attention to matters connected with the Deanery of York; and what Lord Palmerston experienced on that occasion was that, whatever his power in this House, he was in a hopeless minority at the Board of the Ecclesiastical Commission. But for the information with which the Prime Minister had just honoured him, he was not aware that any Prime Minister had since entered the offices. Judges were placed upon the Commission in order to give the public confidence in the operations of the Board; but no Judge, with the exception of Sir S. Lushington, whose Court was a sort of half-way house between Church and State, had ever attended the meetings. It was supposed, at the outset of the Commission, that the Judges would attend and give their opinion upon matters of law; but no one would regret that they had thought it inconsistent with their duty to attend at the office of the Commissioners when a question might be referred to them which would afterwards have to be submitted to them in their judicial capacity. The Bishops and Deans had practically been, and were at this moment, the governing majority; and the House would not greatly err if it arrived at the conclusion, in regard to the Commission, that it was practically only another form of Upper House of Convocation. His remarks would deal wholly with the landed estates and other property in charge of the Commission. It was, as it were, by an accident that in 1843, by the instrumentality of Sir Robert Peel, this great Commission obtained the power of sale and purchase of land, under which it had conducted such vast operations. Sir Robert Peel proposed that a loan of £600,000 should be advanced from Queen Anne's Bounty to the Commissioners; and, in order to give better security for that loan, power of sale was given to the Commissioners, under which they had conducted their operations for the last 30 years. The Commissioners had, at the present time, investments in the Three per Cents amounting to over £5,000,000, of which a sum of £1,500,000 was derived from the proceeds of sales, which they were bound to re-invest in the purchase of land, but only "so soon as it might be convenient." The House would probably be aware that after the full development of the work of the Commission in 1850, the design and scope of their operations assumed this form—that they were prepared to take over from Ecclesiastical Corporations, from Bishops, Deans, Chapters, and Incumbents, their separate estates, guaranteeing to them a certain statutory income, authorized and fixed by Order in Council; and ultimately, having enfranchised their land and re-arranged those properties, to return the estates to their hands in sufficient extent to provide in perpetuity the income arranged by Order of Council to be given to them. What had been the results in reference to the endeavours of the Commission to go forward in this great undertaking? In the process of enfranchisement the area of Church lands—now including more than 500,000 acres—had been considerably reduced, because, while the Commissioners had been active in purchasing outstanding terms of leases for lives, they had over large areas sold the reversionary interest to the life tenants. From time to time episcopal and capitular estates had fallen into their hands, and there were only two Bishops—those of Llandaff and Bangor—whose estates had not passed on to the books of the Commission. In the operations of the Commission it had been assumed, as a matter of public policy, that Bishops and Deans and Chapters should have estates; and it was always held that when these estates had been enfranchised and had been "ring-fenced," they would pass away from the Commission into local control, under these conditions—that should the income prove more or less than the statutory salary, it would be for the profit or the loss of the incumbents. A Bishop, who took his estate back from the Commissioners—an estate supposed to yield his statutory income—farmed it, in fact, upon a lease for his life, and took it for better or worse. He had no interest in his successor, nor could it possibly be of interest to him to execute upon it the improvement which landed property must at all times require. It was assumed by the Commission that this work would be soon accomplished, and that the surplus in the hands of the Commissioners would have been determined long ago. In 1863 a Select Committee of that House was appointed to inquire into the then state of the Ecclesiastical Commission. One witness of authority gave his opinion that this re-disposition of estates would be completed in 1870; and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Cambridge, who was for many years, from 1855, a responsible Member of the Commission, deliberately gave it as his opinion that all dealings with these estates would be ended in 20 years, and that then all these transactions would be completed. He did not regret, for reasons which he should presently state to the House, that the evidence upon which that Committee proceeded had been disappointed; and it was impossible to conceive a state of things more utterly unlike a realization of the predictions of the right hon. Gentleman than that which now existed. There were at present 30 Bishops, including two Archbishops, in England and Wales, and they were all Members of the Commission. Of these, only three—Canterbury, Hereford, and Lincoln—had taken back the re-arranged estates from the Commission; and it was a fact of great significance that no fewer than nine Bishops, whose estates had been re-arranged and returned into their hands by the Commission, had handed them back again into the permanent custody of the Commission, making them, in fact, a permanent agency for the management of episcopal estates. Those Bishops were York, Durham, Carlisle, Chester, Ely, Gloucester and Bristol, Norwich, Worcester, and Peterborough. The estates of Rochester, Salisbury, St. Davids, St. Asaph, Ripon, and Oxford, were in the office undergoing re-arrangement, so that, since the last Committee of Inquiry, there had been a wholly new departure, and the Commission had a practically permanent work upon its hands, and had now charge of nearly all the episcopal and a great number of the capitular estates. The system of accounts was condemned by the Committee of 1863, and had never been reformed. It was not easy to get at what was the real income of the Commission; but it appeared certain the rental of the estates vested in the Commissioners was not less than £880,000 per annum. The rental of agricultural land was about £300,000. The Commission derived nearly £150,000 a-year from rents of houses and premises in and about London; £270,000 a-year from tithes and corn rent charges; more than £200,000 a-year from mineral rights; and, in addition, large sums were received from ground rents and manorial fees. From the episcopal estates, given back after enfranchisement, they received more than £40,000 a-year, and £32,000 a-year from estates to be applied to specific purposes. Lord Chichester stated to the Duke of Richmond's Commission that the extent of the agricultural land managed by the Ecclesiastical Commission was 250,000 acres; but he thought his Lordship must have omitted the estates given back, and now permanently in the hands of the Commissioners. At all events, it was certain that the Commissioners dealt with an income in connection with real property not far short of £1,000,000 per annum. The Select Committee of 1863, which included Mr. Lowe, Mr. Walpole, Mr. Bouverie, and Lord Robert Cecil (the Marquess of Salisbury), arrived at two conclusions, which he desired especially to press upon the attention of the House. He frankly admitted that he would much rather his request for a Committee were negatived than that it should not be plainly understood that the design of a Committee, if a Committee be appointed, was to devise means for carrying into practical effect the two neglected conclusions of the Committee of 1863—namely—

(2.) "That, independently of the political objection to such a concentration of property, this system unavoidably consumes a considerable part of the revenues of the Church in the expenses of valuing and re-valuing lands, and in the maintenance of a large establishment of secretaries and clerks. Your Committee are of opinion that this excessive expenditure is to be attributed in some degree to the fact that estates so widely dispersed are placed under the management of one Corporation."

He was not indifferent to the welfare of the Church; but he did not profess that that was the mainspring of the action he was taking that night. He was moved to ask for the appointment of this Committee because he thought that the ownership of land by Corporations was, in the words of the Select Committee, "highly objectionable," because he thought that such tenure of land was contrary in the highest degree to public policy and injurious to public interests. As to the limit he sought to impose in that respect, he held it to be a cardinal maxim of public policy that dispositions which took land permanently out of the ordinary conditions of proprietorship were to be defended only by showing that the particular dedication was of such necessity, or of so much value to the commonwealth, that an exception should be made in its favour. His main object was thus plainly declared. He did not desire the appointment of a Select Committee without an understanding that the execution of that public policy was to be a main line of its inquiry. He need not hesitate to recommend a purely economic policy on the ground that it would be productive of great material advantage to the Church. He ventured to say that the Ecclesiastical Commission was unrivalled amongst all the Public Offices of the country for what he might term respectable extravagance, though he did not mean that there was extravagance within the office of the Commissioners. The golden stalls of the Ecclesiastical Commissioner seemed to him to be filled with solicitor and land agents. So far as he could make out, the expenses of the Commissioners for last year, including £55,000 for the erection of buildings and work and for drainage, amounted to about £170,000—that was to say, a charge of about 20 per cent upon the gross revenue of the Commission. If, instead of £5,000,000 of Consols, the Commissioners had all their property similarly invested—with the exception admitted in his statement in definition of public policy—their expenditure would be reduced by nearly £150,000 a-year. H

was not one of those who thought that the value of land in this country would fail to increase. He believed that at the present time land was a good investment, and that at no very distant time it would tend to increase in value; and those who, having regard to the cost of the Commission, might be unwilling to part in any way with their landed property, should bear this in mind—that while undoubtedly there was a probability that the value of land would increase, he did not think there was a probability that the value of the estates in the hands of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would augment by an accretion of £150,000 a-year. But, looking as he did at this matter from the point of view of public interest and policy, he turned his attention to the far greater advantage which, in his opinion, would accrue to the public from giving freedom to this vast area, which included some of the most fertile land in the country. He was a determined opponent to life tenancy in lands; but he believed the most disastrous to public interest was clerical tenure. He had observed with interest that one of the Assistant Commissioners had informed the Duke of Richmond that glebe lands were among the worst farmed lands in the country. Lord Spencer, before he quitted the Commission, asked Mr. Coleman—“What have you to say about Church estates?” to which the Assistant Commissioner replied—

“Take glebe lands; are there any estates that are much worse managed than they? I say, for this reason, that the tenant is a life owner and in the most limited degree; it will not be his son or any relative of his own who will succeed him, and he gets as much as he can out of it during his life.”

A fact worthy of notice was that the Duke of Richmond had received a Report from one of the assistants to his Agricultural Commission, stating with something very like complaint that “up to the present time the Commissioners have not adopted a tenant-right agreement.” He gave his opinion deliberately that the remuneration of solicitors, surveyors, receivers, and architects, who last year appear to have charged in all something like £80,000, had been a very near approach to a scandal in the business of the Ecclesiastical Commission. There had been involved a continuous and needless waste of the funds of the Church. One great cause of the waste had arisen from the practice of paying their solicitors by fees instead of by salary. Why could not the Ecclesiastical Commission, which was at least 20 years behind the fulfilment of the expectation of its founders, adopt the same principles of payment as the Post Office or the Treasury? It had been said that the present system conduced to the quick despatch of business; but, considering its dilatory proceedings, he did not think much could possibly be lost in that way. The business of the Treasury and Post Office was conducted by salaried solicitors and surveyors, and was quickly and satisfactorily done. He had always heartily believed in the doctrine set forth by Edmund Burke, who said—

“That all public estates which are more subservient to the expense of perception and management than of benefit to the public revenue ought, upon every principle, both of revenue and of freedom, to be disposed of.”

He would give an example of one of the 937 “Special Accounts” of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The very considerable estates of the vicarage of Rochdale long ago passed under the control of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. The Commissioners were managing those estates, which were, or would be, worth more than £25,000 a-year, with very considerable ability; but they were doing it under conditions to which he made the most strenuous objection. There were politicians of all sorts in the borough of Rochdale—including, no doubt, men who were in favour of that policy which was called the Nationalization of Land—who were prepared to recommend that a Department of State should deal with farm leases and building leases, with sites for churches and for public-houses, and with all the claims of priority and pre-emption. He had always opposed those ideas as visionary and impracticable. He had always maintained the advantage of the institution of private property in land, and he had always contended that private property in land was the means by which they could secure its best cultivation, and the largest production; but if the farming of the Rochdale Vicarage estates by this Department in Whitehall, on a system which must, of necessity, be most inconvenient and expensive, was to be defended, what answer were they to give to those working men who were asking them to undertake the Nationalization of the whole land of the country? Were they to say that the Nationalization of Land was bad, while they contended that Corporations could farm and control estates like these in all parts of the country? There was no hon. Member in the House who did not know that this system was bad; that with the best intentions such management from Whitehall must be extravagant, dilatory, and tending to an imperfect use of the land. One singular feature of the Ecclesiastical Commission had been that when public opinion was turned upon it there was an immediate disposition to reduce expenditure. Within 30 years the Commissioners had spent more than £1,000,000 in agricultural improvements. There was a strong stimulus in that direction. The land agents received 5 per cent—£50,000—upon that outlay. Well, he had put this Notice on the Paper in 1880, and again in the Session of 1881. It was a curious coincidence that in February, 1881, the Estates Committee came to the conclusion that, as a general rule, the commission of 5 per cent on such improvements should be discontinued, and should be covered by the 4 per cent commission upon the rents. They had made further savings in the same direction. That showed the inevitable extravagance and development of a great land agency department. Next, as to tithes. According to present appearances the tithes in the charge of the Commission would, at no distant date, be trebled, and would exceed £600,000 a-year; and thus nearly one-sixth of the whole tithe-rent charge of England and Wales would be administered by the Commission. He should hope that, in these circumstances, if a Committee were appointed, they might entertain, perhaps through the machinery of this Commission, the question of the redemption of tithe. That would be a measure advantageous both to owners and occupiers of land. Then there was the question of copyholds. The Commission was lord of many manors, and by a curious practice the deputy-stewards gave no account of a moiety of the fees. He hoped that, while preserving the existing right of lord or tenant to compel enfranchisement, a general Statute might bring about the extinction of copyhold tenure within a period from the date of such a Statute of 10 years. He did not doubt that the case was made out for the appointment of a Select Committee for not only had the propositions of the Committee of 1863 been neglected, but the evils against which those propositions were directed had immensely increased. The case was strong beyond denial; because the evidence upon which that Committee rested as to the termination of the estate business of the Commission had been utterly falsified by the results. He would fortify himself with a venerable authority with whom he did not often agree—namely, Lord Grey. In 1861, Lord Grey, alluding to the Greenwich Hospital Estates which had since been disposed of, said—

“The proper mode of guarding against the evils anticipated is by selling the property. I am persuaded that the public is essentially a bad owner of landed property.”

He hoped that sentiment would meet with general assent in that House. He acknowledged that it was most creditable to the distinguished ecclesiastics and Members of the Legislature who had guided the business of this great Commission for 40 years that he was constrained, not by considerations of personal courtesy, but by honest recognition of facts, to say that this vast business, set in the midst of so many and great dangers, had been free from scandalous report.

MR. JAMES HOWARD, in seconding the Motion, said, the management of the ecclesiastical property of this country was a very great scandal; and, moreover, the plan adopted with regard to its management had a tendency to retard agriculture. That such was the case might be seen from a very interesting Report on the agriculture of Durham published in the journal of the Royal Agricultural Society. Although improvements in the management of the estate of the Ecclesiastical Commission had taken place of late years, it would be seen from the Report of the Assistant Commissioner, Mr. Coleman, that very great improvements were still needed. While £8,700 had been put down for drainage in the Report of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, £33,000 had been put down as the cost of official management, and £16,000 as the amount of charges by actuaries and others. If the estates were in the hands of private owners, most of these official expenses would be saved, and a considerable addition, by the sale of the lands, might be made to the number of the landholders of the country. He contended that it was undesirable that land should be held in perpetuity; and especially that in England, where the amount of land was most limited, Corporations should have such a grip on our broad acres.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the position of the Ecclesiastical Commission with reference to the Lands and other Property vested in the Commissioners, and also into the work, in connection with real property, of the Church Estates Commissioners and the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for England and Wales,"—(Mr. Arthur Arnold),

—instead thereof.

MR. GOSCHEN remarked, that there was but one part of this large subject on which he desired to say a few words, and that was the broad principle of the possession of land by Corporations such as the Ecclesiastical Commission. His hon. Friend had covered a great deal of ground, and nearly all the ground he covered was interesting and well deserving the notice of the House. He meant such points as the management of the property by the Commission, the question of the redemption of tithe, and many others which had been alluded to; but he wished to confine his remarks to that part of the speech which dealt with the question whether it was to the public interest that these Corporations should have so large a portion of the soil of this country? Now, upon that subject he had long had a very decided opinion, and it was, he thought, in 1874 that he called public attention to this matter, not only as regarded the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, but also as regarded most corporate bodies which held so much land. He raised the question at that time whether it was desirable that the Statute of Mortmain should practically be entirely neutralized? He was glad to think that there was a very considerable consensus of opinion on this point—that it was to the interest of the country that these Corporations should begin to sell their land. When he had the honour of being the First Lord of the Admiralty he acted, with the consent of the Government, upon the principle he had previously enunciated, and they sold a considerable part of the Greenwich estates, which at that time belonged to Greenwich Hospital, and that policy was continued by their Successors, the Conservative Government. He asked himself, when he was at the Admiralty, whether it was right for a Department which had charge of the enormous interests of the British Navy to be troubled at the same time with the management of vast estates, and to have to settle questions of leases and improvements, and generally to occupy the position of landlords? Fortunately, at that time the Civil Lord (the Earl of Camperdown) was very conversant with the management of estates; but it would have been a great anomaly for a Civil Lord who did not happen to be conversant with such subjects to have to consider questions of leases, drainage, and improvements. In the case of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners things were so far different, that here was a body of gentlemen who were trained to the work; but he thought his hon. Friend had, to a great extent, established that it was exceedingly difficult for them to manage these estates with all the advantage of private landlords. He did not mean only the advantage to the owner of the land; but he also alluded to the advantage to the tenant occupying the land and to the public interest. He was glad his hon. Friend had brought forward this question now; because it appeared to him that if there were previously foundation for a change of system as regarded the ownership of land by Corporations, the events of the last four or five years, and the general turn which agriculture had taken, had strengthened the argument for the change which ought to be made. All that they had heard during the agricultural depression seemed to show that land was a less desirable kind of property for these Corporations to hold than was believed before. The fluctuations in the rents, the lowering in the value, and all the difficulties that had surrounded the ownership of land were all difficulties in the way that were not thought of when agriculture went smoother. They had seen that many questions had been raised between landlords and tenants during the last four or five years; and he did not think it was probable that the discussion upon those questions would be lessened during the next four or five years, although it was to be hoped that better times for the agricultural interest would smooth the way in many respects; but, at the same time, he would ask the House if it was desirable these Corporations should have to undertake with their tenants the decision of the very complicated questions which had now arisen between landlord and tenants? There would be the question as regarded the Agricultural Holdings Act. Public bodies had been in this position—that they had not known whether or not to carry out that which had been the intention of the Legislature. They had been unwilling in some cases to avail themselves of those contracts which had been pointed out by that House as most desirable as forming an arrangement between landlord and tenant. He looked at this question upon the principle that it was undesirable that these Corporations should occupy so great a proportion of the soil of the country; and also upon the more modern ground that the pursuit of agriculture had become more and more a difficult business, requiring more scientific knowledge and more constant attention, both from the landlord and tenant. Upon these grounds, it seemed to him there was a case made for establishing the principle that these Corporations ought by degrees, without creating a depression in the price of land, to pursue the policy of selling rather than purchasing. He did not know what might be the best plan to pursue with regard to the Committee asked for; but whether the Government thought fit to grant the Committee or not, his hon. Friend had done good service by drawing the attention of the public to this most important question.

MR. GLADSTONE: I think it would be for the convenience of the House that I should, at this early period, state the position of the Government with regard to this Motion. I should be very glad, indeed, if I could regard it as a subject entirely dissociated from the position of the Government. I do not think it is so. It appears to me that its magnitude, its complexity, its relation to the large question of principle, are such that inevitably cause it to assume an aspect of inquiry whether the Government are at the present moment prepared to deal with it or not. I do not think it would be advisable for the Government to present to the appointment of this Committee as a mere matter of examination, into the prudence of the detailed Rules under which the detailed business of the Ecclesiastical Commission is conducted. It is obvious that the question of the constitution of the Commission is open to a good deal of observation. It is rather constituted upon the basis which was the favourite one in former times—that of filling bodies of this kind with large numbers of persons already charged with heavy duties and great responsibilities, under the notion, which modern experience has not favoured, that a composition of that sort was not the way to secure an efficient and satisfactory transaction of Business. It is, however, one of the few propositions of my hon. Friend with which I cannot agree, that the Commission assumes, in its practical character, the aspect of another Upper House of Convocation; because, if I am correctly informed, the Bishops, with the exception of one or two, and especially the Bishop of London, who is on the spot, rarely attend its meetings. The attendance of Her Majesty's Ministers is also rare. I myself have attended one or more meetings of the Ecclesiastical Commission as a Minister; but upon the special occasion when Lord Palmerston was Prime Minister and I was Chancellor of the Exchequer, we attended a meeting on the question of principle as regarded the salary of the Dean of York, and I am sorry to say on that occasion there was a considerable collection of Bishops, and we had the misfortune to be left in a minority. Upon the whole, it would be a mistake to consider this Commission as one, in the main, under ecclesiastical influences. I am bound to say, in my belief, the Commission, when its transactions come to be examined, would not come badly out of the inquiry. I mean, if you grant the principles upon which the Commission was founded; if you grant it is right that Corporations of this kind should exist to be the largest landowners in the country. It is, therefore, no discredit to the Commission at all if I admit that inquiry into the management of a Body of this kind by Par-nt is not only a thing perfectly al, and to be expected, but it is t the duty of the Legislature that inquiry should be made. It im- no discredit, no suspicion as towards who are charged with the practical gement of this Commission, and I believe, have applied themselves zeal and general efficiency to the action of the business which it has nd. I believe that in their capa- as landlords they have made great ts to improve their estates. In the ty of Durham, the Ecclesiastical missioners have expended in im- ements upon farms in the shape of lings, £120,000; and in the shape rainage, about £70,000. That is no nsiderable sum within the limits of gle county. That does not touch question which is the main subject y hon. Friend's Motion. If this e only a Motion for Inquiry into the agement of the Ecclesiastical Com- ioners, I should feel that inquiry one of so limited scope that it might within the power of independent bers of the House to conduct it to tisfactory conclusion; but it is ob- s, and my hon. Friend makes no et of it—in fact, he rather makes it main point of his Motion—this ob- is to raise the question whether the ing of land, to a large extent agri- ral, by a Body of this kind is an omical management of the public rces, and whether it is for the ad- age of the country the land should eld. Now, upon that subject, I say I agree entirely, in my personal conviction, with what been stated by my hon. Friend, the right hon. Gentleman who just sat down. I am adverse to method of holding land. The iastical Commissioners offer to us arge case; but my hon. Friend very knows that there are other cases h likewise cannot fail at some time aw seriously the attention of Par- nt. I do not speak now of the n Lands. In my opinion, the n Lands form a case by them- s; and it would not be perfectly ate, in my opinion, to speak of the n Lands as held under mortmain. e no opinion upon that subject at present time. It involves a multi- of considerations quite apart from raised by the present Motion. I am extremely glad my hon. Friend has raised this question alone; for, un- doubtedly, it has been matter sufficient to draw our attention to. But when I consider the question whether the ap- pointment of this Committee would be expedient at the present time—if it is to consider not merely the detail of the management of the Ecclesiastical Com- missioners, but the basis on which that institution stands, the question raised is one for the consideration of the Govern- ment, who are virtually asked to say whether they are in a condition at the present time to charge themselves, in the face of the House and the public, with the responsibility as well as the labour of conducting an inquiry into this kind of property. Well, I am bound to say that this is not the case. The unfortunate topic on which we were engaged last night, viewed in its largest aspect—namely, the incapacity of the House, under its present arrange- ments, to transact Business, and to meet the calls which naturally belong to its province—is a topic which returns upon us at every point. We have charged ourselves, in the face of the country, with obligations to endeavour to deal with certain subjects of great public interest; and now, when the Session is somewhat advanced, instead of being able to add to our obligations, we have to admit that our means of action seem month by month to diminish. Every- thing, so far as our view is concerned, must depend upon the efficiency, energy, and completeness of the arrangement which the House may make affecting its own procedure, and affecting its own method, in order to enable us to get at this question in a satisfactory manner. My hon. Friend will feel that it would not be creditable to give an engagement to undertake this subject, unless we were prepared with the means to re- deem that engagement. We cannot afford to make such an addition to the labours with which we are charged. We sympathize entirely with the pur- pose of my hon. Friend—at any rate, to this extent—without seeking to pledge Parliament beforehand, that we would ask Parliament to recognize that the subject of the holding of land in mort- main by the Ecclesiastical Commis- sioners was a proper and fit subject for searching investigation; but we cannot see that our powers enable us to carry forward an inquiry of the kind at the present time. There is a plan which seems to promise very large advantage. The money invested in best securities at moderate rates of interest would be a profitable investment, as compared with an investment in land held under unfavourable circumstances. Strong as the Ecclesiastical Commission is, when we compare its position with the perfectly deplorable position at this moment of the individual clergy who happen to be dependent upon the land for their income—although its position is strong in comparison with theirs, its position is weak in regard to the general management of its estates. A body of this kind has not that independence in the face of its tenants which a private landlord has; and I believe the reductions which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners have been obliged to make under pressure to their tenants have been larger than those which private landlords have had to give. Nor can I fail to agree with the advantage of bringing into the market a considerable portion of the surplus, which, instead of being held under the present limitations, might pass into the hands of private proprietors, and become naturally the subject for the exercise of the energy and application of the capital which they would apply to their private purposes. I am glad that this question has been raised by my hon. Friend. I regard with goodwill the operation that he has taken in hand. I wish we were in a position in which we could promise the House to become responsible for the institution of this important and searching inquiry; but I must not shut my eyes to facts, or to the question, how much can we redeem of the promises that we have already made? And I feel convinced that my hon. Friend will admit that there is force and justice in my plea when I say that, in these circumstances, we ought not to offer a new promise. Sir, I shall be very glad when the House is restored to some part of its natural freedom, and is able to put forth those energies—which, so far as the capacity of its Members is concerned, or the goodwill of its Members is concerned, I believe never were more abundant—to put forth those energies at a time when we could be said to have emerged from the difficulties in which we are engaged. I feel that the premature appointment of a Committee of this kind, unless it could be followed promptly to its natural conclusion, by carrying forward for a very important end the legislation for which it would probably lay, as, I think, sufficient and ample grounds, might, instead of advancing, retard the progress of the views which my hon. Friend wishes to propagate; and, therefore, I hope he will not be surprised, and will not think it implies any inadequate appreciation of the subject or any want of sympathy with the views that he is inclined to propose, if I say that I trust we shall not be called upon to give a vote at the present moment on the Motion that he has made; and that, at any rate, the Government would not be parties to the responsibility of entering into an engagement which they doubted their present capacity to redeem.

SIR JOHN MOWBRAY said, he wished to point out several inaccuracies in the speech of the hon. Member opposite (Mr. Arnold.) First, it was desirable to remember that the four last Bishoprics—namely, Manchester, Truro, Liverpool, and St. Albans—were without landed estates, so that the inquiry could not refer to them. The hon. Member said that the total land reached 250,000 acres, and his right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen) said it was time they began to sell. The House would be, perhaps, surprised to hear that during the existence of the Commission, taking sales on the one side and purchases on the other, no less than 416,117 acres, formerly the property of the Church, had been enfranchised, and were now in lay hands. The land now held by the Commission, in their own right and in possession, was not 250,000 acres, but 190,000. The hon. Member for Bedfordshire (Mr. J. Howard) quoted some figures about drainage. Why did he begin with drainage? He looked to the Report of the Commission for 1881, and he found in that year £47,000 spent on farm buildings, and the year before £52,000 on the same item. Was that a fair way of stating the case—to give the small item about drainage, and leave the larger items alone? Since the Commission was instituted up to the 31st of October last the Ecclesiastical Commissioners had spent a total on farm buildings and improvements of £1,032,715, and on drainage £242,995. As to the surveyor's charges, he did not deny that the figures were large. The object of the Ecclesiastical Commission had been to keep the expenses of their operations within the lowest possible limits, and to revise and reduce them from time to time as occasion arose. The scale of these expenses had been originally settled on what was then regarded as a moderate ratio in 1851. It was settled by Lord Chichester, who was universally recognized as having the greatest knowledge of estates' management, as he (Sir John Mowbray) could testify, having had the honour of being associated with him for eight years. The scale of charges was reduced in 1857, again in 1864, again in 1873, and again in 1881. The late Mr. E. J. Smith—and he could not mention the name of Mr. Smith without expressing his sense of the great services rendered to the Church and the Commission by that eminent man—stated to the Committee of the House in 1863 that the total costs of the change of system from beginning to end would scarcely exceed a single year's income from the gain thereby obtained. After the Report of the Select Committee in 1863, Her Majesty's Government called the attention of the Commissioners to that Report, and the Ecclesiastical Commission went fully into every question raised in it; and their statement, embodied in the Annual Report of the Commissioners, was laid before Parliament in 1864. Since that there had been no proposal in either House of Parliament for a change in the constitution or practice of the Board. In that very year Parliament gave the Ecclesiastical Commission additional power; and since then more than 100 Acts had been passed, affecting the Commission more or less, and giving new or altered functions to the Board, some handing over property, as at Rochdale and elsewhere; others, such as the Endowed Schools Acts and New Bishoprics Acts, giving them very considerable discretionary powers. Parliament had thus, over and over again during 18 years, exhibited the utmost confidence in the judicious management of the Commission. No doubt the Commission had committed many faults; but, on a review of their situation, he challenged the hon. Member to show that they had in any way abused the important trusts that had been committed to their charge, misapplied their revenues, or mismanaged their property. Were they, then, not entitled to the confidence which the country had reposed in them for so many years? What was the great object with which the Ecclesiastical Commissioners were appointed? It was that they might, by a judicious management of ecclesiastical property, increase the Church revenues, so as to enable them to relieve the spiritual destitution of the country. And what had been the result of the Commissioners' efforts in that direction? They had augmented the value of the livings in upwards of 4,700 out of the 15,000 parishes into which England and Wales were divided. Then, again, did the hon. Member know the difference between the estimate which was originally made of what the action of the Commissioners would produce and what had been actually realized? During the period the Commission had been in existence they had added a sum of £19,000,000 to the property of the Church, besides having elicited a further sum of £4,000,000 in the shape of contributions from private sources—thus making a total sum of £23,000,060, for which the Church was indebted to the exertions of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners during the past 40 years, representing an annual income of £690,000. Let the House contrast this with the state of things anticipated in 1836 or realized in 1863. In 1836, a Royal Commission reported that they anticipated that the property which would accrue to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners would leave about £134,000 a-year available for augmenting small livings. In 1863 his right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole) stated to a Select Committee that the amount already actually exceeded that sum, and reached £146,000; and he (Mr. Walpole) added his belief, if the Commissioners went on, they would ultimately be able to realize to the Commission for the purposes of the Church a further surplus income of £150,000—making a total of nearly £300,000. But in 1881 they had doubled that sum. They had added to the property of the Church and re-distributed funds to the extent of £690,000 a-year, and the work was still going on. They were advised by their very cautious and experienced actuary that for some years to come there was every prospect of their being able to do what they had done for many years past—namely, adding year by year an additional capital sum of £600,000, representing an annual income of £20,000 in perpetuity to the Church. Such a work as the Commissioners were now doing had not been accomplished since the Reformation; and the question was, should they be allowed to go on or not with that beneficial work? The great object of terminating the wasteful system by which Church property was divided between lessors and lessees was not yet entirely accomplished, and could not be so for many years. Some leases would expire in 1884, others granted on lives or for 40 years' terms had longer periods to run. The expenses, it was said, were great, but the work was arduous. There was every conceivable kind of holding and every conceivable sort of property, from Northumberland to the Land's End, and from Wales to Norfolk. They had manorial rights, with an endless variety of customs—foreshore rights, mineral rights; and fisheries. The Commissioners were owners of coals, lead, ironstone, agricultural land, building land, tithes, and woods. There were surveys to be made, titles to be investigated, rights to be asserted, rights to be defended, and liabilities of every kind to be discharged. The work, he maintained, was, upon the whole, well done; and until Parliament had decided the great question of the tenure of land by Corporations, let them not interfere by Committee and stop the great work which had been so long going on to the benefit of the Church and the nation.

MR. PUGH, who had an Amendment on the Paper to add—

“And also into the management of the Crown Lands in Wales, by the Department of Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues,” said, that, after what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister and from the hon. Member for Salford, he should not think of taking the sense of the House upon that Amendment on the present occasion; but he hoped to have an opportunity at another time of bringing the important question which it raised before the House. He thought there could not be any question as to the undesirability of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners continuing to administer estates. That administration was only carried on at a very great expense. He was exceedingly sorry to hear from the Prime Minister that he did not think the Government would be in a position at present to take up the question; but he felt sure that as soon as the Government were able to take it up it would give unqualified satisfaction not only to the people of the country generally, but also, he believed, to the Church itself.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD contended that the Commissioners must not be regarded as an entity like other Corporations. They were, in fact, stewards who had for their clients not only every Bishop in the Church, but a great number of the clergy also. There could not be better evidence of the good management of the Commissioners than had been given by the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Sir John Mowbray). Not only had they maintained the value of the property as it was intrusted to them, but they had increased it by exchanges and enfranchisements and good management. The Prime Minister had suggested that money payments would be more convenient than land as ecclesiastical endowments; but nothing was so fluctuating as money, and nothing so permanent as a representative of value as land.

MR. J. W. PEASE said, that, as he represented a county (Durham) in which the Commissioners had a great amount of property, he felt obliged to say that, so far as his observation went, the management of the Commissioners was in all respects excellent. The Commissioners had lost an able and devoted servant in Mr. E. J. Smith, whose death was severely felt throughout the whole county of Durham. He wished also to bear testimony to the political impartiality always manifested by the Commissioners. In his county Party feeling ran high; but the agents, solicitors, and other persons connected with the Commission did not allow themselves to be influenced in the slightest degree by political considerations. He admitted, however, that in small transactions the expenses were very high; he had seen cases where the law costs, in the case of the redemption of copyholds, &c., exceeded the whole value of the property. But the real question, as had been stated by his hon. Friend the Member for Salford and the Prime Minister, was the general policy of so much land being owned by Corporations in mortmain. He fully agreed with his hon. Friend on that subject, and hoped he would be able on a future occasion to bring the question in a riper and more general form for the consideration of the House.

MR. DODDS expressed his regret that the Commission had lost the valuable services of Mr. Edmund James Smith. Probably there were few men in the House who had had more to do with the Commission than he had, and he must say that in every department there was scarcely anything which he did not admire in the management of that Commission. But it appeared to him that the point of the Resolution of the hon. Member for Salford did not refer so much to the general management of the Commission, but to the management of their landed estates. The Motion really had reference to lands and other property vested in the Commissioners, and the work of the Commission in connection with real property, and when he told the House that the episcopal, caputular, and other estates in the county of Durham, now under the management of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, extended to upwards of 40,000 acres, with an increase amounting to over £109,000, the House would imagine that they were largely interested in this question. What he felt was that the management of these estates would be better left in the hands of individual owners than under the control of the Commissioners, because the former would be persons living in the county, and knowing the best means of utilizing their holding. He, however, hoped the present Motion would be withdrawn, and that on a future occasion it might be brought forward again in an amended and more advantageous form.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, while he believed the Commissioners had done their duty, he thoroughly concurred in what the Prime Minister had said, that no Corporation could properly do its duty to the land. The personal residence of the landowner, when that could be obtained, was of more value than any charitable pecuniary contribution. He fully concurred in the remarks of the Prime Minister, and of the right hon. Gentleman behind him (Mr. Goschen), as to the great importance of getting these landed properties out of mortmain.

MR. ARTHUR ARNOLD, in asking permission to withdraw his Motion, disclaimed any desire for the appointment of a Committee merely to inquire into the business and general management of the Ecclesiastical Commissioners, and expressed his gratification at the statements made by the Prime Minister and his right hon. Friend the Member for Ripon (Mr. Goschen).

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

HERRING BRAND COMMITTEE.

RESOLUTION.

MR. DUFF, in rising to call attention to the Report of the Herring Brand Committee, and to move—

“That, in the opinion of this House, effect should be given without delay to the recommendations of the Report of the Herring Brand Committee,” said, he would not enter into any controversial matter as to the merits or demerits of the herring brand practice, as to which there was a good deal to be said on both sides. He craved for the Committee's Report that it was based on the preponderance of evidence laid before them; and he could only say that if the majority of the fishcurers and fishermen wished to retain the brand, and were, at the same time, willing to pay for it, he was not aware that there was any valid reason why it should not be continued still. What he proposed to deal with was the recommendations of the Herring Brand Committee; and the chief of those recommendations was that the surplus brand money should be appropriated for purposes beneficial to the fishermen and the trade. He had to state to the House what he meant by the surplus brand fee. In the year 1854, an Act of Parliament was passed imposing a fee of 4d. per barrel for every barrel of herrings branded with a Government mark. At the time this Act was passed it was distinctly stated that this fee was for defraying the expenses incurred; but since the Act was passed the herring fisheries of Scotland had so largely extended that, besides paying the expenses, the brand had been a considerable source of revenue. The existence of the herring brand surplus had been often denied; but it was distinctly proved before the Committee that the surplus, allowing for the largest expenditure, amounted to £31,571, and the surplus paid into the Treasury for the year 1880 amounted to £6,502. It had long been contended that this surplus ought to be applied to some purpose beneficial to the fishery interest; and the first recommendation of the Herring Brand Committee was that it should be applied to works on the piers and harbours of Scotland. The necessity for increased harbour accommodation seemed to be universally admitted. It had been pressed on public attention by too many lamentable disasters—disasters causing an appalling loss of life among the fishermen, and misery to all those dependent on them. The disasters in the Shetland Islands last August, and on the Berwickshire Coast last October, must be fresh in the memory of hon. Members. In the year 1879, the loss along the North-East Coast of Scotland, of fishing and coasting vessels, bore the saddest testimony to the want of adequate harbour accommodation. He therefore thought this was a very appropriate purpose to which to apply the surplus brand fund. But if the question were looked at from a national point of view, he ventured to say that a far larger claim than that he was now making might be substantiated. The Imperial policy appeared to have been to get as much money as possible out of Scotland, and to spend it on harbours in the Southern parts of the Island. £1,250,000 had been thrown into the sea at Alderney. Sums of nearly equal amount had been spent on Holyhead, Portland, and other English harbours; while, in the meantime, Scotland had been put off with a grant of £3,000 a-year to the Fishery Board, and a few grants of comparatively trifling sums to harbours, not very happily designed, at Wick, Anstruther, and Dunbar. He thought that the propositions put forward for the allotment of those fees to the purpose of improving the Scotch harbours were very modest. He might say that they were distinguished by the extreme modesty which usually characterized Scotch applications to the Treasury. The case for aid to Scotch harbours was strengthened when it was remembered that there was not now, as formerly, any fund which they could draw upon for assistance. Many of the harbours along the North-East Coast—harbours which the trade and fisheries had entirely outgrown—were constructed at the close of the last and the commencement of the present century, by the great Scottish engineers, Rennie and Telford, out of money drawn from the Forfeited Estates Fund. Speaking as a loyal subject, and also as a landowner, he would not affect any regret that that particular source of revenue was not likely to be revived. He referred to the Forfeited Estates Fund merely because, since it had been exhausted, he knew of no public fund for harbour improvement which had taken its place. The Royal Commission of 1859 reported that certain specified sums should be given by the Treasury to different localities for constructing harbours, on the understanding that those localities provided a proportionate amount; but that amount was so large that it was never forthcoming, and consequently the recommendations of the Report were never carried out.

Notice taken, that 40 Members were not present; House counted, and 40 Members being found present,

MR. DUFF, resuming, said, that when he was interrupted he was referring to past legislation with regard to the harbours. From various causes the Act of 1861 had become almost inoperative, and, therefore, there was additional reason for granting aid from other sources. He wished, at the same time, to express a very decided opinion that the best means Government could adopt for assisting harbours was to lend money at the lowest possible rate of interest to supplement local efforts. Such a policy, in his humble opinion, would be attended with far better results than spending a large sum of money on any particular harbour. If the Scottish Members would concentrate their energies in inducing the Government to restore in its integrity the Act of 1861—which would be of general benefit—they would be doing far more good than by pressing the claims of any particular place for special assistance. With regard to the next recommendation of the Committee, that of extending the functions of the Fishery Board, he might say that there seemed a strong desire expressed by the Scotch Members, and by the public in Scotland who were interested in this subject, that the functions of the Fishery Board should be extended; and he had reason to believe that the recommendations of the Report in that respect had the approval of the Government. In connection with the duties he should like to see the Board undertaking, there was one he particularly wished to mention. He referred to the protection and the jurisdiction respecting mussel-beds. To those not acquainted with the practice of their Northern fishermen, this might seem a small subject; but it was really one of very considerable importance to the fishermen; and perhaps the House would realize this when he mentioned that it was calculated that in the district he represented each individual fisherman required in the course of the year two tons of mussels for bait. Now, he thought that one of the duties of the Board should be to encourage and protect artificial mussel-beds. Then the law respecting the right to mussel-beds was somewhat obscure, and gave rise to many disputes. The Government, he thought, should deal with the rights of mussel proprietors in the same way as they did with salmon proprietors. That was to say, where the proprietor of the land could show no Charter to the right of mussels the Crown should enforce their rights, take possession of the beds, and let them out to the fishermen. That was done in the case of coast salmon fishings, as he knew from personal experience. He succeeded to a property where the proprietors had always fished the sea for salmon; but when he was called upon to give a Charter he found he had none to produce, and the Crown seized his salmon fishings, and added insult to injury by proposing to let them to him at an exorbitant rent. He mentioned this control over mussels as one of the duties a Board with more extended powers might usefully perform. One other subject to which he should like to refer was the subject of telegraphs. The Report of the Committee recommended that facilities should be given, especially on the West Coast of Scotland, for extending telegraphic communication to all the important fishing stations. Applications from his hon. Friends the Members for Inverness and Argyllshire were now before the Postmaster General with reference to this subject, and he trusted they would receive the most favourable consideration, because it was very important that the fishery stations should have telegraphic facilities. The recommendation that an enlarged Fishery Board might deal with scientific questions regarding the artificial propagation of fish, which had been so usefully followed in America, was well worthy of consideration. He regretted that the hon. Member for the County of Waterford (Mr. Blake), who served on the Committee, was not in the House, because he had visited the United States, and his information on this point was most valuable. There was no industry that he was acquainted with—certainly no industry in the North of Scotland—which had grown with such rapidity as the fishery. No other industry that he knew of was capable of such extension, for the resources of the sea appeared to be inexhaustible. In many counties in Scotland the value of the herrings taken at the different stations exceeded the annual amount of the rental of those counties. In the Fishery Board Returns the value of herrings alone in 1880 was given as upwards of £1,800,000, and it was stated that their value in that year exceeded by 73 per cent the average value for the last 10 years. He, therefore, saw no limit to the increase of the herring fishings, provided that there was given proper assistance. He thought this industry was one which was well worth the attention and the encouragement of Her Majesty's Government. He was very glad to see that when the Civil Service Estimates were produced the Government had given an additional grant of £3,000 to the Scotch Fishery Board. He understood it was given in consequence of the Report of the Committee. If that was the case, he had to thank Her Majesty's Government for so far carrying out the recommendation of the Report, as the amount given was, he admitted, a fair average of the surplus of the brand fee. He trusted that, if the brand fee went on increasing, as he believed it would, the Government would give the increased surplus back for some object beneficial to the fisheries, and that in other respects they would see their way to carry out the recommendations of the Report, which, if adopted, would, he believed, aid and encourage the development of a very important, but hitherto too much neglected national industry.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR, in seconding and cordially supporting the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Banff (Mr. Duff), gave it as his opinion that no greater good could be done by the Government than by taking up the question of how to construct successfully harbours in Scotland. The Government were still engaged in assisting harbours in other parts of the country. For example, they had recently given £15,000 to Ardglass Harbour, on the East Coast of Ireland, and were about to give a like sum to Arklow, within a few miles on the same coast; and to lend, in addition, the large sum of £20,000. If the Government continued to give these grants of money, he thought it was their duty to ascertain whether or not the designs of these works were of such a nature as to fulfil their purpose. If an inquiry were made to see what mistakes had been made in the past, in unsuccessful attempts to construct sea-coast harbours, in order to ascertain what should be avoided in future, he believed the coasts would soon be covered with harbours. It was a curious fact that there was no money so difficult to obtain by loan from capitalists as that with regard to the building of harbours; yet he believed there was no public work which could be successfully undertaken that would pay the country better than harbours would. There was a small harbour in his own county (Kincardineshire), and he believed if it were enlarged and improved the value of the fish caught there would more than equal the whole of the land rental in the country, which was about £180,000. He cordially joined in the recommendation of his hon. Friend, that the formation and constitution of the Fishery Board should not only be improved, but its duties extended, so as to have a jurisdiction over all kinds of fishing, and over all harbours aided by Government funds. In France, Germany, and Norway they had statistics of the whole fish caught along their several shores; but in England, the great statistical country, which prided itself on its statistics with regard to its trade and commerce, they were entirely ignorant—except as to the herring—with regard to the other portion of the great industry of fishing. Yet, in a Report on the Fisheries, made about 16 years ago, by well-qualified Commissioners, of whom Mr. Caird, Dr. Huxley, and the present Chief Commissioner of Works were Members. it was fully shown that no portion of the land could supply wealth so easily as that which the sea could. If the fisheries were properly developed by means of safe harbours, to which boats could run in safety after being exposed to a four hours' gale, it would be found that an acre of sea ground on certain banks of the coast would greatly surpass in value the produce of similar extent in land. Then, with regard to the objection to applying the brand to Scotch herring barrels, on the plea that Irish barrels did not need to be branded, it must be stated that the herrings taken on the Coast of Ireland were not so suitable for export as those taken on the Scotch Coast, and the Inspector of Irish Fisheries had reported that the branding system was not well adapted for Ireland. Then, with regard to a further development of good fishing grounds, the Government might aid by surveying vessels, because there were banks on the Coast of England where fish abounded, which were partly defined; but in Scotland they were deficient of information of that kind, which would be of great benefit to the fishermen. There were many banks lying off the North-East Coast of Scotland full of fish, but their boundaries and positions were still only known to a few fishermen. The kind of fish, and the food for fish there existing, should be inquired into by the Government. In every other branch of industry millions were spent by the State to collect information; but no such assistance was given to collect information about our great fish industry. As to the herring brand fees, the Government had made a good beginning by giving a grant of £3,000; but he claimed that the whole surplus fees collected on account of the herring brand should be given to the Coast of Scotland. The inhabitants along the Scotch Coast gave a certain sum of money for a particular trade, and that money should not be spent over the whole United Kingdom, but should be used for the benefit of the Scotch people themselves. If they could improve their harbours and extend their fisheries as they had been doing within the last few years, instead of £3,000 they ought soon to have a surplus of 8,000. But the first and foremost consideration now was how to construct sea-coast harbours with success; and this the Government could alone ascertain by instituting an inquiry into the many past failures in harbour works, which had entailed the loss of millions of money.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, effect should be given without delay to the recommendations of the Report of the Herring Brand Committee,"

—(Mr. Duff),

SIR ALEXANDER GORDON approved the remarks which the hon. Members had made in regard to the necessity of improved harbour accommodation. He quoted a Return which he obtained a short time ago from the Board of Trade, showing that during five years, between the Pentland Forth and Fifeness, no fewer than 367 vessels had been lost. On one night, the 18th of August, 1848, 124 boats were wrecked, and no less than 100 lives were lost. He did not quite know, however, what it was that the hon. Member for Banffshire (Mr. Duff) recommended the Government to do, he was so very vague. With regard to the brand fees collected on the Coast of Scotland, he thought it right that these should be applied in the districts where they were collected. Last year there were no fewer than 2,173 herring boats fishing from three ports in this country and employing 21,430 persons, compared with 245 boats employing 2,485 persons engaged at Banff, Buckie, and Findhorn. He maintained that the Government in spending this fee money should spend it in the districts where it had been raised; because if that was not done the money raised by the herring fishermen would be spent for the benefit of the cod and ling fishers, who gave nothing at all to the Government. Therefore, he thought that the application of the money generally all over the coast would benefit those fishermen who did not raise the fee, and he hoped the Government would bear that in mind in distributing the money. The Government were not able to distribute the excess of the fees. By the Act of Parliament they were bound to pay them into the Exchequer. They could not give money, except what was actually wanted for the expense of the branding; therefore, it was entirely delusive to talk about returning. The Government might give a grant of money from the Exchequer as they had done now; but he should like to ask the Lord Advocate how the £3,000 was to be spent—whether it was to be on the same footing as the statutory £3,000 which the Board had every year to spend, or whether it was to be spent according to the will of parties who might apply for it? He hoped it would be placed as the statutory £3,000, which required that the party receiving the money should provide themselves a certain proportion of the amount that was spent. He wished also to remind Her Majesty's Government that, with reference to the proposed alteration of the Fishery Board which had been suggested, that the Fishery Board had been appointed solely for the benefit of the trade of the herring fishery; and all their correspondence, and all their duties, were connected with the mercantile men in commercial matters. But it had been proposed by the deputation which the hon. Gentleman referred to that the duty of protecting the rod fishing in the rivers inland should be placed upon the Fishery Board. As now constituted the Fishery Board had nothing to do with salmon. Therefore he must protest against any interference with the very important interest now confided to them, unless they were prepared to create a separate or additional Board to carry out the new duties. They need not foster the cod and ling and other fishing, because they did not require it. The best plan would be to reduce the brand to one-half. It was now 4*d.* per barrel and 2*d.* the half barrel. A short Act of Parliament amending the present Act would relieve the curers of the payment of one-half of the fee, and that he believed would be accepted by them. Irish fishermen, finding they could not cure herrings in Ireland, came over last year, and no fewer than 49 boats came to the harbour of Aberdeen, and did better than our own people. If any alteration was to be made in the Fishery Board, which he thought very likely possible, he hoped it would be done after public inquiry, and not in consequence of the deputation to which the hon. Member had referred. Half the Members of the deputation did not know what they went there for. He himself did not know until they got into the room. He protested against that being taken as an expression of the opinion of the people of Scotland as to any change in the Board. He could not help fearing that if they joined the two duties they must have a joint Board. Inland proprietors must be represented on the Board as well as the great coast trade in herrings, and they would then have two separate interests, and a great deal of unpleasant work would go on in the endeavour of one party to get money for the benefit of inland as against deep-sea fishing. He maintained that the herring fishery trade was far more important than anything else; and he certainly hoped the Government would not interfere with that trade without public inquiry.

MR. MARJORIBANKS said, that the necessity for further harbour accommodation had been brought home to him in a most terrible and a very close manner. On the 14th of October, between the Tweed and North Berwick, no fewer than 200 fishermen lost their lives in a single morning. That disaster would have been vastly increased had it not fortunately happened that the Dunbar boats had reached the harbour before the storm came on, and the Berwick boats had not gone to sea at all. In Berwickshire, out of a total of 500 fishermen, 175 were drowned; and there were 129 out of one village. It was difficult to convey any idea of the distress and misery which he witnessed in that village. If a similar disaster had happened on a railway, or from any other cause, there would have been Commissioners sent down to make inquiry, and all sorts of suggestions would have been made; but in this case no suggestion of any kind had been made by anyone of responsibility. He had no hesitation in saying that this disaster took place simply, solely, and entirely because there was no harbour to which the boats could run. The boats that did escape were boats that put to sea, and were out 56 hours, finally putting into the Tyne. It would be of considerable advantage to the fishermen of Scotland if the functions of the Board in Edinburgh were extended, to take notice of everything connected with the coast and deep-sea fisheries. He was very grateful for the additional £3,000 that had been granted. He did not mean to say that their fishery harbours should be constructed by grants from Government; but grants were useful and acceptable in aid now and again. They must look to local exertions. What they expected was that great facilities should be given by the Public Works Loan Commissioners for an object so desirable as the construction of a fishery harbour. As far as the North-East Coast of England and Scotland was concerned, he did not think that very much had been done, in consequence of the Act of 1861, on behalf of the fishery harbours. Between the Humber and Cape Wrath, to 11 harbours having incomes of over £2,000 a-year, £1,377,000 had been advanced. These were almost wholly commercial harbours. On the same portion of the coast to five, out of over 40 harbours with incomes under £2,000 a-year, and dependent mainly or entirely on the fishing industry, only £19,200 had been advanced. He thought the Fishery Board in Scotland should take care of the harbours. They would help them very much in this matter, because they would be able to give information as to the points most advantageous where harbours could be placed. He was not at all disposed to have harbours stuck here, there, and everywhere. He believed the little tidal harbours were simply man-traps and delusions that lured men to their death. They created a small colony of fishermen, and when a storm came on the men hailing from them rushed to these places, often to meet their death.

MR. LYON PLAYFAIR said, as he had the honour of being Chairman of a Royal Commission for the Fisheries of the Northern Coast, he would not like the discussion to end until he had said a few words upon the subject. He did not agree with his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir Alexander Gordon), who desired to limit the Board of Fisheries to the care of herrings. He was, like the hon. and gallant Gentleman, a Commissioner of that Board; but he thought, instead of limiting its action to the herring fishing, that its functions ought to be extended so as to promote all the fisheries, and the interests of the fishermen engaged in those fishing stations. Nor could he understand why he would restrict all the £3,000, which represented the money derived from the brand, to the interests of the herring fishing. They could not divide a harbour. A harbour might be as useful for cod or ling fishing as for herring fishing. The wider they could make the Board, and the less restrictions they put upon it, the better. The hon. and gallant Member did not desire to give special encouragement to cod and ling fisheries, and yet such aid would in reality best promote the growth of herrings. Let him give one curious illustration, which showed how closely all the fishings were related. Parliament interfered a great deal too much in its legislation with regard to fisheries. One of the restrictions in an Act now repealed was to enforce a close time for the herring fishing during a certain number of weeks or months, in which the herrings might be allowed to breed. Now, what was the effect of that legislation? Its effect was mainly to destroy the herring fisheries, and the reason was this. Man was the least enemy of the herring. His catch was perhaps not more than a few per cent as compared with the destruction which was caused by other enemies of the fish of the sea. The close time in the herring fishing gave an unexpected protection to cod and ling. At certain times cod and ling could only be caught with herring bait, so that the close time for herring meant a close time for cod and ling as well. What was the consequence? They did not know how many cod and ling there were in the sea; but they knew how many cod and ling were salted. Now, in the Commission on which he sat, he had the honour of Professor Huxley as one of his Colleagues. They frequently dissected cod, and they had found in their stomachs no fewer than 14 undigested herrings; but giving only six herrings a day to the cod and ling which were caught and salted, they would, had they remained in the sea, have devoured more herrings than all the fishermen in the United Kingdom, although 600 were added to their number. Therefore, the interference of the Legislature for the protection of the herrings was merely a law for an enormous destruction of the herrings. He quite agreed with the Report in saying that they should do nothing except to allow Nature to go unrestricted in her ways. There were balances of Nature with which, when they began to interfere, they interfered wrongly. He thought it important to broaden the duties of the Fishery Board under its re-organization, owing to the resignation of that efficient officer, Mr. Primrose. It would be very difficult to find a Secretary of equal ability and devotion to the service; but they might arrange the duties of the Board in a different way. He was speaking entirely independent of the Government, and as the case presented itself to his mind. He did think that a Board of Fisheries, which was to extend its influence and take in all the sea fisheries of the Kingdom, ought to have very efficient officers, and an efficient Inspector, so as to enable them to make those scientific observations, and give that scientific aid, which had produced important results in foreign countries. It was often said the herring was a most capricious fish. For a certain number of years it came to one part of the coast, and then deserted it. There was no caprice in that. They ought to know the meteorology of the sea, the effect of temperature of the ocean, and of the food presented to the herring under different conditions; and if they had scientific officers who could make these observations, which they were accustomed to make in America with so much advantage, he thought they could understand much more what was going on, and enable fishermen to take more advantage by the knowledge thus derived. It was for that reason he was anxious to see, in any re-organization of the Board now under the consideration of the Government, that while their functions ought to be broadened, so as to promote the building of harbours, they should understand also that part of the money should be devoted to proper efficient officers, who would be enabled to superintend fisheries with a knowledge of science; and, with such a re-organization and such officials, he believed they would find that the great value of the fisheries now going on in Scotland and the Irish Coast would be very largely improved by the application of knowledge to this subject.

THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. J. B. BALFOUR) said, he thought he might say, on the part of the Government, that they were by no means unmindful of the importance of the recommendations in relation to the Board contained in this Report. In regard to the first part, he might state that in the month of December, when the Estimates were being prepared, the Fishery Board were requested by the Treasury to forward to them a statement setting forth the receipts and expenditure connected with the branding; and, in the statement forwarded, the amount of the receipts for the year 1881 was given at £8,236, while the expenses were given at £5,419, leaving a surplus for the year of £2,817. The Treasury had resolved to make a grant of the surplus, and they had not limited themselves to that precise amount, but had given the nearest round sum above it by introducing into the Estimates for the current year a sum of £3,000 for harbour purposes, in addition to the sum ordinarily granted for that object; so that his hon. Friend would see that in putting in this additional sum they were giving rather more than the aggregate gain on that head. He hoped that would be satisfactory to his hon. Friend. A question had been put as to the manner in which it was proposed that that money should be expended. The intention in that matter was, that it should be expended under the direction and at the sight of the Fishery Board, a proposal which, he believed, would also meet with general acceptance. Something had likewise been said with regard to the application of any profit resulting from brand fees to telegrams; and while he quite agreed with what had been said by one of his hon. Friends as to the impossibility of dividing the money applicable to harbours between white and herring fishing, where both kinds of fishing were practised from the same harbour, it would seem just that in the other matter—that was in regard to the telegrams—where there was room for distinction, any money resulting from brand fees should be applied to the part of the coast from which the brand fees were gathered—that was to say, to the East and North-East Coasts, because it was there alone, and not on the West Coast, that the branding system prevailed. He was happy to say that even that appropriation, which would probably commend itself to the sense of fairness of the House, would comprehend the Islands of Orkney and Shetland, where there was great need for additional telegraphic facilities as an aid and assistance to the herring fishing. The next point which had been referred to was the re-organization of the Fishery Board. That matter also was under the careful consideration of Her Majesty's Government; but it was not a matter as to which a resolution could be arrived at immediately, because—

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—TREATMENT OF PERSONS ARRESTED UNDER THE ACT.

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the Prisons Board have received and considered complaints made by Messrs. Finn and McGrath, at present in Dundalk Gaol, with reference to punishments inflicted upon them for breaches of prison regulations; whether these punishments were in the one case the stoppage of all correspondence for three days, and in the other a sentence to punishment diet for three days; and, whether the Prisons Board have taken any action in the matter?

MR. W. E. FORSTER said, that Messrs. Finn and M'Grath, at present in Dundalk Gaol, were punished because during Divine Service, at the prayer for the Queen, they rose to leave the chapel, and refused to obey the order to keep their places. They were not compelled to attend Service. The Prisons Board approved the infliction of the punishment, and he saw no reason to dissent from the Board.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—GUN LICENCES.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. Charles Burke, of Ballinamore, county Galway, has been refused a gun licence by Mr.

Paul, R.M., although the local magistrate and police constable were favourable to his application; whether the grounds of refusal were that he had not a letter of recommendation from his landlord or land agent; and, whether it is a fact that Mr. Burke, under previous Acts, had always been granted a licence?

MR. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, with regard to this matter, the officer for granting licences to carry arms in this district, in the exercise of discretion vested in him by law, had refused the application made to him by Mr. Burke. He understood that Mr. Burke had a licence under the recent Act; but the local constabulary objected to his having the licence now.

POST OFFICE (IRELAND)—BELFAST POST OFFICE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Postmaster General, If he is aware of the existence of a local rule in the Telegraph Department of Belfast Post Office, that clerks joining that office since 1878 are only granted an annual leave of two weeks although performing night and Sunday duties; clerks appointed before 1878 performing same duties being accorded three weeks' annual leave; is this rule enforced in any other large office, and is it with his sanction; and, if not, will he take steps to compensate those against whom this rule has operated?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that at Belfast there is no local rule in restriction of the authorized period of annual leave. In 1879 it was discovered that in this matter of leave the Telegraph Department at Belfast was being treated exceptionally—that it was enjoying privileges which were not conceded elsewhere in the United Kingdom at offices similarly circumstanced; and it was then decided that, if only with a view to uniformity, these privileges could not be extended to new entrants. From those who were then enjoying them, however, they were not taken away.

EVICCTIONS (IRELAND)—CARNACUN, COUNTY MAYO.

MR. O'CONNOR POWER asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been called to the circumstances attending the eviction of three families, lately carried out on the property of Mr. C. Crotty, in the parish of Carnacun, county Mayo; whether it is true that the relieving officer of the Union of Castlebar, whose duty it was to be present, was not in attendance at the eviction; and, if so, who is responsible for his non-attendance; whether it is true that outdoor relief has been refused to these families; whether it is a fact that they have been evicted for the non-payment of an admittedly exorbitant rent, and that Mr. Crotty, on other tenants of his serving notices to have fair rents fixed by the Land Commission, agreed to a reduction of more than one-third of the former rental; and, whether it is not true that the district in which this property is situate is free from outrage and disturbance?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had inquired into this case. The relieving officer was not present at the evictions; relief had been offered either in the workhouse or by outdoor relief. In another case the relieving officer was informed that the tenant had settled with his landlord. The tenants had been evicted for non-payment of rents due for two years and a-half and three years. He was informed that the landlord had given a reduction. This place was not free from outrage and disturbance. Attempts had been made upon Mr. Crotty's life, and he was now under police protection.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—DEATH OF A WOMAN THROUGH REFUSAL TO VISIT HER SON IN PRISON.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If his attention has been drawn to a notice in the "Freeman's Journal" of 28th March, of the death of a woman at Ballinglera, Donegal, whose death was attributed to anxiety about the imprisonment of her two sons, who were imprisoned on the charge of obstructing the sheriff in the work of eviction; and, whether the Lord Lieutenant refused to mitigate the punishment by a few days, to allow the dying woman to see her sons before her death?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the name of the woman was Julia M'Donogh, and she had sent a memorial asking that she might see her son, who was a prisoner in Sligo Gaol. A telegram was at once sent to the Sub-Inspector of police, asking whether her statement was correct, and a reply was sent back to the effect that the woman was dead. M'Donogh was, with 23 others, convicted before Baron Fitzgerald of riot, and sentenced to four months' imprisonment with hard labour, at the expiration of which sentence he was to give security for his good behaviour. He wished to point out that he was not a prisoner under the Protection Act.

CHARGE AGAINST CONSTABLE
MOLLOY.

Mr. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the inquiry into the charges brought against Constable Molloy, of Fahy Police Station, has yet concluded; and, if so, with what result?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, the inquiry had concluded. It was conducted by officers and others wholly unconnected with any previous inquiry, and the result of the investigation was the acquittal of the accused.

STATE OF IRELAND — ALLEGED AS-SAULT ON MR. BOYLAN.

Mr. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the inquiry instituted by the Commissioners of National Education into the alleged assault on Mr. Boylan, National School teacher, by Captain L'Estrange, R.M. has yet concluded; and, if so, with what result?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, that the inquiry in this case had also concluded. The Commissioners thought it necessary to point out that their rules and regulations required the manager of a school to receive visitors courteously. Those who had not done so were admonished severely. The Commissioners, at the same time, were of opinion that Captain L'Estrange had acted hastily.

Mr. REDMOND asked whether they were to understand that the Chief Secretary for Ireland would reprove Captain L'Estrange as the others had been reproved?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER said, he did not think there was any necessity for doing so; but he thought Captain L'Estrange had acted hastily.

Mr. W. E. Forster

1881—ARMS FOR SELF-DEFENCE.

Mr. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the speech of Major Traill, R.M., as reported in the "Ballenrobe Chronicle," in which that gentleman is reported to have said—

"I myself have supplied him with revolver and ammunition, and I have taught him how to use them, as I am prepared to do for any one in my district, under similar circumstances, and I now tell him and them that every honest action of his for his own safety is an action of self-defence, for which 27 and 28 Vic. c. 47, s. 7, says, 'No punishment or forfeiture shall be incurred by any person who shall kill another by misfortune or in his own defence, or in any other manner without felony;'" and, whether he proposes to draw the attention of the Lord Chancellor of Ireland to the use of such language from the Bench?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, I believe Major Traill did take the course mentioned, and I entirely approve of his having done so. I believe that something may be done to stop the outrages which are now so constant and so deplorable if men are encouraged to defend themselves and their families. I believe so from what has happened in other countries, and also from the conviction that the men who attempt these outrages are as cowardly as they are bloodthirsty.

Mr. HEALY asked whether, in these circumstances, the right hon. Gentlemen would consider the advisability of more generally granting licences to carry arms?

Mr. W. E. FORSTER: Sir, before licences are granted we must have some security that those to whom we grant licences will not use the arms for the purpose of breaking law and order. No refusal has been given to any man who wanted arms when it was reasonable to suppose that he wanted to keep them for his own defence. There are some persons to whom it would be unsafe to give arms, because they have not the courage to keep them from the men who go about at night and break into houses in order to get arms. But whenever men have shown courage they have succeeded in keeping their arms. I think Major Traill was perfectly justified in the course he took, and I hope other magistrates will follow his example.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS. JOHN REA, D. HAYES O'CONNOR, EDMOND SYNAN, J. R. MURPHY, PATRICK O'BRIEN, AND JOHN R. O'GORMAN.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that John Rea, D. Hayes O'Connor, Edmond Synan, J. R. Murphy, Patrick O'Brien, and John R. O'Gorman, all of Charleville, in county Cork, have been imprisoned, under the Coercion Act, in Naas Gaol, since the 21st October last, and, during this period of over five months, have not received any intimation as to the reconsideration of their cases by the Lord Lieutenant; whether it is true that the Charleville district is, and has been, since and before the imprisonment of the persons named, entirely free from outrage; and, whether, in accordance with the principle adopted by him, he will now consider the propriety of releasing the men arrested in the Charleville district? The hon. Member said, he understood that since he had given Notice of this Question three of them had been released; but he wished to know whether the Chief Secretary for Ireland would adopt a similar course with reference to the others?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, he had looked carefully into these cases when he was in Ireland last. As the hon. Member was aware, two of these men had been released, and John Rea had been released on parole for a week. With reference to the other three, it was unusual to release prisoners unless a Petition in favour of doing so was presented. The state of the district showed signs of improvement; but they had still to keep an extra force of police there, and there was no immediate prospect of their withdrawal.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARREST OF EMPLOYEES OF "UNITED IRELAND."

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that all the clerks employed in the commercial department of "United Ireland" have been released with the exception of Mr. Shelley; and, whether there is any exceptional reason for this gentleman's continued detention?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it was a fact that all the clerks in the commercial department of United Ireland had been released with the exception of Mr. Shelley. His case was different from those of the others, and the Government did not consider he could be released with safety at present. He was recently transferred from Armagh to Kilmainham at the request of his relations.

STATE OF IRELAND — PROHIBITED PUBLIC MEETING AT LIMERICK.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is the fact that a proposed public meeting of the citizens of Limerick, to protest against the introduction of the Clôture system into the House of Commons, was prevented by the local magistrates; whether the troops in garrison were kept under arms, in order that they might be ready to disperse the meeting if any attempt should be made to hold it; whether he has seen the Resolutions which were to have been proposed at the meeting, and which have been published in most of the London papers, or is aware that they were Resolutions in condemnation of the Government's Clôture proposal, and of any Irish Member who should support or refrain from opposing it; and, whether, under the circumstances, the action of the magistrates has the approval of Her Majesty's Government?

MR. REDMOND asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether, within the present week and up to the present date, the Irish Executive have caused the police to tear down placards calling upon the electors to instruct their representatives to vote in opposition to the Clôture; whether the police have seized and confiscated parcels of such placards in different parts of the Country, and have arrested men engaged in distributing or posting them; whether the police and military forces of the Crown in Ireland have been called into requisition for the purpose of preventing electors in different constituencies from assembling constitutionally in public meeting for the purpose of expressing to their representatives in Parliament their view on the question of the Clôture ; and, upon what principle of constitutional Government the Irish Executive justify such abolition of the constitutional rights of electors and constituencies in Ireland ?

MR. W. E. FORSTER, in reply, said, it was a fact that the Mayor and magistrates of Limerick, acting on the responsibility which devolved on them for the maintenance of peace and order in the city, did prevent the meeting referred to, and the Government fully approved of their action, which was attended with good results. With reference to the Question of the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond) he denied that the Irish Executive gave any instructions to the police as to these placards. In all cases the local police acted on their own responsibility. The placards, which were of a violent and inflammatory character, were calculated to lead to a breach of the peace—[MR. REDMOND: No!]—were, no doubt, intended to intimidate hon. Members of that House from the performance of their duty. In several parts of the country these placards were taken down by the police, and in some instances bundles of them were seized, and the parties in whose possession they were found taken before the magistrates, who discharged them with a caution. The magistrates did not appear to have acted elsewhere as they did in Limerick ; but, undoubtedly, if there was the same probability of a breach of the peace occurring they would be justified in acting as the Limerick magistrates did.

ARMY—AUXILIARY FORCES—MILITIA UNIFORMS.

COLONEL RUGGLES-BRISE asked the Secretary of State for War, in reference to the order to Militia officers to change their lace, facings, and accoutrements, Whether he is aware that a statement made by him has been interpreted by Militia officers generally (not Rifle Regiments) to mean that they have the right for many years to come to appear at a levee, or on parade, with a gold lace sash and a silver lace waistbelt, or with a helmet with silver plate, and gold lace on the tunic, or at mess with gold lace on jacket, and silver lace on waistcoat ; and, if the above is not the correct interpretation of the statement, whether he will further consider the great expense that is entailed upon Militia officers (not Rifle Regiments) by these changes, and make a proportionate allowance to meet those expenses similar to that which is proposed for Rifle Regiments ?

SIR HERVEY BRUCE asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he will re-consider the amount proposed to be given to Militia officers obliged to purchase new uniforms owing to a change in their Regiments, as £25 will be wholly inadequate for the purpose ?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, perhaps the hon. Baronet the Member for Coleraine will allow me to answer his Question at the same time as that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman. In doing so I must be permitted to remind the House that since 1857 there have been no less than 15 occasions on which Militia regiments have been ordered to alter their uniforms to and from Rifle, Artillery, Highland, red, and Fusilier dress, and that in no case was any allowance made to officers. In the same way the Yeomanry were ordered in 1877 to alter their lace from gold to silver, and no allowance was made to them, time only being given to make the change. I must express my regret that at the present time, when the change from silver to gold has been urgently pressed upon us by the general wish of Militia officers, and when for the first time we are making an allowance of £25 to each officer in every case of compulsory change of the more expensive character, these claims for money should be set up. In June last the clearest instructions were given as to the change from silver to gold, and officers were allowed full time to make it. Of course, nobody anticipated that they would think of wearing a mongrel uniform ; and I, therefore, can only reply to the hon. and gallant Member for Essex that the change must be complete, and may be deferred as long as the officer wishes before it becomes necessary to replace the uniform he possesses. To the hon. Baronet I can only say that, compared with the 15 cases I have spoken of, the grant of £25 a-head is liberal, and I have no intention to increase it.

CRIMINAL LAW (IRELAND)—THE LATE RIOT AT KILROSS—SENTENCES UPON THE PRISONERS.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, Whether the prisoners convicted of riot at Kilross, at the last Winter Assizes in Kilkenny, and sentenced to four months imprisonment and a fine of £10, or, in default of such payment, two months additional imprisonment, will, if unable to pay this fine, have to commence the additional term of imprisonment, as if it were an entirely different sentence, for a different offence; whether, in fact, they will have to sleep for another month on the plank bed; whether, in the opinion of the Law advisers of the Crown, the sentence passed on these prisoners ought to be treated as one sentence, and not as two consecutive sentences; and, whether several of these prisoners are quite unable to pay this fine; and if, under the circumstances, the Government would consider the propriety of remitting it?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) said, in the absence of his right hon. and learned Colleague, that these prisoners would not have to commence an additional term of imprisonment, and, therefore, would not have to sleep another month on plank beds. If they did not pay the fine, there was no reason for interfering with the sentence of the Judge.

ATTEMPT UPON THE LIFE OF HER MAJESTY—THE PRISONER M'LEAN.

Mr. HEALY asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he is aware that the person who recently fired at the Queen has been persistently described in the "Scotsman" and the "Glasgow Mail" as an Irishman, and is called "Patrick M'Lean;" and, if he can state what is the correct name and nationality of the accused?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I do not know whether the hon. Member observed that on the night when I first stated to the House the fact of the outrage attempted on the Queen I was very careful to state the name and place of birth of the prisoner, for the express purpose of preventing any misapprehension or prejudice on this subject. I can give no other information than I gave then on the subject—namely, that the man's name, as far as I know, is Roderick M'Lean, and that he was born in London. As far as I know, there is no reason at all for supposing that he is of Irish extraction. I have a letter from the editor of The Scotsman in reference to the hon. Member's Question. He states that the first day after the news arrived some remarks appeared in that paper, indicating that the prisoner was of Irish parentage; but they were careful to contradict this the next day, and to put the matter straight; and that, consequently, they are not liable to the charge of having persistently represented that the prisoner is an Irishman.

MR. CALLAN: I should like to know from the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether a similar contradiction has been given by the proprietor or responsible owner of The North British Mail, which published the following in double-leaded type:—

"Attempt to assassinate the Queen—The prisoner an Irishman—The would-be Assassin sane and sober?"

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: I really cannot state anything on that subject, for I have no knowledge of it.

POST OFFICE—THE PARCEL POST.

MR. O'SULLIVAN asked the Postmaster General, Whether he intends adding to the present monthly payments made to mail cart contractors and other carriers, or otherwise compensating them, for the additional labour which will be entailed on them by the new parcel post arrangement, as well as interfering directly with them in their business as carriers of parcels?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that the sum which is paid for mail cart services is arrived at either by agreement or by public competition. When a parcel post is introduced the terms of existing contracts may, in many instances, have to be revised. With regard to the latter part of the hon. Member's Question, I may repeat what was stated the other day—that as the Post Office, in establishing a parcel post, would not ask for any monopoly, or for any new exclusive powers, it has been concluded that no claim for compensation can arise.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—TELEGRAPH EXTENSION.

MR. ROUND asked the Postmaster General, If he is able to make any announcement with reference to the reduction of the amount of guarantee now required by the Treasury in cases of telegraph extensions in rural districts?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state with regard to future telegraph extensions under guarantee that, by an arrangement lately sanctioned by the Treasury, the amount of the guarantee need not be lodged in advance with the Post Office; but guarantors will merely be called upon at the end of each year to make up the deficiency of revenue if any. This, I think, will be found to be a substantial concession. On the other hand, the Treasury have somewhat altered the principle upon which the amount of the guarantee is to be calculated; and the effect of this will, in some cases, be that the amount will be slightly larger than it would have been under the old system.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT (SCIENCE AND ART)—“HALL OF SCIENCE.”

SIR HENRY TYLER asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether his attention has been called to a statement in the public press on the subject of the employment of Mrs. Besant in the Hall of Science Classes, and their connection with the Science and Art Department of the Government; whether any letter has been addressed to him by the Committee of those classes; and, if so, whether he will lay it upon the Table; and, whether the daughters of Mr. Bradlaugh are employed in those classes, or in any way in connection with the Science and Art Department of Government?

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, I have seen the statement to which the hon. Member refers, and I will read the letter addressed to me by the Committee—

“Sir,—Referring to so much of the answer given by you to Sir Henry Tyler on Tuesday, March 21, as relates to Mrs. Besant, the Committee of the above classes desire me to state that there has been no withdrawal by them of Mrs. Besant's name as teacher; and as some misconception may arise from your answer as reported, the Committee would feel obliged if you would take such early occasion as may be convenient to yourself to make the necessary correction.

“I am, Sir, your most obedient servant, .

“ROBERT FORDEE, Secretary.”

I certainly understood from two Members of the Committee that Mrs. Besant had withdrawn her name as teacher for this session, with the intention of subsequently renewing her application. The Misses Bradlaugh are teaching chemistry and botany, I believe, to the adult classes of the Hall of Science. I understand they are well qualified, and hold certificates from the Science and Art Department to that effect. I may say we do not inquire into the theological opinions of teachers of art and science.

EDUCATIONAL ENDOWMENTS (SCOTLAND)—LEGISLATION.

MR. BUCHANAN asked the Vice President of the Council, When the Government intends to introduce the Educational Endowments Bill for Scotland?

MR. MUNDELLA, in reply, said, that he hoped soon after Easter to introduce an Educational Endowments Bill for Scotland, and to give ample time for its consideration before the second reading.

LAW AND POLICE—THE SALVATION ARMY.

MR. CAINE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the action of the magistrates of the Crediton Petty Sessions, 29th March, who committed to prison for seven days Susan Emily Saville, Charlotte Hartnall, William James Dunn, and James Norman, members of the Salvation Army, for holding a religious service in the open air on Sunday morning, 26th February; if his attention has been called to the action of the magistrates at Weston-super-Mare, 29th March, who sentenced William Beatty, Thomas Bowden, and William Henry Mullins to three months imprisonment, in default of sureties to keep the peace for twelve months, their only offence being that of walking through the streets peaceably, and without annoyance to the law-abiding population; and, if he will order their immediate and unconditional release?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT, in reply, said, that he had received no communication on this subject, and was unable, therefore, to give the hon. Member the information he desired.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT— PHONETIC SYSTEM IN BOARD SCHOOLS.

MR. HEALY asked the Vice President of the Council, Whether he has any objection to the appointment of a Select Committee to inquire into the comparative number of years occupied in teaching children to read in English Board and other schools, as compared with Continental schools, and the advantages which would arise from employing a graduated phonetic system in teaching reading; and, if he will state the number of School Boards which have petitioned in favour of a phonetic course for teaching children to read?

Mr. MUNDELLA: Sir, three or four years ago several School Boards petitioned in favour of a phonetic course of teaching children to read, and the London School Board was allowed to try the experiment in two of its schools. It was not found to be successful, and was consequently discontinued. I am told it was tried under very favourable conditions by a competent and enthusiastic teacher. Under the circumstances, I could not ask the House to appoint a Committee to investigate the subject.

POST OFFICE—BANK HOLIDAYS.

Mr. SCHREIBER asked the Postmaster General, Whether the approaching Bank Holiday on Easter Monday will be observed as a Sunday in the Post Offices of the United Kingdom?

Mr. FAWCETT: Sir, in reply to the hon. Member, I have to state that, following the rule which has been hitherto adopted with regard to Bank holidays, Easter Monday will not be observed as a Sunday in the post offices of the United Kingdom. With the view, however, of meeting the case as far as public convenience admits, orders have already been issued that the staff shall be given as much relief as may be found practicable.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT) — DIVULGATION OF TELEGRAMS.

Mr. MONTAGU SCOTT asked the Postmaster General, Whether, having regard to the correspondence which has appeared in the public press as to the contents of a telegram addressed to Mr. F. Wright, the aeronaut, by Colonel Fred Burnaby, having been divulged by an official of the Submarine Telegraph Company to the President of the Balloon Society, if such a course of proceeding is one which meets the approval of the Postmaster General; and, if not, whether any steps will be taken by the Postmaster General's department, with a view of preventing the contents of private messages being divulged to others not being the persons to whom they were originally addressed; and, whether the Submarine Telegraph Company, which receives and delivers telegrams in London, and has specific powers conferred upon it by the Government, and is worked in connection with the Postal Telegraph system, can be compelled to respect messages sent over its wires?

Mr. FAWCETT: Sir, as far as my individual opinion is concerned, I certainly think that the contents of the telegram to which the hon. Member refers ought not to have been divulged; but the Post Office has no power in the matter, because the Telegraph Acts of 1863 and 1868, which secure the secrecy of inland telegrams, do not enforce secrecy on foreign telegrams transmitted by the Submarine and other foreign telegraph companies.

INDIA—TEA LABOURERS' ACT.

Sir GEORGE CAMPBELL asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he has yet decided what course to pursue in regard to the Act of the Indian Legislature extending the term for tea labourers under the special and penal Law from three to five years?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, as I have already stated in reply to a Question from my hon. Friend, this Act and the documents relating to it have received very careful consideration in the Council of India. The Bill attracted my attention while it was under discussion in the Legislative Council, and I informed the Government of India in the autumn of last year, that, considering the unhealthiness of some parts of Assam, and the high rate of mortality which prevailed among the Coolies in that Province, it appeared to me that great caution was necessary in legislating on the subject, and that, unless the Governor General entertained a very strong opinion in favour of extending the maximum period for which a contract of labour enforced by penalties might be entered into, I was inclined to think that it would not be expedient to enlarge the period from three to five years. The Act has, however, been passed in its original form. Although I am assured by the Government of India that the death rate in Assam has fallen, and that the healthiness of the Province has improved, and is likely to improve, I cannot say that my doubts as to this clause have been altogether removed. As the measure, however, contains many provisions likely to be beneficial to the Native labourer, as well as to the planter, and as it is already in operation, I am, on the whole, unwilling to advise Her Majesty to disallow it, and my hon. Friend is aware that I have no power to alter the Act or to disallow a particular clause. I have, however, thought it necessary to direct the Government of India to furnish me, at the close of every year from the time of its coming into operation, with a Return of the number of persons suffering criminal punishment for breach of contract under this law; and that, at the end of three years, the Secretary of State may receive a special Report on the working of the Act, with a view to considering the possibility of abandoning all exceptional legislation respecting contracts of labour in the Indian tea districts.

SCIENCE AND ART—H. B.'S CARICATURES.

MR. GEORGE HOWARD asked the Right honourable the Member for the University of Cambridge, Whether a complete collection of the original drawings for H. B.'s Caricatures has been offered to the Trustees of the British Museum for a sum probably much less than the amount which would be realised by the sale of the collection if it were broken up; and, whether, considering the great historical interest of this series, the Trustees will be in a position to accept this offer?

MR. WALPOLE, in reply, said, an offer had been made to the Trustees of the British Museum of the original drawings for H. B.'s Caricatures for a sum probably not much less than the amount which would be realized by the sale of the collection if it were broken up; and the Trustees had determined to sanction the purchase, and had applied to the Treasury for a special grant to effect it. He was informed that the Treasury had replied that they were willing to sanction the purchase, provided that the amount was met by other savings, so that the Estimates for 1882-3 were not increased. Of course, the hon. Member would see that it would be premature for him to state whether such a saving could be affected or not. The sum asked for was £2,000.

SALE OF FOOD AND DRUGS ACT—COFFEE AND CHICORY.

SIR EDMUND LECHMERE asked the President of the Board of Trade, Whether the Treasury Minute of the 20th of January 1882, by which the importation, under a Duty of twopence a pound, of “Coffee or chicory, roasted and ground, mixed, without reference to the proportion of the mixture, and the permission to extend to any other vegetable matter applicable to the uses of chicory or coffee,” was made, upon the recommendation of the Board of Trade, as stated in the reply to a Memorial lately presented to the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury on the subject; and, if so, if he will explain the reasons for such a recommendation, which appears to be in contradiction to the Adulteration of Food Acts?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN: Sir, as the subject of this Question has excited a good deal of interest, I am much obliged to the hon. Baronet for giving me an opportunity of making an explanation. I should say, in the first place, that the change in the Treasury regulations does not make any alteration whatever in the law with regard to adulteration; nor does it, in my opinion, tend to increase the practice of adulteration. The matter was brought to my knowledge in the first instance by a number of tradesmen of Leeds and elsewhere, who complained of what they considered to be the anomaly in the Custom regulations. They informed me that while coffee which was pure could be imported and that chicory and other vegetable substances applicable to the use of coffee could also be imported, and having been imported could be legally mixed in this country and legally sold, the same articles could not be imported if they were mixed abroad. When I came to inquire into the matter I found that the anomaly had arisen from the fact that at one time the duty on chicory differed from the duty on coffee, and that it was necessary that it should be imported separately, and not be allowed to come in mixed. The regulation was purely one relating to revenue, and was not passed to prevent adulteration. The change which has been made amounts to this only, that whereas previously coffee and chicory could only be imported separately and mixed afterwards, they can now be imported ready mixed. I should say that the interests of the consumer are protected, not by any regulations of the Customs, but by the provisions of the Adulteration Act. The Sale of Food and Drugs Act provides that no article of food, or drug, shall be mixed with any ingredient injurious to health and sold under a penalty of £50, and that no article shall be sold to the prejudice of the purchaser mixed with any ingredient unless at the time of the sale the article so sold is described as mixed under a penalty of £20. Under these circumstances, the interests of the consumer will, I think, be protected.

REVENUE ACT, 1880—BEER LICENCES (IRELAND).

Mr. BIGGAR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, If he is aware that persons in Ireland who sell beer merely by retail have, in addition to the ordinary retail licence (£1 5s.), to take out a wholesale dealer's licence, at a cost of £3 6s. 1½d., while this latter Duty is not imposed on retailers of beer in England; and, whether he intends, in his next Revenue Bill, to remove this manifest injustice?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE): Sir, I think the hon. Member will recollect that the hon. Member for the City of Waterford (Mr. E. Power) asked me this Question so lately as the 28th of March.

REVENUE ACT, 1880—GROCERS' LICENCES, IRELAND.

Mr. BIGGAR asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, having regard to the fact that grocers in Ireland, whose premises are rated under £20, have to pay for licences to sell spirits, beer, and wine, not to be consumed on the premises, in total the sum of £16 4s. 7½d. while a publican's licence for premises of the same rateable value can be obtained for the sum of £8, he will provide in the forthcoming Budget Bill a scale of Duties for the first mentioned licences, same as set forth in section forty-three, sub-sections one, two, and seven, of "The Revenue Act, 1880?"

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE), in reply, said, that these licences, as the House knew, were a class peculiar to Ireland, and the reduction to which the hon. Member pointed was a reduction to which the Treasury would have no objection on account of revenue. The spirit grocers were not placed under the jurisdiction of the magistrates in the same way as the publicans, and on that account, as a matter of magisterial authority, it would not be a matter with which he could deal.

INLAND REVENUE—INCOME TAX AND BREWERY LICENCES.

SIR BALDWIN LEIGHTON asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether, in the financial arrangements of the coming year, he will take into his consideration the possibility of affording some relief in payment of income tax to tithe-owning incumbents who (being assessed under Schedule A without deduction for poor rates or collection) are paying generally on one-fifth or one-fourth more than their income, either by allowing such deductions as would be allowed in other Schedules, or by removing them from Schedule A to Schedule E, a precedent for which might be found in the transfer of railways from Schedule A to Schedule D; and, after the experience of the last financial year, he will at the same time consider the expediency of making some modifications in brewing licences, so as to extend the facilities granted to houses of £10 value to houses of £20 value, being bona fide farmhouses, seeing that the conditions of such employers is different to the same in towns, that the present arrangement has been found inconvenient, and has added 25 per cent to the cost of a necessary article of consumption and wages?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE): Sir, with respect to so much of the Question as refers to tithe-owning, I think the case is one which ought to be dealt with as a tithe-owner's question, and not as a matter of detail under a Revenue Bill. The tithe-owner at present is authorized to obtain a refund of income tax for sums paid with respect to parochial rates and rent-charge. As regards collection, that is a general question, and it cannot be allowed in that case any more than in the case of other income derived from real property. With respect to Schedule E, I do not think that that could be entertained, because the property subject to tithe-rent charge has always been treated as realty. With regard to the latter part of the Question, our experience under the Beer Act is not such as would lead us to entertain any proposal for altering the rating with regard to private brewers.

SOUTH AFRICA—THE TRANSKEI WAR EXPENSES.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, Whether the moneys advanced to the Cape Government, from the British Military Chest, for the expenses of Colonial Troops in the Trans-kei War, have yet been recovered?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE) said, the Cape Government had invited the Colonial Department to provide the sum of £150,000 in respect of the claims of Her Majesty's Government on account of the sums advanced for the expenses of the Colony in the Transkei War; and that Correspondence relating to the subject was now being printed, and would be in the hands of Members shortly.

SIR GEORGE CAMPBELL: Has Her Majesty's Government agreed to accept the sum of £150,000?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Mr. GLADSTONE): What the Government would accept must sometimes depend on the merits of the case, and sometimes on what could be obtained. The hon. Member will, however, learn all the facts when he sees the Correspondence.

CRIMINAL LAW — THE CONDEMNED PRISONER LAMSON.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether the statement, apparently semi-official, which appeared in the papers this morning as to a respite of the convict Lamson is true; and, if so, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman would be good enough to state the reasons which induced him to grant the respite?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Sir, I am much obliged to the right hon. Gentleman for giving me an opportunity of making a statement on the subject. I received through the Foreign Office a letter from the Minister of the United States, dated the 31st of March, stating that it was the personal request of the President of the United States that the execution of Lamson should be suspended until certain evidence which had been collected and transmitted to the Attorney General of the United States should be forwarded for my consideration. In my opinion, it is the duty of the Secretary of State in such a case carefully to consider anything that may be adduced by any trustworthy authority from whatever quarter it may come, not with a view to revising the sentence or verdict, the responsibility for which rests solely with the Judge and jury, but in order to determine whether there are any grounds for recommending the exercise of the Prerogative of mercy by the Crown. When there has been any reliable evidence to that effect it has been the practice of the Secretary of State to order a respite until that evidence was duly examined. In the case of Mansell, in 1857, four successive respites, extending over a period of six months, were granted by Sir George Grey, at the end of which time the prisoner was executed. In the case of Michael Barrett, two successive respites were granted by Mr. Gathorne Hardy before the execution, in order that further inquiry might be made as to the facts. Acting, therefore, upon the principle of the precedents established in this grave matter—precedents which apply to evidence whether proceeding from abroad or obtained in this country—I have acceded to the request and directed a respite for a fortnight, until the 18th of April. This case has been and will be dealt with exactly as if a similar representation had been made upon reliable authority in England. In my opinion, it is a sound principle, which ought not to be departed from, that before the capital sentence is carried into execution all the evidence advanced subsequent to the trial should be duly considered. But the prisoner has been fully warned that the respite in these circumstances carries with it no implied presumption of a reprieve or commutation of the sentence. I will also, with the leave of the House, answer now the Question which the hon. Baronet (Sir Eardly Wilmot) gave Notice that he would put to-morrow. I have not received the document to which he refers; but in any case to lay on the Table Papers with respect to the exercise of mercy by the Crown would make it absolutely impossible that that Prerogative should be exercised.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—THE "COUNT OUT" ON FRIDAY.

SIR JOHN HAY: I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Prime Minister a Question, of which I have given him private Notice, with reference to the "count out" on Friday night. The House must be aware that on Friday night at half-past 9 o'clock, after three attempts, the House was counted out by an hon. Gentleman, an Irish Member. The subject under discussion was a subject very interesting to Scotch Members, of whom nearly half of the total were present, and attending to the discussion. The Question was being answered by the Lord Advocate for Scotland at the time in a very interesting statement, and I am sure if it had been the Home Secretary answering a Question raised by an English Member, or the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant answering an Irish Question, the House would not have been counted out under such circumstances. Therefore, I have to ask the Prime Minister, If his attention has been called to the "count out" on Friday night, while the Lord Advocate was making a statement on important Scotch Business; and whether he will endeavour to arrange in the future that, as Scotch Members are not very numerous, a House will be kept with Government assistance when Scotch Business is under discussion?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, perhaps I might to say, at the outset, that I was not in the House on Friday night, not from pleasure or ceremony, but from a serious cause. The state of the case is this—that my noble Friend near me (Lord Richard Grosvenor) really exerted himself to the best of his ability, and did contrive to keep 33 Members out of those over whom alone he can be supposed to exercise any influence. I ought also to say that it was not very wonderful that a thing of this kind should happen, because it should be observed that the House had been sitting for six hours before this "count out." I regret it extremely, and I can only say that we shall continue to do our best to carry out what is an understanding—namely, that on Friday night the Government shall do its best to keep a House.

PARLIAMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—CORRUPT PRACTICES (DIS-FRANCHISEMENT) BILL.

MR. LEWIS asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether the Corrupt Practices (Disfranchisement) Bill, which had only been delivered this morning, and which was on the Orders for the Day, would be proceeded with to-night?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (SIR HENRY JAMES) said, there was no intention of doing so.

MR. LEWIS gave Notice that, on the second reading of the Bill, he would move as an Amendment—

"That, having regard to the evidence given before the Commissioners appointed to inquire into the existence of corrupt practices at the recent elections for the cities of Chester and Oxford, as to the proceedings of the President of the Local Government Board and the Secretary of State for the Home Department at such elections, this House declines to impose any penalties upon the constituencies or electors named in the Bill at the instance of Her Majesty's Government."

CRIME (IRELAND)—MURDER OF MRS. H. M. SMYTHE.

SIR EARDLEY WILMOT: In the absence of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, I wish to ask the Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether there is any truth in the statement in to-day's Morning Post that Mr. P. B. Smythe, who is known to and greatly esteemed by many in this House, was shot at yesterday in County Westmeath while returning from church, and that, although the shot did not take effect on himself, a lady in the carriage was seriously wounded?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER): Sir, I regret very much to state that the report is to a great extent true—that the facts are even worse than stated in the papers. A shot was fired at Mr. Smythe's carriage; and I am sorry to add that the lady who was stated to have been wounded was unfortunately shot dead upon the spot.

INDIA—BENGAL STAFF CORPS—CAPTAIN J. B. CHATTERTON.

MR. GRANTHAM asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether, as he cannot grant any compensation to Captain Chatterton for the suffering caused by the delay in the treatment of his ankle joint owing to his being improperly ejected from hospital in India, he will advance to Captain Chatterton a further sum of £250, on security of his pay, to enable him to have proper surgical treatment, the former advance of a like sum having been duly repaid to the Government?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Without admitting the accuracy of the preamble of the hon. Member's inquiry, I may state that Captain Chatterton's request for a further advance nearly equivalent to two years' pay has been not long since under the consideration of my Council, and it was decided not to comply with his application. I do not propose to reverse that decision.

GIBRALTAR (RELIGIOUS DISSENSIONS)—DR. CANILLA—THE PAPERS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Prime Minister, Whether he was aware that Papers with regard to Gibraltar were promised three weeks ago by the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs; that they had not yet been produced; that Questions regarding them had been constantly asked, and that hon. Members asking them had always met with evasive answers? ["Order!"] Such conduct was disrespectful to the House, and almost amounted to a breach of faith. He wished to ask—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is entering into controversial matter, and he must know that ought never to be done in asking a Question.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF: I only wish to ask the Prime Minister whether he will exert himself to obtain these Papers as quickly as possible?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no information on the subject, nor upon any other Departmental matter. I regret that the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs is not now in the House, as, no doubt, he would have been able to answer the Question.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF gave Notice that he would call attention to the matter on going into Committee of Supply.

PARLIAMENT (ORDER) — THE PRECINCTS OF THE HOUSE—THE HOME SECRETARY AND MR. ANDERSON.

MR. CALLAN: Sir, I beg to give Notice that to-morrow I will ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the statement which appeared in The Daily Express, a leading journal of Ireland, on Saturday last, to the effect that, after Mr. Anderson made his famous speech against the clôture, he (Sir William Harcourt) met him in the Lobby, and instantly attacked him, using words substantially to this effect—"You call yourself a Liberal Member for a Scotch constituency. We shall see. I have some friends in Glasgow. I shall write to them and let them know how you support the Government. I shall ask them whether they approve your conduct;" and, further, I shall ask the Home Secretary whether that account of the conversation is correct? And, Mr. Speaker, as this is a matter affecting freedom of speech and the Privileges of hon. Members—[Cries of "Order!"]

SIR WILFRID LAWSON: I rise to Order. I wish to know, Sir, whether it is in Order to give Notice of a Question concerning a private conversation?

MR. SPEAKER: If the hon. Member is founding a Question upon conversation which took place in the Lobby of the House, or in the Division Lobby within the precincts of the House, and not upon a matter in the House itself, he is not in Order in taking notice of it.

MR. CALLAN: I should be sorry to found a Question on a conversation. I am founding it upon a report published in one of the leading journals in Ireland—The Daily Express—and I may ask, as this is a matter affecting the freedom of speech—

MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member is indirectly founding himself upon a conversation within the precincts of the House.

MR. HEALY: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask you, upon a matter touching the Privileges of Members of this House, whether an hon. Member is not in Order in calling attention to language of a threatening character used by one hon. Member towards another while in the

of his Privileges as a Member of the House?

PEAKER: As I understand the intentions of the hon. Member for Glasgow, that is not the point raised by CALLAN: Virtually and substantially it is the same.

ANDERSON: Sir, as this is a matter referring to me, perhaps the House will allow me to say that it is not my instance nor on my behalf, but I am myself quite able to defend myself against the right hon. and learned Member—to maintain my own position—my own independence against the hon. and learned Gentleman—anyone else, and I do not want other Members to interfere on my behalf at any time. I have not the faintest idea how this matter got into the House. I never was aware that it was discussed till five minutes ago, when the hon. Member brought me a cutting of a newspaper, and asked me about it. I do not know how it got there. I told the hon. Member not to ask anything about it, because, as I said, I am myself quite able to defend myself against the right hon. and learned Member. I thought he was only giving me friendly advice.

CALLAN: Now, Sir—

WILLIAM HARCOURT: Permit me—

CALLAN: I beg the right hon. Member's pardon. I have asked my Question. This is a matter affecting freedom of speech and liberty of action of Members of this House.

It, therefore, concerns our Privileges as Members. As the hon. Member is within his own knowledge, and as the right hon. and learned Gentleman will at once answer the Question in consultation with his Colleagues.

MITCHELL HENRY: I beg to notice that if this system of eavesdropping and making communications by newspapers of matters which have been discussed in private conversation between Members in different parts of the House is continued, especially by the Members of the House who themselves communicate with the newspapers, I move that the Lobby be entirely closed to strangers during the Sitting of the House.

WILLIAM HARCOURT: I may, Sir, be allowed to say a word upon this subject. If it is the pleasure of the House that this matter should be entered into, I have not the slightest objection to state what occurred, so far as I recollect. I met my hon. Friend the Member for Glasgow in the Lobby. I had, as I thought, a very friendly conversation with him. That was in the Lobby. I was perfectly aware that he did not agree with me upon the subject of the cloture, and I said to him—"Well, it seems odd. That is quite a different impression from the one I derived when I was at Glasgow with you last October." I expressed my views as to the opinion of the people in Glasgow. As to the use of any language that can be by any perversion described as threatening the hon. Member for Glasgow, that I deny.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—ARREST OF MISS O'CONNOR.

MR. O'DONNELL: I desire to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to the report that a lady in delicate health—the sister of the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor)—has been sentenced to six months' imprisonment in the common gaol in default of finding bail for an offence which she denied having committed, and in connection with which she received no proper trial? In explanation of the urgency which induces me to put the Question without Notice, I shall read the following telegram just received by the hon. Member for New Ross (Mr. Redmond), from San Francisco, where this matter is attracting deep attention. The telegram is from Mr. T. P. O'Connor, M.P., who says—

"Sister ought to be sent to infirmary. Suffering last two years from ill-health, which cold of cell would make torture, and perhaps incurable."

I hope the political views of the hon. and learned Gentleman will not prevent him giving this matter attention.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) desired that Notice should be given of the Question. He had no information of the state of the lady referred to.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—OUTBREAK OF FEVER IN CLONMEL PRISON.

MR. HEALY asked the Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether he could give any information relating to the outbreak of typhoid fever among the "suspects" in Clonmel Gaol?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) said, the Chief Secretary for Ireland was unavoidably absent from the House, and he himself could not give the hon. Member any information on the subject.

MR. HEALY intimated that, as the matter was of so much importance, he should repeat the Question on the adjournment of the House.

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT OF ROADS (SOUTH WALES).

In reply to Viscount EMLYN,

MR. DODSON said, that the salary of the Superintendent of Roads in South Wales had stopped since the 25th of March, and he presumed he had suspended the performance of his duties.

VISCOUNT EMLYN gave Notice that he should raise the question on going into Supply.

INDIA—THE HIGH COURT OF JUSTICE —SALARIES OF THE JUDGES.

MR. PUGH asked the Secretary of State for India, Whether he had had an opportunity of considering the many representations that had been made to him from India with reference to the reduction of the salaries of the High Court Judges in Bengal, proposed by his Predecessor in Office; and, whether he had arrived at any decision as to the expediency or otherwise of enforcing such reduction?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: Sir, I have very carefully considered in Council such representations as I have received on the subject, and have arrived at the decision that the resolution referred to, so far as it equalizes the salaries of the Puisne Judges of all the High Courts, should be enforced—that is to say, that the Puisne Judges hereafter appointed to the Calcutta High Court shall not in future receive larger salaries than the Puisne Judges of the Bombay and other High Courts. There is, however, a small question still unsettled as to the precise amount at which the salaries of all Puisne Judges are to be fixed.

Mr. Healy

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.—[BILL 105.]

Order for Second Reading read.

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN), in moving that the Bill be now read a second time, said, he rose for the purpose of explaining certain of its provisions which were necessary to correct some clerical errors which had crept into the Army Act of last Session, owing to the fact that one of two Acts, which it consolidated, not having left that House—in consequence of the system of "blocking" persistently applied to it—until within a very few days of the Prorogation; so that only three days were left for the printing and circulating of the Bill, and passing it through all its stages. That Act was a Consolidating Act, and the most important of the Amendments now proposed was contained in Clause 5 of this Bill. By the 86th section of the Army Discipline Act, following the old Mutiny Act, it was provided that where a soldier of the Regular Forces was discharged or transferred to the Reserve in the United Kingdom, he should be entitled to be sent at the public expense to the place where he was attested. A question had been raised as to the operation of that section, and, in order to remove all doubt on the point, it was proposed by the clause to confine the right of a Regular soldier, on his discharge, to be sent to the place of his attestation, provided that place were in the United Kingdom. Such a right could not fairly be claimed where the place of attestation was, say, India or Canada. If the opposition to the Bill, of which the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had given Notice, were successful, the Army would be disbanded altogether, a result that would hardly commend itself to the House, however much hon. Members from Ireland desired it. The right hon. and learned Member concluded by moving the second reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Judge Advocate General.)

Mr. SEXTON (who had given Notice he would move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months) said, he thought it almost unnecessary to explain that his object was not the disbanding of the British Army; and the objection of the right hon. and learned gentleman opposite (Mr. Osborne Morland) that the Irish Members might object to such an event, was altogether unfounded. He (Mr. Sexton) put down his formal Motion of opposition to the Bill at its first reading, solely in order that he might protest against the uses to which the Regular Army was now being applied in Ireland. The statement lately made to the House by the right hon. gentleman the Secretary of State for War disclosed the fact that more than a quarter of the 132,000 men whom the Government proposed to retain for the service of Her Majesty were being employed in Ireland for the purpose of striking terror into the people. It was a remarkable fact, calling for the best attention of the House, that the Army now maintained in Ireland for stimulating the landlords out of evictions, was almost as large as the whole Army they maintained in India for safeguarding that Empire. The reason why they had kept up so great a force in Ireland was want of intelligence displayed by the Administration in dealing with that country. Instead of pursuing the sensible course of placing reliance on the passing of remedial measures, and the readiness to supplement those special measures already passed, as the people required, the Government deluged Ireland with soldiers, poured them in by battalions. And what was the result? The first effect was to enable the landlords to execute cruel and unjust evictions; and another effect was to strike terror into the hearts of the tenants, so that, even where they had a fair claim to get their rent reduced, when they saw flying columns of troops moving about all over the country, their claims were damped and their courage was quenched. The consequence was that, in consequence of the use to which the Government was putting the Army in Ireland, hundreds of thousands of tenants were deterred from asserting their rights, and were shut out of the Courts of the country. He trusted they would receive some information from the Government that they were approaching the time when the Regular Army would be withdrawn from its present scandalous occupation of enforcing contracts which their own Courts admitted were impossible to carry out, because they were unfair and unjust. Again, with regard to these evictions, he had to complain that the military officials and the magistrates who were acting in connection with them had lately taken upon themselves to seize cars and horses against the will of the owners. In many instances he had known those horses to have been overdriven and cruelly used by the soldiers, and to have been returned to their owners almost useless. He should be disposed to ask, when the Bill was in Committee, that provision should be made against the injustice done to the owners of cars and horses, whose property was seized against their will, and who had violated no law. Further, he understood that the police engaged in evictions received a special allowance of 2s. 6d. a-day, and he was informed that soldiers in the Regular Army, employed in similar work, received no such extra allowance. He did not desire to see soldiers treated less liberally than police, and if soldiers must be employed at evictions, he was at a loss to understand why they should not also receive an extra allowance, or why policemen were paid an extra 2s. 6d. a-day for performing work which soldiers were obliged to do for nothing. In Committee he would, therefore, move an Amendment to the effect that, as long as it was thought necessary to employ English soldiers in that sort of fatigue service, they should receive as large an extra allowance as policemen now obtained. It was a very peculiar fact that the whole military service in Ireland rested with Englishmen, for all the Irish regiments, and those regiments having a considerable proportion of Irishmen in their ranks, except one, had been removed from Ireland, and the Government did not propose to call out the Irish Militia this year. With respect to billeting and the diet of soldiers, the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War ought to consider whether it might not be possible to increase the scale of payment. The scale of 4d. a-day for the providing of such furniture as was necessary for the lodging of the man, and such articles as candles, salt, pepper, and vinegar, was absurdly inadequate; and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be possible to pay for domestic services to the soldiery on a more liberal scale? He had further to complain of the immunity given to soldiers from liability to maintain their wives and children. A clause, creating that immunity from a natural obligation, was in 1837 smuggled into the Mutiny Act, where it remained for 40 years to the disgrace of British legislation. The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) more than once had called the attention of the House to the license given to the British soldier to evade his natural and social obligations in respect of wife and children; and in the Mutiny Bill of 1873 a change was made, with the professed object of placing soldiers and marines on the same footing as civilians; but the clause was accompanied by restrictions which made it practically inoperative. For example, a soldier or marine who deserted his wife and children was not liable at present to any such punishment as a civilian received. He contended that if it was necessary to maintain a Standing Army in this country, that Standing Army should be maintained on a basis consistent with the principles of public morality and public right, and with justice to all subjects, and particularly women and children. They should not indicate to members of the humbler classes that if they deserted those whom they deceived, if they evaded their natural obligations, they would find in Her Majesty's Service a refugium peccatorum. Military interests ought not to be conclusive in a matter of this kind. Soldiers should be liable, either civilly or criminally, to make good the wrong they had done. He defied the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, or anybody else, to show any good moral reason why this system should be continued. Of course, he might give a military reason, but justice should be equally done between all subjects of Her Majesty, whether civilians or soldiers; and he must say that if a Standing Army could only be maintained upon principles of injustice to women and others, he thought it would be much more civilized and honest to resort to conscription, which could be administered with a fair regard to morality and the rights of individuals. As the law now stood, the right of a master over an apprentice was more sacred than that of a soldier's wife in relation to her husband. If a soldier had been legally ordered to make contributions to the support of child or family, the order could not be enforced without the sanction of the Secretary of State for War. The provision for the maintenance of women and children in the Act of 1873 was a scandalous one. In 1874 the payments so sanctioned amounted to only £1,500, which was as a drop in the ocean compared with the obligations that were evaded; and he believed that if the moral sense of England was once directed to this subject, he thought the system would presently have to go by the board. There was another scandalous provision with regard to the present system of maintaining the wives and children of soldiers. A wife had to go to the nearest workhouse with her children and become an inmate. If such a woman issued a summons against a soldier, it had to be served on the commanding officer, and a sum of money given to the officer to defray the travelling expenses of the soldier from where he was quartered to the place where the summons was to be heard. This protection made the law a bitter and contemptible mockery, and amounted to a denial of justice to all those women and children. If there was a proper complaint against a soldier, why should he not pay his own expenses, or why should they not be paid for him in some other way? If a soldier was under orders for foreign service, he could snap his fingers at any woman who had a claim upon him. That should not be. Nothing could be easier than to postpone his departure until he had answered his legal liabilities. The only reason he had for putting his Motion in this form was to draw the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to the points he previously mentioned, and to this point in reference to the maintenance of wives and children, which concerned England more than Ireland, because the Irish did not desert their wives. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would give the subject his attention. For his own part, in view of the Bill going into Committee, he should place upon the Paper Amendments which, he trusted, would put the law of England on a basis of justice, morality, and common sense as regarded the responsibility of a soldier towards his wife.

Mr. Sexton

SIR WALTER B. BARTELOTT said, he did not rise to second the Motion of the hon. Member who had last spoken (Mr. Sexton), but to make two or three remarks upon the Bill. The hon. Member, he felt sure, really put down the Bill to be read a second time that day six months. [Mr. CHILDERS: The hon. Member has not moved that Resolution.] He was not aware of the fact. Many of the remarks of the hon. Member were quite pertinent to the Bill under discussion, and, hardships having arisen, it was right that the matters should be considered and dealt with. He rose to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War whether there had been any diminution in the practice of desertion and fraudulent re-enlistment in the Army? It was well-known that something not unlike an actual trade in fraudulent enlistment was going on in the Army, and that many men thus enlisting were well known, but were not punished because they were doing their duty well in the regiments into which they had fraudulently re-enlisted as soldiers, and their officers did not like to part with them. As the practice was so extensive and so culpable, he wished to know whether the Secretary of State for War, on thinking over the question of punishment, had thought of any method of dealing with these offenders, for they ought to be punished severely. He held in his hand a Return of Desertions from the Army, which showed that in 1880 there were no less than 3,284 cases of absolute loss to the Army. It was a considerable increase upon 1876, 1877, 1878, and 1879. He should also be glad to learn from the right hon. Gentleman as to certain punishments introduced into the Army last year. When the question of military punishment was raised last year, new punishments were devised, and the House would now be glad to hear what had been the effect of these punishments, which were a greater degradation than even flogging. Would the right hon. Gentleman state how many men had been subjected to these punishments, and whether any such punishment had been administered in South Africa? He should like to know whether the men had been tied to horses or to cart tails, and also what was exactly the code of punishment for very grave offences in the field and before the enemy? He thought he had a right to ask the right hon. Gentleman what these punishments really were, and on what occasions they could be used? They ought to know how drunkenness and other grave crimes in the face of the enemy had been dealt with by the officers in command? He thought the present a fair opportunity for raising the question, and he felt quite sure that the right hon. Gentleman would give them all the information in his power. It was in that House that information of that kind should be given, for he felt sure that the country would be glad to know what was the exact state of discipline in the Army.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR said, there was one point upon which he would ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to give them some information. After a great deal of attention given to the subject by Members of the House, they had at last obtained an Army Act consolidated in one Code, so that officers and men could easily understand the Regulations under which they served. They had since had Amendments made to the Act, and in the Bill before them there was an additional Amendment proposed to be made; and, looking as he did with some suspicion lest that proceeding should lead to the confusing state in which the Army was placed by having many Acts instead of only one Code, he was anxious to know whether measures could not be taken to prevent a yearly amendment of this important Act? He was afraid if the present course were continued, of Amendments year by year, they would fall into the same confusion they got into in former years, and they might never have a complete Code. He wished the right hon. Gentleman would devise some means by which the Army Act could be amended and annually brought into a consolidated state. The Annual Act should be kept confined to one subject—namely, the number of men; and the changes that might be needed in the General Code should be put forward in a separate Bill, stating the Amendments and the Clauses of the Code as they would read when so amended. In this way the Army would annually be informed as to the Law under which it served. With respect to the observations that had been made on the necessity for an annual Report as to the working of the Army Act, he fully agreed with them.

An annual Report could be presented on all branches of the Army, the Judge Advocate General reporting on all points connected with courts martial and the action of the Military Code; and in that way many defects would be brought to light, and Members of Parliament would have the opportunity of giving advice and endeavouring to remedy these defects. If it were not possible to present a Report, the Secretary of State or the Judge Advocate General could explain the state of the Army in a speech to the House. The subject was a very large one, and well deserved the attention of the Secretary of State for War.

SIR HARRY VERNEY hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would be able to give the House some information with respect to the working of the present Army Hospital system. No subject demanded the more careful consideration of the House than the welfare of their soldiers who were sick. Invalid soldiers were now entirely under the care of the Army Hospital Corps, and he trusted full information would be given with regard to that body. He should like to know the number of the Corps, its distribution, and its relation to the Army Medical Department, the mode of selection of men in the Army Hospital Corps, and of their promotion, what training they received, and their length of service. And the House ought to be informed how the present plan of attaching medical officers to the station, instead of, as formerly, to the regiment, was found to answer. On these points, and on other measures taken for the welfare of sick soldiers, he thought the House was entitled to information.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER contended that the new Rules of Punishment were not sufficiently explicit, and asked for some information upon the point. For instance, one of the Rules provided that a soldier might be attached to a fixed object for certain limited periods; but it did not state whether his hands were to be tied behind his back, or whether they were to be placed in an upright position in front of him. He was sure the right hon. Gentleman would not inflict any punishment which would amount to torture; but the House ought to have more information as to the exact character of these punishments, and the occasions on which they were applied.

General Sir George Balfour

MR. CHILDERS said, he did not at all complain of the observations of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), and he had to thank the hon. Member for not having moved the rejection of the Bill; because, if the Bill were much longer delayed, it would have involved the disbandment of the Army. Unless the Mutiny Bill were passed within a few days the Army must disappear, and he was sure that it was not the intention of the hon. Member that that should take place. He would answer in order the suggestions that had been made upon the details of the Bill, although he was bound to say that some of them would be better discussed in Committee. The hon. Member for Sligo had, in the first instance, spoken of the impressment of cars in Ireland under the authority of the Statute for the use of the military. The law upon the point, which was perfectly plain, was passed after a good deal of consideration and discussion; and all he could say was that to the best of his knowledge it had not been in any way strained. The Act provided that every magistrate, on the demand of a commanding officer, was bound to issue his warrant requiring a constable to provide, in a fit condition and within a required time, such carriages, animals, and drivers as were required for the purpose of removing military baggage and stores from place to place, and the necessary provisions for obtaining them followed. These provisions were absolutely necessary for an Army under all circumstances, not only in Ireland, but in every country in the removal of troops. So far as he was aware, there had been no well-founded complaint of any injustice having been done under that clause. The hon. Gentleman then asked whether he thought the present state of things satisfactory, under which they had a large increase of troops in Ireland, and whether he hoped the time would soon come when it would be possible not to employ so large a number of soldiers in aiding the civil power in respect of the differences between landlord and tenant? All he could say was, that no one would rejoice more than he would do when it was possible to diminish the forces in Ireland. It was, of course, most inconvenient, from a military point of view, to employ Her Majesty's troops, as they were now largely employed, in aid of the civil power. It was difficult for them to get that amount of drill which it was imperative they should have, and they were kept at places where there was not the same barrack accommodation as in other parts of the United Kingdom. At the same time, the impressions which had got abroad as to the force in Ireland were altogether exaggerated, one hon. Member at the early part of the Session having stated the number at 50,000, and another at 60,000; whereas the total number was just 30,000, the normal number being 23,000. Still, he would not wish to employ the additional number, and he should be glad when they were able to withdraw them. The Department which had to advise in this matter was, of course, primarily the Irish Executive, and they had conferred with him and explained what they thought would meet the requirements of the case, and it was for him (Mr. Childers) to supply what the responsible authorities thought necessary. That was a course he had followed consistently, and he believed that the force in Ireland was neither more nor less than was requisite. In regard to the hon. Gentleman's observations on billeting, he thought it would be better to discuss that subject in Committee. He had heard no serious complaints as to the rates for billeting soldiers; at the same time he would gladly consider the point, if the hon. Member had any evidence bearing upon it. The rates had been increased of late years, and if he should be satisfied that they were insufficient he should be prepared to have them amended next year. With respect to the respective allowances for special work by soldiers and police in Ireland, he (Mr. Childers) was naturally jealous as to soldiers being properly treated and paid; but, having consulted the Commander of the Forces at Dublin, and other military authorities, he did not think there was any ground for saying that the allowances to the soldiers, in comparison with those to the police, were insufficient. The hon. Gentleman had also asked him a question with regard to the liability of a soldier for the maintenance of his wife and children, and had said that only £1,500 had been paid on that account under the present Army Act. On this point he (Mr. Childers) had no information before him. The hon. Gentleman had complained that it rested with the Secretary of State to decide how much deduction should be made from the pay of a soldier for the maintenance of his wife and children. He (Mr. Childers) thought it was not unreasonable that the Secretary of State should have some voice in the deductions made by magistrates from soldiers' pay, because, otherwise, such orders might be made as would make it impossible for a soldier to maintain himself. The question was not a simple one, and the hon. Member must remember that they had not only to consider what should be done as between the father and the Union to which his family were chargeable; they must also consider what was right as between the Crown and the soldier, considering the circumstances of a soldier's engagement and enlistment. He did not think they could treat a soldier in the same way as an ordinary citizen. He was subject to a particular engagement, absence from which might seriously prejudice Her Majesty's Service, and that Service was to be regarded as well as the interests of the other persons concerned. He was not aware of any case in which the Secretary of State had exercised his discretion unfairly. The hon. Gentleman had said that, practically, there was no remedy against a soldier who went on foreign service. It would be impossible to issue a ne exeat regno against a soldier in such cases; and, in point of fact, the claim might be altogether unfounded. All these points, however, should be carefully considered; and if, next year, he thought Amendments were required he should not hesitate to propose them. With reference to the Question of the hon. and gallant Member (Sir Walter B. Barttelot) respecting fraudulent enlistments and their remedy, he only knew of two remedies for that evil—one was branding; and the other was the improvement in the general character of the men who entered the Army, and the treatment of soldiers with consideration during the first few months of their service. In both these respects much had been done; and he believed that, while in 1881 there was less fraudulent enlistment than there was in 1880, this improvement would continue. He had considered the proposal that some method should be devised of marking men.

They could not be branded, for Parliament would never sanction—and, indeed, he hoped no Government would propose—such an expedient; and he was satisfied that the plan of distinctively marking men by vaccination would not be practicable or successful if adopted, according to the best medical and professional opinion. He could not, therefore, propose such a course for the adoption of Parliament. The country would have to trust to the exercise of increased vigilance, and to an improved system of enlistment, under which greater care would be taken not to enlist men who had already served. The great majority of recruiting officers ought to know whether a man had served as a soldier or not. He hoped that by the means which he had indicated fraudulent enlistment would be minimized in the future. He had also been asked by the hon. and gallant Member what the Code was with respect to the Rules for summary punishment? The Code was laid on the Table on the 5th August last; but, in point of fact, its provisions had not been applied, because they would only be carried into execution on active service, and, happily, there had been no such service of late. Nobody, therefore, could tell whether the change from flogging was a wise change or not, for no one had yet had an opportunity of judging its effects. The manner in which a soldier undergoing punishment would be attached had been intentionally left to the discretion of commanding officers, and, subject to the instructions framed under the law, those whose duty it would be to put the law into operation must be trusted. The object of the hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for Kincardineshire (Sir George Balfour), who had asked a question about the consolidation of Acts of Parliament, and who had complained of its not being done, was being carried out fully. The complaint would have been true the year before last; but it was not true last year, because all the Army Acts were consolidated last year, and, as far as the present Bill was concerned, express power was given to the printer to reprint the former Act with the verbal Amendments now enacted. He was shortly about to bring forward one Bill consolidating the Laws relating to the Militia, and another consolidating the Laws relating to the Reserve Forces. He hoped hon. Members from Ireland would not block these Bills, as they did the Consolidating Bill of last year, for the present measures would be a great public advantage, and it would be much better that their stages should be taken in the middle rather than the end of a Session. With regard to the suggestion that there should be an annual Report on the working of the Army Discipline Act, he doubted whether such a Report would conduce to the public advantage. Very voluminous annual Returns were published at the present time. He would, however, give consideration to the suggestion. A question had been put by the hon. Baronet the Member for Buckingham (Sir Harry Verney) on the subject of Army Hospitals and the staff of men employed in them. When the Estimates were being considered, he would endeavour to satisfy his hon. Friend. In conclusion, he expressed a hope that the Motion he had made that the Bill be read a second time would be now agreed to.

MR. O'DONNELL said, there was one remarkable ground for passing this Bill alleged in the Preamble, which he thought required abolition. It occurred in that paragraph which commenced—

“Whereas, no man can be forejudged of in life or limb, or subjected in time of peace to any kind of punishment within this Realm, by martial law or any other manner than by the judgment of his Peers, therefore it is necessary to pass this Bill for the maintenance of the standing Army.”

It was quite clear that in a part of this Realm—namely, that part of Her Majesty's Dominions called Ireland, the statement in this Preamble to the effect that no man could be subjected to any kind of punishment in any manner than by the judgment of his peers, did not apply; and consequently, if the Preamble of this Bill which they were asked to pass was to be brought up to the most recent developments of the Constitution under the administration of the Liberal Party, it would be necessary to strike out of the Preamble the words declaring that no man within the Realm of Great Britain and Ireland could be subjected to punishment in any other manner than by the judgment of his peers. The English Army was the most expensive and least effective in the world; and if some of the money spent upon ornaments or sinecures were made available for the legitimate, just, and more natural wants of soldiers, much would be done to raise the morale of our Army and its popularity. He thought some of the grievances of which the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) had complained might be redressed without delay. He referred principally to the question of the cruel, monstrous, and immoral immunity from punishment which a man who had deserted his wife and family enjoyed if he enlisted in the Army, and to the question of the expense which was thrown on a deserted wife or the mother of an illegitimate child who sought redress from a soldier who was not quartered in the town where the trial would be heard. A couple of years ago, when he referred to these matters under the late Administration, he was told that no small amount of the infanticide which took place in garrison towns was due to the utterly miserable condition of the women seduced by soldiers, and who had no earthly means of obtaining any help or assistance from them. With regard to the forcible seizure of cars by the military, he was not satisfied with the answer of the right hon. Gentleman on the point. A mere passing expression of goodwill and sympathy, he contended, was insufficient to compensate for the wholesale seizure of cars in Ireland for military purposes. In its connection with evictions, this system involved the greatest amount of loss and suffering in Ireland. Of course, he was ready to admit that when the Government were determined to have the cars, the cars must be had. But he suggested that they should be so used and so paid for as not to cause any loss to their owners. Cars might be paid for at the rate of £1 a-day, with 5s. a-day for the driver, while not more than four soldiers should be allowed on each. Four heavily-accoutred soldiers, with the driver, were a sufficient load for any horse. On the ground of the prevention of cruelty to animals alone, no car-owner should be compelled to grant his vehicle for a journey of more than four miles each way, and there should be an engagement that the horse should not be driven at a higher rate of speed than six miles an hour. He had known of cases in which they had been driven for as many as 35 miles.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Member that he was alluding to matters which would be more properly discussed in Committee.

MR. O'DONNELL said, his reason for referring to matters of that kind was to save time, as he did not wish to move absolute Amendments in Committee, but rather to make suggestions for the attention of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. As regarded the question of billeting, he believed that the present system entailed wholesale plunder on a portion of the public. The scale of charges was totally inadequate. He hoped that the Secretary of State for War, in consideration of the large number of Catholic recruits that entered the Army, would take some efficient steps to provide that when these Catholic soldiers in the regular stations of the Service, went out to the foreign Dependencies of the Crown, they should enjoy the same advantages for the exercise of their religion which were secured to their Protestant fellow-subjects in Her Majesty's ranks? In India, especially, Catholic soldiers were placed at a great disadvantage in that respect, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would impress upon the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India the necessity of causing the Indian Government to meet the requirements of the Catholics upon this point. He trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would take every step which lay in his power to raise the moral tone of the Army generally.

COLONEL STANLEY said, he only rose in consequence of the answer given by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, he believed, to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). He understood the Secretary of State to say that there was no power to increase the prices for billeting. Of course, it was not open to anyone to propose any increase of cost without the usual forms being observed; but he wished to observe that the object of placing the prices in the Schedule and of removing them from the body of the Act where they formerly stood was that Parliament should be able to revise them from time to time, according to circumstances. He wished to remind the House that formerly the Billeting Law in Ireland was much more severe than it was at the present time. Previous to the Act of 1879, which assimilated the English and Irish Law of Billeting, billets were made on private houses, while innkeepers were allowed no remuneration for occupancy. He had no doubt the Schedule would be from time to time revised, and trusted the Government would take steps to do so, if it should appear necessary.

MR. CHILDERS said, that with regard to the hiring of cars, the rates were fixed by Statute; but he would inquire into the matter, so that if any hardship did occur it might, if possible, be remedied. He believed that far more than the statutory rates were usually paid. With regard to the revision of the scale for billeting, he would consider it before next year. He never intended to say that it was not within the competence of the House to alter the Schedule, provided a Committee for that purpose was set up by a Minister of the Crown. He would also take care that the complaint made by the hon. Member for Dungarvan (Mr. O'Donnell) should be inquired into. The question of chaplains in India was quite out of his jurisdiction, and was under the control of the Governor General in Council and the Secretary of State in Council. As to the Contagious Diseases Acts, the inquiry by a Committee of the House of Commons, instituted by the late Government, was still proceeding, and until it was completed he could not do anything in regard to the matter.

MR. BIGGAR said, he felt bound to protest against the injustice done to Irish car-owners by the military demands upon them. The simplest way to provide for the children of soldiers who had deserted their wives would be to require affidavit evidence on the subject from the wives, and to deduct a competent part of the soldiers' pay for the maintenance of the deserted wives and children.

PROVINCIAL ART GALLERIES AND MUSEUMS.—RESOLUTION.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS, in rising to move—

"That, in the opinion of this House, grants in aid of Art and Industrial Museums should not be confined to London, Edinburgh, and Dublin, but that a special grant should be made to the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, to enable them to supply Provincial Art Galleries and Museums with original examples and reproductions of Industrial Art adapted to their special local acquirements, and also to maintain and to still further develop the circulation system now administered by the Department; that gifts or loans of such articles and works as may be available from the National Art Collections, and from the British Museum, should be made to Provincial Art Galleries and Museums; and that such aid be confined to those towns or localities which are rated under the Free Libraries and Museums Act, and that the amount of such aid be proportioned to the sum raised and spent in each locality; and that, in order to give due effect to these proposals, it is desirable to place the whole of the National Art and other Collections, including the National Gallery and British Museum, under the direct control and administration of a Department of the Government," said, that he did not intend to take up much of the time of the House, as the subject of his Motion had already been debated. Nearly all the leading towns were forming themselves together in order to bring the question to a practical issue. It was one of the highest moment, involving the national prosperity in no small degree. This country had the finest workmen in the world, and it was only right they should be well educated; but we did less in that respect for them than any other country in Europe did for its workmen. In the face of the increasing competition in all our manufacturing industries on the part of foreign nations, and when they saw those nations using great efforts to bring before their people everything relating to Science and Art, it was most important that we should do all we could to improve the artistic and industrial education of our workmen. Nothing could be further from his intention than to oppose the grants that were made to similar Institutions in London for these and other purposes, or to interfere in any way with the South Kensington Museum. On the contrary, his Motion pointed rather to an increase of the grant and to generalize its application, so that the various localities in the country might be benefited thereby.

I not wish to imply that there was jealousy in the large Provincial of the South Kensington and Museums, and the other Collections in London. On the contrary, they were thoroughly satisfied with those institutions, and with their management gentlemen like Sir Philip Cunliffe and Mr. Wallis. They were quite satisfied that South Kensington was doing as good it could, and as well as it could, considering the means at its disposal.

What they wished was that the advantages conferred by such institutions should be extended to the large towns in the Provinces. The authorities at South Kensington referred in their Report to the manner in which they were carrying on the circulation of objects by loans, and to the way in which they were endeavouring to get objects by electrotype and other means.

They went on to state that a system of loans was better than any permanent and unchangeable exhibition possibly be. That might be true to a certain extent; but the large central museums in London wanted exhibitions of objects of Art, not for a short period only, but continually, so that working men might have opportunities of examining the articles, whether they were bronzes, jewellery, or other things, which illustrated the manufactures of particular localities. The splendid antique collection of jewels in the British Museum, for instance, was comparatively unknown, there being, on the occasion he (Mr. Collings) visited it, not even persons present, three of whom were ladies; while in the town of Birmingham there were said to be from 15 to 20,000 working jewellers, who had not a small chance of seeing such good examples of their art. The loans which were made were not at all sufficient to meet the requirements of the time, and, no doubt, the loans and the extension of them to corporation museums had done a great deal of good. The people of the country would not now submit to be governed by the mechanical plans of the authorities in this respect. Indeed, the country governed London by its more generous ideas, and well known that this was so, as the experience of recent years had demonstrated.

There ought to be a circulating system, by which what was known in art might pass through the land and vivify the national life. A small Museum of Casts from the Antique was being formed at South Kensington; and why, he asked, should not Mr. Perry, instead of providing one reproduction or set, provide, say, a dozen, and let each of our principal towns have one of them? He wished to urge on the Treasury that grants for what he would call the higher life of the nation should be considered in a very liberal spirit. The authorities at South Kensington must not be content with offering their reproductions at half price to the country museums. He would suggest that when a reproduction was made, copies should be sent free of cost to such towns and localities as were rated under the Libraries and Museums Act. It was said—"Where would you draw the line to all these expenses?" Well, his Resolution, by limiting the grant to towns which rated themselves, provided for that. It would be a self-acting scheme, and he could see no objection to it, seeing that it meant that the locality which raised £1,000 should have twice as much as one that raised £500, and that would work fairly all round. It had been alleged that the Provinces wished to break up the National Collections; but he was unable to discover how the apportionment of selected specimens to localities appropriate to their exhibition was less national than confining them to one place in London, where, comparatively speaking, they were unvisited and unknown. The Turner drawings, for instance, were kept, as Mr. Ruskin had said, in a cellar in London. At all events, there were, doubtless, many duplicates, and many examples as nearly duplicate as possible, which might be spared for the Provinces, without injuring the unity of the Collections in the Metropolis. His Resolution recommended that all these institutions ought to be under one Department of the State. That seemed to him to be merely a matter of common sense. Where three or four managements existed, they, as every business man knew, must clash with one another. The results he desired could not be obtained without some such change as that indicated by his Resolution, the real intention of which was, of course, to put pressure on the Treasury, and, if possible, to induce the authorities to spend more money on the national education.

It seemed strange that there should be national pictures at the British Museum, when they had a large National Gallery. They wanted a more active management of these institutions. Instead of being a vital organizing body, the Trustees of the British Museum were mainly ornamental. They included such personages as the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Speaker of the House of Commons, the First Lord of the Admiralty, and the Law Officers of the Crown, as if those Gentlemen had not enough to do in other directions. The management ought to be, as South Kensington was, more responsible to Parliament. Then, again, the managers of the National Gallery were elected for life. These facts showed that there was a want of unity between the national institutions of the country. The management of them did not secure the highest results. The Trustees, knowing the new requirements of the country, must exert themselves. As he had said, he hoped that the time would come when all the educational institutions of the country would be under one management. The sooner they got hold of the idea that expenditure for education was in its infancy the better. They should not hold their hands in the matter, for many persons in the country, who took great interest in education, would not complain of grants for education generally until they found the sum exceeded that for military purposes; and he believed the working classes especially were in favour of that. There was nothing which the taxpaying people were so ready for as a large increase for educational expenses, always provided the moneys were well spent. Now, it was sometimes suggested by the opponents of his scheme that the Provinces might help themselves. But that was precisely what they had done already, and were still doing, and that to an extent that would astonish Londoners. But there was a limit beyond which they could not go. He had a table showing that 42 towns, with a gross population of 5,500,000, had provided a capital for fittings and other things for free libraries and museums to the extent of £1,000,000; and the 1*d.* rate, representing the sum for their maintenance, was about £100,000. But those amounts did not represent the whole of the amounts that had been spent in these localities. Birmingham, for instance, had in the past 10 years spent over £750,000; and, no doubt, Manchester, Leeds, and Liverpool had been equally liberal, and had shown an equal public spirit. But the inequality of rating made it difficult to obtain all that was wanted out of the rates. The complaint that the Provinces did nothing for themselves might rather be retorted on Londoners, whose parks and museums were provided out of the whole taxation of the country. He found that £106,000 was spent by the Government on the parks in and around London, and on the London museums and public buildings £304,000, of which the British Museum got £116,000. He did not object to that; but he wanted an extension of the principle. It might mean an increase of taxation, but not necessarily, as the country thought there were many ways in which the current expenditure might be reduced. For instance, the Government might spend less upon the Army, or upon some other Department of the State. An increased education expenditure would be cheap; it would, in the end, be an economical policy, to say nothing else, to secure the civilizing and elevating influences which would follow the increased Art culture of the nation. At any rate, the people would not object to a larger expenditure for good results. He hoped the Government would be alive to the manner in which the Provinces regarded this subject, and would consider whether it would not be well that the Provinces, which were taxed for London and rated for themselves, should, after they had done all that they could for themselves, have their needs considered by the Government in no mean spirit. To show how the people in the Provinces valued these institutions, he might state that in Birmingham, in 1877, the number of visitors to the Art Gallery was 394,645, while the number of visitors to the British Museum in the same year was only about 30 per cent more. The hon. Member concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in the opinion of this House, grants in aid of Art and Industrial Museums should not be confined to London, Edinburgh, and Dublin, but that a special grant should be made to the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, to enable them to supply Provincial Art

Mr. Jesse Collings

Galleries and Museums with original examples and reproductions of Industrial Art adapted to their special local acquirements, and also to maintain and to still further develop the circulation system now administered by the Department; that gifts or loans of such articles and works as may be available from the National Art Collections, and from the British Museum, should be made to Provincial Art Galleries and Museums; and that such aid be confined to those towns or localities which are rated under the Free Libraries and Museums Act, and that the amount of such aid be proportioned to the sum raised and spent in each locality; and that, in order to give due effect to these proposals, it is desirable to place the whole of the National Art and other Collections, including the National Gallery and British Museum, under the direct control and administration of a Department of the Government,"

—(Mr. Jesse Collings,)

MR. GLADSTONE said, there were certain portions of this comprehensive Motion on which his right hon. Friend near him (Mr. Mundella) would answer his hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Collings) in more detail, and more to his satisfaction; but he (Mr. Gladstone) wished to take a general view of its wide scope, and especially to refer to the closing portion of the Motion, which determined the course the Government must take on this occasion. The Motion began by affirming that grants in aid to industrial museums should not be confined to London, Edinburgh, and Dublin; but the fact was they were not, at that moment, confined to London, Edinburgh, and Dublin. His hon. Friend would say that was done in an insufficient degree; but, in practice and in a form not thought objectionable, they did go beyond these cities; and independent loans formed a very important part of the system. The Motion of his hon. Friend, however, would seem to suggest the interpretation that there should be an indeterminate extension of the grants. As to the second part of the Motion, that a special grant should be made to the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, to enable it to supply Provincial Art Galleries and Museums with original examples and reproductions of industrial art, he might observe that, as far as reproductions went, something was already done. But, as far as regards original examples, he must own he thought the House would do unwisely to pledge itself to that subject until it had considered and adjusted, in very carefully weighed terms, the manner in which a system of purchasing original examples for those Provincial Museums was to be worked. It would, undoubtedly, be a matter of very great difficulty. These subjects and others connected with them were necessarily unending. Let not his hon. Friend, however, think that he (Mr. Gladstone) complained of his making this Motion. It was the result of a healthy appetite; but there was no end to its extension. His hon. Friend dealt with the centres. He had got into his head the cases of those enormous communities of 300,000 or 400,000 people; but after the central authority had settled its account with those large towns, which by that time would probably have swollen to 700,000 or 800,000, there would be a different set of candidates, and, instead of this amicable controversy taking end, they would have to hand it down from generation to generation. His hon. Friend would derive some consolation from observing that they had been travelling at no inconsiderable rate already. If he understood the speech of his hon. Friend aright, they ought to expend £25,000,000 a-year on these branches—that was to say, it ought not to be less than the expenditure on the Army and Navy. [MR. COLLINGS: No, no; the Army only.] Well, his hon. Friend certainly held out some hopes of economy to be effected in a marvellous manner; but he (Mr. Gladstone) would like to see some examples of that kind from him in a practical shape before he could commit himself even to the reduced estimate of £15,000,000. He would point out, however, that they were, as he had said, travelling at a considerable rate already in this direction, though it might not satisfy the sanguine mind of the Parliamentary youth of the hon. Member for Ipswich. If they took the summary of expenditure as it stood in the Estimates presented to the House, it would be seen that a sum of £4,533,000 was taken for Science, Art, and Education. His hon. Friend might say that was not an adequate sum; but he (Mr. Gladstone) had known in his Parliamentary life when the sum given was little more than a fiftieth part of what it was now; and if that were so, it was now growing at the rate of between £100,000 and £200,000 a-year; and probably his hon. Friend, in the course of his Parliamentary career, might see it reach what he would admit to be a very respectable figure. The administrative Department at South Kensington had actually initiated and greatly extended a system wholly new, highly beneficial, undreamt of 30, or even 20 years ago, and undergoing a great and progressive extension; so that in principle, as far as regarded the administrative part of his Motion, there was no quarrel between him and his right hon. Friend (Mr. Mundella). In the last clause of his Motion, the hon. Member had ventured on a matter quite distinct from the earlier part of his proposition, as to the extension of the present administrative operations; and he had proposed what would, in effect, be a very difficult subject of actual legislation, when he said that all these Departments ought to be brought together, and placed under the direct control and administration of a Department of the Government. He (Mr. Gladstone) would not affirm absolutely the negative of that proposition; but yet he was inclined to affirm very decidedly these two things—first, that it was open in certain branches to doubt and qualification; and, secondly, that it involved a work of very considerable difficulty, and one to which it would be most unwise for the Government, on whom the whole responsibility would lie, to pledge themselves to at this moment. First, as to the qualification; looking at an institution like the National Portrait Gallery, that institution appeared in the Estimate for one of the most modest sums inscribed in it. £2,585 was the sum at the disposal of the National Portrait Gallery. That Gallery had been satisfactorily managed for a long series of years, owing to the very enlightened representation of the late Lord Stanhope, with results very remarkable indeed. And though it had been worked by an independent Body, yet its relations to the Government had been uniformly satisfactory; and he owned he should be very loth, on the mere ground of administrative symmetry, to interfere with an arrangement of that kind, unless he were well satisfied he could well mend it. Take the case, again, of the National Gallery. That Gallery, at a period not very remote, was the subject of incessant controversy and contest. At present, with a certain control through the Treasury, not involving interference in detail, they had made a harmonious combination of the two elements—firstly, that which was strictly professional, and which predominated in the person of the Director; secondly, that friendly aid which the Director now had it in his power to obtain from the Trustees, who were always chosen as among the best instructed, most enlightened, and best disposed of those gentlemen who were willing to give their services. He was exceedingly struck with the fact that whereas, a certain number of years ago, the columns of the newspapers were filled with controversy about the price that had been given for this picture, the manner in which that picture had been cleaned, scoured, and scarified—for that was the sort of accusation then constantly made—they appeared to have reached the time when public opinion was, on the whole, very well satisfied. Then there was the larger and more difficult question as to the British Museum. About that, all he could say was that he thought there was very much to be said in favour of a change of the present system; for he was by no means prepared to say there was nothing to say against it. It was a matter in which men of great acuteness and competency had found the greatest difficulty in arriving at a conclusion, and, even after seeming to have arrived at a conclusion, had been shaken in it. But the point he wished to raise was that the British Museum had in it certain elements of its old character of a private or semi-private foundation; and his hon. Friend would find very great difficulty indeed when he came to sweep away the old Trustees and their present complicated constitution. He (Mr. Gladstone) did not wonder that the hon. Gentleman was struck with the fact that the Archbishop of Canterbury, the Prime Minister, and the First Lord of the Admiralty were among the Trustees. At the same time, the anomaly was not so great as it appeared, because, while they were official Trustees, yet, in point of fact, they were not the managers. The Trustees, from amongst themselves, chose a standing Committee, and that was the Body which really managed, except as to the matter of election of new Trustees and the matter of patronage in the Museum, which was regulated entirely by a small body of three persons, called the Principal Trustees. The question of sweeping away that Body required really, before it was adopted, much more searching investigation than they could give it now; and it was not a very easy thing to say, in his opinion, how far the State, not having the gift of prophecy, and never foreseeing in the slightest degree to what vast dimensions that little institution would extend itself—how far the State, having recognized private rights in the appointment of Family Trustees, was in a condition, at a moment's notice, to sweep them all away for the purpose of bringing them under a Department. It was a question not altogether easy to dispose of, and would require more close examination before the House could be called upon to decide upon it. He quite admitted with his hon. Friend that such arrangements ought to be made as would obviate entirely the serious evils and inconveniences that had arisen in former times, and that might arise now, to a certain extent, from the competition of one Department with another in the same field of purchase. That was a thing which ought not in any well-regulated system to prevail; but as to the matter of unification, and bringing these institutions under the direct sway of a Department of the Government, that, he thought, was a matter which they were not ready to determine. He recognized the vast importance of the work; but it was not yet ripe for decision. Perhaps they were not able to travel so fast as his hon. Friend; and he hoped his hon. Friend would not ask them to give a legislative pledge, which would certainly be premature, and which might involve them in difficulties it would not be easy to extricate themselves from.

Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, he heartily sympathized with much of the general intention of the Motion of the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Collings), as he believed every right-minded man would, in so far as it recognized the elevating influence of Art upon the human mind. He had great pleasure in seeing all over the country an agreement that it was not only good and great that elevated the mind must be the aim. He would not manner in which the details of the Motion were worked out; and he regretted that the hon. Member for Ipswich should have loaded it with so much debatable and, in some respects, not strictly accurate matter. For his own part, he would not traverse the whole field opened up by the Motion, but would deal with the subject from the point of view of the particular institution with which he happened to be administratively connected—namely, the British Museum—which the hon. Gentleman had only referred to in a sort of off-hand postscript to his speech. He could quite understand the idea of a hard, merciless concentration of Art treasures under State administration. That was the idea of France and other countries. But a National Collection, presided over by a body of Trustees chosen for their capacities and station, who possessed something of individual independence, and who took a disinterested personal interest in the objects of Art under their care, was a thing peculiarly English; and he was a little sorry and jealous to see that its advantages had been somewhat overlooked. The British Museum, in seeking the advancement of Art in its historical aspect—Art which illustrated ages long gone by, which was the key of history—nay, which was an embodiment of history itself—had its own special mission to fulfil, a mission at least as important as its other function of the education of the eye, however important that might be, of the individual workman or student. People talked of the British Museum as a mere collection. They did not realize it as a Body which extended its long tendrils all over the world, and which, through the medium of men like Smith or Rassam, laid bare the wonders of a long-buried civilization. It was not merely that the British Museum sat at the seat of custom buying articles tendered by dealers. To give one instance of its work, it quite recently secured an invaluable prize in the shape of 5,000 Assyrian tablets from Sippurah, or Sepharvaim, and it was assiduously exploring the secrets of that fateful city of Babylonia, which was so much older than the days of what used to be the limit of authentic history, and in which, according to the quaint legend of Berosus, the Chaldean Noah had deposited the antediluvian records. It might be said that this was a fantastic legend; but certainly in the Sipporah records which had been dug up they possessed memorials of the very greatest antiquity. In the diffusion of a knowledge of Art, as well as in the region of discovery, the British Museum, too, was doing a great and earnest work. If it did not do quite so much as the hon. Member for Ipswich might expect, it was not the Trustees, but the Treasury who were to blame; and, though he had no desire to see the expenditure of the British Museum equal that of the Army or Navy, he could assure hon. Members that it could very well do with a little more. If the hon. Member for Ipswich could descend from his high, exalted, and wide scheme, and squeeze a little more money from the Treasury, he (Mr. Beresford Hope) was sure the Trustees would be most thankful to get all they could, and would spend it in the best possible way. They were not to be blamed for selling their duplicates; but the Treasury was for making it necessary. The system of management of the British Museum had been criticized. What, it was said, did the First Lord of the Admiralty, or the Archbishop of Canterbury, or the Prime Minister, know about Art? Well, assuming, which it was surely fair to do, that no man could become First Lord of the Admiralty, or Archbishop of Canterbury, or Prime Minister, without having a greater share of brains than fell to the lot of most mortals, he should certainly prefer the opinion of those three personages on questions of Art to that of the first Brown, Jones, or Robinson one met in the street. But, as he should show, these high personages had not, in fact, much to do with the internal regulations of the Museum. Then, as to Family Trustees, it ought not to be forgotten that their position was not only an acknowledgment of great gifts made to the nation by the self-sacrifice of individuals, but possibly tended to encourage contributions of that kind. If so, it was a cheap price to pay for advantages so considerable. But, above all, it was well to have the general body of Trustees large and varied, seeing that out of them were elected the Standing Committee upon whose shoulders the practical work of administration fell. The extent of the powers of the Trustees who were not upon the Standing Committee was, besides the election of that Committee, pretty well limited to meeting four times a-year, and receiving a Report which, as a general thing, was accepted as it stood. If he were asked to state a practical advantage due to their having Family Trustees, he would mention the presence on the Standing Committee of that Family Trustee, Lord Derby, with whose great common sense and administrative capacity the country was familiar. They had also as Trustees such men as Lord Sherbrooke, the Duke of Somerset—although he must confess that most able administrator laboured under the disadvantage of having been a First Lord of the Admiralty—the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock), Sir Henry Rawlinson, and the Presidents of the Royal Society, the Society of Antiquaries, and the Royal Academy, while their great network of officers included men of European reputation. Need he name Owen, Newton, Günther, Birch, Franks, and the Principal Librarian, Mr. Bond, all of whom met and discussed the common weal with their official Professors on a footing of manly independence, which might not be so easy with a Minister of Museums, holding Office on a tenure of from six months to five years. No doubt, there was a large and an intelligent body of workmen employed at Birmingham, Sheffield, and the other great centres of trade, in the development of which a knowledge of the Fine Arts was of the utmost importance; but still it would be impossible to cut up the National Collections piecemeal and send them in a fragmentary condition into the Provinces. They were told of the great number of “almost duplicates.” Now, an “almost duplicate” was just the last thing which ought to be sent away, for the diagnosis of historical Art so much depended on the comparison of the differences, or the details of objects generally resembling each other. It was said that if the masterpieces of Art were retained in London, the manufacturers of Birmingham and Sheffield could not come to London to visit them. Well, that was true; but so was the proposition that if these specimens of the Fine Arts were sent down to Birmingham and Sheffield, much fewer of the Londoners would be induced to go down to visit them. From that it was apparent the Museums should be kept where they were most accessible, and where visitors from all parts of the Kingdom might obtain as much enjoyment from them as did the Londoners themselves. When Birmingham became the capital of the Empire, by all means let them send the British Museum and the National Gallery there; but while London, with its millions of inhabitants against Birmingham's hundreds of thousands, continued to be the capital, on the principle of the greatest happiness of the greatest number their National Collection ought to remain there. They should be chary, indeed, in dispersing and breaking up those Collections. If there was zeal in Birmingham, in Manchester, in Liverpool, or in Sheffield, so much the better. He was a very warm friend to the system of reproduction, by which all the Art Schools throughout the country might be furnished with the most perfect copies of valuable originals, and be stimulated to the production of the elegant, elevated, and pure. That system had begun with spirit within the British Museum, and he trusted that it would go on with increasing liberality; and if the hon. Member for Ipswich would withdraw his somewhat crude and visionary idea of boiling up all these institutions in a cauldron, and would propose a practical method of securing the most complete system of reproduction, he would have the support of those who now felt themselves compelled to oppose his Resolution in its present shape.

MR. SLAGG said, he felt bound to say a few words in support of the Motion of his hon. Friend the Member for Ipswich (Mr. Collings), because he thought there had been no reasonable or sufficient answer made to his request that larger support and greater facilities should be given in the way of encouraging the Arts throughout the country. He (Mr. Slagg) had the honour of seconding a similar Motion to that of his hon. Friend last Session; and also in the Session of 1880 he brought under the consideration of the House a scheme for the reproduction of National Art treasures. He was therefore encouraged still further to press on the Department the propriety of supporting this proposal. However much the Resolution might be deprecated as being unnecessary or impracticable, it was only by bringing such propositions before the House, and pressing them upon the attention of the Government, that any steps would be taken in a matter which was so essential to the welfare of the commerce of this country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Cambridge University (Mr. Beresford Hope) argued in favour of keeping the National Art treasures under the control of a cultivated group in London, with whose administration the right hon. Gentleman and his friends were very well satisfied, although, in its practical working, there was no result produced on the vast populations of the manufacturing towns, who were more in need of artistic influences than the cultivated people who lived in this Metropolis, and who had large means of gratifying their refined tastes. The Prime Minister also appeared to be satisfied with the present state of affairs, so well satisfied, indeed, that he deprecated every proposition of the hon. Member for Ipswich. He (Mr. Slagg) could, however, ask the House to compare the results with those achieved by foreign countries. For example, when they compared their position artistically with that of France, there was not only very much to wish for, but also very much to be ashamed of, in relation to their present position. It was said that vast and yearly increasing sums were now expended on education and artistic objects; but these sums would appear very paltry compared with the sums and efforts which were willingly made by their French neighbours in regard to all that related to artistic culture. It seemed to him that in that country no expenditure was too large, no legislative effort too great, no administrative power too perfect, in order to supply, not only Paris, not only the cultivated few, but to extend the influence of Art to every town and province, and every centre of industry, throughout the whole country. When satisfaction was expressed with England, he thought they could not have their attention sufficiently called to the state of things in France, where the Ministry of Fine Arts spent no less than £2,000,000 annually upon Art purposes alone, not only to supply the great museums of Paris, but to present treasures to all the museums in France, and to give grants directly subserving the Art industry of every district. The result was to place the Art products of France in a position of very great and deserved pre-eminence. Were they, however, on that account, to despair of the Art culture, industrially speaking, of this country? He claimed that, at the present time, they must bestir themselves in the matter. The foreigner was encroaching upon their industries in every direction, and though they could still claim a complete supremacy in the power of mechanical production, when they compared their artistic powers and measured their artistic manufactures with their Continental neighbours they were very much in arrear. He had recently had the opportunity of making inquiries on the Continent in connection with the French Treaty negotiations, and he had never been more convinced of the necessity of bestirring themselves in that matter than by seeing the assistance which was afforded in France to the great industrial classes in the culture of Art as applied to manufactures. When we looked at our large industrial towns we had certainly reason almost to despair; but still he thought the English nation should never entertain the idea that they were not capable of becoming equal to the French and the Continental nations in artistic manufactures, and if they only encouraged the development of the natural gifts of their people, they might still hold their own in competition and excel their rivals. But what encouragement was given? What assistance was afforded to their industrial classes in such a way that they could apply it to the improvement of their industry? They were depressed by the miserable surroundings of their dwellings and the complete absence of artistic objects that were worthy of being studied. No doubt, London was the place for principal and original objects of Art; but duplicates were unwisely sold, instead of being distributed, and the fragmentary and unsystematic reproductions that had been made hitherto were totally inadequate to meet the necessities of the Provinces, to supply the examples that were needed by the designer and the artist, and to enable the managers of Provincial Museums to make the best selections of illustrations that were locally required. Could they not do much more in reproducing existing Art treasures? He had never seen anything obtainable that the British Museum had reproduced. He understood that the reproduction of ancient coining had been abandoned by that institution. [Mr. BERESFORD HOPE said, that was going on.] He was glad to hear it. They had, however, not seen much evidence of it. Collections ought to be copied on a business-like principle, and he desired that the managers of their Provincial museums should know where they might go with a certainty of success in completing their Collections. He was pleased that South Kensington had done so much. He might be told that the advance had not been very largely responded to by the public; but there were one or two reasons for that. One was that he thought where towns undertook the erection of museums, and provided proper places of deposit and exhibition, the Directors of those institutions should not be called upon to pay so much as half the cost, but should become entitled to them when they could show that they had done what was required. It had been suggested that the local rates should be called to bear the cost of filling the museums; but they were pretty well over-burdened already; and in regard to local subscribers they were really a very small body of persons, and naturally felt somewhat being called upon for so many purposes. The successive demands necessary, therefore, fell upon a limited few; and he claimed that the matter should be met by the Government. Only the nation possessed the supply—the local authorities could not find it if they wished. South Kensington Museum now swept the whole country; and he could only look to his right hon. Friend to do more to assist those industrial centres which had become to so great an extent the taxpaying power of the country.

MR. MUNDELLA said, the Prime Minister having replied to the first part of his hon. Friend's Motion, all that he (Mr. Mundella) had simply to do now was to notice that portion of the Motion which proposed that a special grant should be made to the Science and Art Department, South Kensington, to enable them to supply Provincial Art Galleries and Museums with artistic examples and reproductions of industrial Art, adapted to their special local requirements. He had often told his friends that it was impossible that South Kensington or any other Department could undertake to supply original examples to the Provinces. But South Kensington could supply assistance and advice in the making of purchases, and a collection which had just been purchased for Birmingham had been very greatly admired. If it were possible for South Kensington to provide original examples for the Provinces, there would immediately arise contests as to which museum should have particular specimens. But his answer to this demand was that if they distributed their Collections in that way, they would disintegrate the whole National Collection. There must be in the great centre of this Empire the very best original examples that could be found in the world. There were not only 4,000,000 of people in London, but they had all the people of the Empire visiting the capital some time or other. When men came to London from the Provinces they expected to see there the very choicest objects of Art which the British nation could produce. Those original articles could not, therefore, be distributed from one side of the country to the other without the present great National Collections of Art objects being broken up. While he could not accede to his hon. Friend's demand for originals, he was quite ready to accord to the utmost of his ability anything in the shape of reproduction which was necessary to stimulate Art. What the Government had done in the past year in this respect had been a great advance on anything that had ever been done before. The Estimates showed the great advance which had been made. The Vote for Schools of Science and Art was this year £160,000, against £154,000 in the previous year. Then the sum spent in the purchase and circulation of works of Art was £28,954, against £24,561. The whole increase, then, was in order to increase the circulation of works of Art in the Provinces. The Vote for South Kensington had increased from £39,000 to £42,000; the total amount of the two Votes having increased from £63,000 to £73,000. He would tell hon. Members what had been done. A few years ago South Kensington commenced to make loans of objects for temporary exhibition at different towns in the Provinces. Those loans had gone on increasing from year to year until the mere cost of the carriage came to £4,000 a-year. Last year they circulated throughout the Provinces 15,047 objects—that was to say, paintings and other original objects, to something like 80 or 100 museums. They were continually sending fresh streams of objects from South Kensington to the different museums. One museum had a collection for six months, then it was exchanged with another, and so a circulation of objects was kept up through the different towns of the Kingdom, care being taken that those kinds of works of Art which were best calculated to stimulate the taste of any particular locality should be sent to it. No part of the work which he was engaged in was more interesting than to witness the active, useful work done in connection with the South Kensington Museum; and yet the hon. Gentleman came down to the House and reproached the Government for not having done sufficient. They could only say—

“ We give you all we can, no more, Though poor the offering be.”

He could not honestly say that the Treasury had been illiberal in this matter, for he thought that an increase of £10,000 upon a Vote for one Department was a very substantial increase. The hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Slagg) had said that they compared poorly with foreign nations; but he would probably find that more was done for Art by the State in England than in any other country. He was very doubtful whether France did as much for Provincial Art as England. France did a good deal, but it was for Paris alone, while Lyons and the other large centres had to pay for the Art they required from their local rates. They did it, and he could not believe that Manchester would be behind Lyons, or Birmingham behind any corresponding town on the Continent. Moreover, this country did a great deal in the way of reproductions. Already £3,000 worth of reproductions had been ordered for next year. When the State supplied Birmingham, Leeds, and the other large towns with casts and facsimile reproductions of all kinds of works of art at half the price they cost, he did not think there was any reason to complain. The hon. Member for Manchester thought they should be supplied gratis. He (Mr. Mundella) was not of that opinion. He thought it was only fair, when the State contributed 50 per cent of the cost, that an effort should be made by the locality to pay the remainder. Everything that could be done to stimulate Art throughout the country was done. Already industrial Art in many towns and places in the Kingdom had been greatly benefited by what South Kensington had effected. There were Schools of Art all over the country, which were doing a great work, assisted by the loan of an increased number of objects of Art, which were constantly in general circulation by means of an increased staff appointed for the purpose. The larger the increase in the Vote, the larger would be the number of objects of Art which he would be able to circulate throughout the country during the year. He thought that everything that could fairly be asked was now done by the Department to realize the aspirations of his hon. Friends, and that the localities might justly be required to have sufficient public spirit to pay their moiety. He trusted that, after the assurances the Prime Minister had given, and the explanations he had tendered to the House, the Motion would not be pressed.

MR. GEORGE HOWARD said, that the Trustees of the National Gallery were fully alive to the desirability of circulating throughout the Provinces drawings and artistic works, and were doing the utmost in their power in that direction. Only recently they decided to transfer a Collection from Dublin, where it had been 10 years, to Liverpool. As a Trustee of the National Gallery, he denied that Turner's pictures were being kept in a cellar there or in the dark. As many of Turner's drawings as could be lent out were on loan. With respect to Mr. Ruskin's suggestion that the Trustees of the National Gallery should place the Turner Collections in some conveniently-built garret or upstairs room, all he could say was that he wished the Treasury would enable them to extend the National Gallery. The Trustees found themselves very much cramped, not only with respect to the Turner drawings, but in other respects, and they were unable to act in the matter without the assistance of the Treasury. He fully agreed with the suggestion of the hon. Member for Manchester as to the great advantage which would result from co-operation between the National Museum and the Provincial Museums in the purchase of original works of Art. There were, no doubt, large numbers of original paintings, which, although they might not be suitable for the National Collection, might be well worthy of a place in a Provincial Museum. He was sure that anyone who had seen the objects of art which Birmingham had purchased for its Museum with its own money would feel a wish to assist the development of Provincial Museums.

MR. ILLINGWORTH said, that there was a growing feeling of discontent at the practical monopoly enjoyed by the Metropolis in the Art treasures concentrated in London. It was high time that it should be understood that the Metropolis could not supply the demands of the whole Kingdom, for, after all, London had only one-tenth of the population of the country. It was practically impossible for the great bulk of those artisans who wished to improve themselves in every branch of industry to come to London to obtain a practical acquaintance with the Art treasures in it. It was absolutely necessary that these should be brought to their own doors, that they might study to improve the branches of industry for the purpose of meeting the competition of the Continent. He did not doubt that the right hon. Gentleman had done everything in his power; but this Vote was most insufficient and almost contemptible. A sum equal to this was spent in despatching Embassies to decorate Foreign Sovereigns with the Order of the Garter. He thought it was time for the public voice to be heard in that House, in order that the adjustment and distribution of the public money should be controlled. What in the past had been the condition of the people of this country? They lived in gloomy homes in narrow streets; their hours of labour were excessive, and the taxation was excessive. The House was reminded that in the last 50 years they had made a marvellous advance. He was thankful for that; but he hoped that the public would put an increasing pressure on the House in order that the public income might be expended in more useful directions than it had been in the past. A new wave of public opinion was arising in favour of State aid being given to the stimulation of Art in Provincial towns. A new demand would be made on the Education Department by the public, who would not be satisfied with the altogether inadequate proposal which the right hon. Gentleman had mentioned, and which appeared in the Estimates of this year.

MR. H. DAVENPORT said, that the Vote, which had been slightly increased this year, was inadequate to the wants of the great manufacturing towns throughout the country. Connected as he was with North Staffordshire, he felt deeply interested in the question of bringing before the body of artisans in that district a large number of specimens of ornamental Art. He concurred in the observations of the hon. Member who had just spoken as to the necessity of bringing such specimens down to Provincial localities. He hoped that the discussion which had taken place would excite attention on the part of the Education Department to this question.

MR. O'DONNELL said, that the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Collings) very properly thought fit to make some reference to the interests of Ireland in his Motion; and although no other English Member manifested the least desire to grant any assistance whatever to that country, it raised a cry of "Divide!" when the first Irish Member rose to speak. He intended briefly to refer to one or two points which concerned the interests of Ireland. He found fault with the Parliamentary outlay sanctioned by the Government for the reproduction of specimens of Art, and, at the same time, must express his concurrence in the remarks of the hon. Member for Bradford (Mr. Illingworth) that the assistance given to the important department hardly deserved to be designated by the name of grants. It was not until they should see £1,000,000 devoted to the culture of the brains and the training of the fingers of their workmen in the higher ideals of perfection in every department of Art and industry could they be justified in saying that a real attempt had been made by the Government to promote this all-important branch of education. However, he thought they might take the observations of the Vice President of the Council as clearly intimating that all his desires were with the increased encouragement of artistic and industrial education in this country. He wished to refer particularly to the suggestion of the Mover of the Resolution that aid of this description given by the Government should be regulated by the degree in which towns or cities were rated under the Towns Improvement Act. A condition of that kind might be very proper in England; but in Ireland, where British administration had made a tabula rasa of all industrial perfection, the policy of the Government should necessarily be one of gratuitous assistance for some time to come, so as to repair, in some degree, the vast injuries inflicted upon every department of industry in Ireland. In sending their artistic missionaries to Ireland they should proceed on the supposition that the past history of that country left very little artistic development existing at present, and that their first duty should be to produce that development before expecting any efforts at local and independent initiation. It was admitted in Papers and Reports presented to the House that there was no population more susceptible of industrial culture than the Irish people; and the policy of the Government should be to direct their missionaries to discover that susceptibility in different parts of Ireland, and, by giving it proper and liberal encouragement, to promote industrial prosperity in the country. It might seem rather strange that he should be pleading the assistance of the Government for the Irish people in what might be called the luxuries of refined civilization, while so many of those people were in want of the very necessities of life; but he trusted there was a better outlook for Ireland than might be immediately visible from the standpoint of English legislation. He was sincerely desirous that some vigorous effort should be made for the development of artistic education in Ireland. There were a dozen places in Ireland where such assistance could be conveniently and profitably given at the present moment, and it was only by efforts such as those that they could expect to bring about the improvement of the present state of affairs of the country. He was aware that his suppositions were rather Utopian, and that to the minds of many hon. Members of that House it was like looking for the advent of the Millennium to expect the day when fair administrative ability would be conspicuous in Irish affairs, and when such institutions as the Board of No Works and the Local Misgovernment Board would be abolished.

Question put, and agreed to.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT—THE NEW CODE.—OBSERVATIONS.

SIR JOHN LUBBOCK, in rising to call attention to the following Amendment of which he had given Notice, but which the Forms of the House prevented him from moving, namely—

said, he trusted he need hardly disclaim any intention of attacking the New Code as a whole. Far from it, he thanked the right hon. Gentleman for the great care and attention he had given to the subject. There were, however, some points in the Code which he feared would work injuriously. For instance, his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Council was taking a retrograde step in excluding children of the Fourth Standard from specific subjects. On some future occasion he should, perhaps, ask the House to allow him to call their attention to this part of the subject, unless, indeed, his right hon. Friend could be induced to reconsider the matter. He would only say now that the clause as it stood would cut off three-fifths of the science instruction at present given in Liverpool. For the present, however, he wished to ask the House to let him direct their attention for a few minutes to the regulations affecting what were called class subjects. The subjects taught in elementary schools were divided by the Code into three heads—obligatory subjects, class subjects, and specific subjects. The obligatory subjects were reading, writing, and arithmetic; the class subjects were English, geography, elementary science, and history, and for girls, sewing. Now, the points of which he complained were that two of these only could be taken, and that one must always be English. Most schools would, he believed, select geography or history for the second, and the consequence was that elementary science, though nominally included, would have but little chance. A good elementary education should surely include the rudiments of all four; and though he would not press schoolmasters to take them all up, at any rate at present, still he saw no reason why they should limit the number to two and exclude the others. Now, the “English” of the Code was mainly grammar. It included, no doubt, the learning by heart of a certain number of lines of poetry; still, the main portion of the time would be devoted to grammar. Of course, it sounded very plausible to say that every one should learn his mother tongue; but the question was how? He believed the child would learn English better by reading Shakespeare and Milton and the Bible than if he knew all Lindley Murray by heart. How many gentlemen in that House ever learnt English grammar? Not even, he believed, a “bare” majority. Had our greatest orators done so? The right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster had told them that he had never learned any English grammar and he doubted whether the Prime Minister ever had. Still, he had no desire that grammar should be excluded. All he asked was that it should not be given an unfair advantage. Another reason against making grammar obligatory was that they must, to a certain extent, consult the idiosyncrasies of schoolmasters. He did not deny that some men could make grammar interesting; but he believed that they were few in number. To force men who could not make it interesting to teach it was not only to waste time, but worse, for anything that made children hate their lessons did them irreparable injury. Now, he hoped no hon. Members would be frightened by the term “science.” Some even of Her Majesty’s Inspectors seemed entirely to misunderstand what was desired. For instance, Mr. Holmes, in a Report published in the annual Blue Book, said—

“With all due deference to Sir John Lubbock’s opinion, I hope that the children in our elementary schools will long continue to learn about Liverpool and Glasgow, the Rhine and the Danube, the manufactures of England, and the commerce of Australia, rather than about cortical parenchymas and chlorophyll granules, the mesenteric lymphatics and the thoracic duct.”

Mr. Ley, again, severely remarked on—

“The notion of some 3,835,272 little Sandfords and Mertons walking about the highways and byways of Great Britain listening to sermons on stones and spiders, or discussing petals and sepals with duly qualified Mr. Barlows.”

But he did not wish to introduce technical phraseology, though he might add that there were as long words in grammar as in any other subject. The elementary science of which he spoke was that defined in the 1st Schedule. Hon. Members would see that it meant a progressive course of simple lessons on common objects, such as familiar animals, plants, and substances in ordinary life. It might be said that "elementary science" was a very grand name for simple lessons in common and familiar objects. This he admitted; but he must, of course, use the language of the Code, and he thought critics would find it difficult to substitute any better name for "elementary science." Even Mr. Matthew Arnold was driven to fall back on German and call it naturkunde, which we might, perhaps, come to adopt as we had écriture. At any rate, he hoped it would be distinctly understood that he was not asking for anything difficult or advanced; but merely that teachers should not be precluded from giving children interesting and instructive lessons on familiar natural objects in order to torment them with abstruse grammatical technicalities. His right hon. Friend would admit that Mr. Fearon was a great authority on such questions. Now, how did Mr. Fearon say that grammar must be taught? He said—

"The teacher should, immediately after imparting the first elementary notions and general definitions, proceed to the subject and predicate, beginning with the noun and pronoun as the subject, and with intransitive verbs as verbs of complete predication. He should then pass on to the direct objective relations of nouns and pronouns with verbs of incomplete predication."

This was surely as difficult as any branch of science. Few men ever understood children better than the late Dean Dawes, and he supposed his school at Sombourne was one of the very best England had ever seen. What was the secret of his success? The school was specially reported on for the Education Department by Mr. Moseley, who said—

"That feature in the King's Sombourne School which constitutes probably its greatest excellence, and to which Mr. Dawes attributes chiefly its influence with the agricultural population around him, is the union of instruction in a few simple principles of natural science applicable to things familiar to the children's daily observation with everything else usually taught in a national school."

The Committee of that House, which sat in 1868, under the able presidency of his hon. Friend the Member for Banbury (Mr. B. Samuelson), recommended that the rudiments of natural science should be taught in all our national schools, and recorded their opinion that

"Nothing less will suffice if we are to maintain our position in the van of industrial nations." Sir Francis Sandford, in giving evidence before the Scotch Commissioners on Endowed Institutions, spoke strongly in favour of the clause in the old Code on these subjects. He said—

"It is a distinct encouragement for him to take up subjects for instruction of great and lively interest in the school itself, and of practical utility in after life to the great majority of the children when they leave school."

Dr. Percival, also, the late Head Master of Clifton College, speaking of our public schools, said—

"I consider that the introduction of science has not in any way interfered with the successful pursuit of the old studies; while many of our boys who have gained distinction in classics or mathematics have thus acquired a sound elementary knowledge of two or three branches of science, and many others have had all their powers stimulated by thus finding out that slowness in learning languages does not necessarily mean general stupidity."

Remarking on this, Mr. Hance, the able Secretary of the Liverpool Board, truly said—

"If, however, such are the results of the introduction of science instruction into schools whose curriculum already included not only the study of the masterpieces of Greece and Rome, as well as the varied attractions of mathematics, modern languages, English literature, &c., what must be its stimulating effect upon children whose mental food has hitherto been confined to the dull routine of reading, writing, and arithmetic, varied only by a modicum of grammar, history, or geography?"

In this he believed that Mr. Hance expressed the general opinion of elementary teachers. At the recent Conference of the National Union of Elementary Teachers it was resolved—

"That this Conference is of opinion, with regard to Article 19 of the Code of 1876, that each subject taught to the satisfaction of the Inspector should be paid for at the rate of 2s. per subject up to a limit of three subjects."

The advantage of introducing geography and elementary science was strikingly shown by the experience of Liverpool. For several years the percentage of passes was 74·5 per cent, varying only between 74·3 and 74·7; but in 1877 special subjects were added, and in four years the percentage of passes rose to no less than 89 per cent. Again, the British Association, through its Special Committee, had carefully considered the subject. They represented the general feeling of men of science in the country; and they felt that under the proposed Code the teaching of elementary science, in which he knew the Vice President of the Council took much interest, would be placed at a great disadvantage. They therefore adopted, and a few days ago forwarded to him, the following Resolution:—

“This Committee has heard with satisfaction that Sir John Lubbock has given Notice to bring the question of the teaching of natural knowledge again before Parliament, and offers him its support in asking that the three class subjects of Schedule II. of the New Code—namely, English, geography, and elementary science—should be placed on the same footing.”

If he were not afraid of wearying the House it would be easy to quote many other authorities. They did not ask the House to make science obligatory, but only to give it a fair chance. The next ground on which he based his Amendment was on the undesirability of interfering more than was absolutely necessary with local self-government. His right hon. Friend the Prime Minister had often pointed out the advantages of local self-government with force and eloquence. He intended to propose a wide and comprehensive Bill for County Government, yet in this Code the Government actually dictated to School Boards exactly what subjects they should teach, and forced them to take up grammar instead of elementary science whether they wished it or not. The School Board of London, and, he believed, of Liverpool also, had passed resolutions condemning this provision of the Code. Surely it was a great anomaly that when they had a School Board representing 4,000,000 of people they could not trust them on such a point as that. There was one other body of persons in whose name he implored his right hon. Friend not to harden his heart against the appeal. He meant those mainly concerned—the school children themselves. On a previous occasion he mentioned to the House the result of votes he had taken in several schools between the different subjects, and that elementary science was by far the most popular. Of course, he had never used this as an argument for excluding other subjects; but it seemed to him a very strong one against excluding science. He should never forget a lesson he heard in one of the Liverpool schools. He wished his right hon. Friend could have heard that lesson, and seen the eager attention of the children, their vivid interest, and bright faces; it would have pleaded for his Amendment with irresistible eloquence. He would venture to give the House another of his own experiences. He persuaded the master of the school in his village to take up elementary astronomy. The schoolmaster was very reluctant to make the experiment. He had no taste for science, and knew little about it. Still, he consented. A year later came out the last Code, which made grammar and history practically obligatory. The schoolmaster then called on him in some distress, and asked if it was really necessary to give up the astronomy, as he was not prepared to take up three subjects. He explained to him that it was, but said he thought he would have been glad of the change, “Oh, Sir,” he said, “you know I did not wish to take up astronomy; but as soon as I began I found the children were so much interested; it brightened them up so much that they learnt their other lessons all the better, and I should, therefore, be very sorry to give it up.” That, he believed, was the general experience of those schools in which elementary science had been taught. His hon. Friend the Secretary to the Admiralty, in his charming Life of Macaulay, said that that great man, who had everything which ability, wealth, and rank could give him, derived his greatest happiness from books. That source of enjoyment would be open to the poorest of those children if they taught them how to use it; but the Code forced on all schools one subject, and that the driest and most technical, the most distasteful of all to the minds of children. They were anxious, on the contrary, to make the schools as interesting to the children as possible. People often talked of teaching children to read as if it consisted in the mere mechanical act of deciphering the letters and transforming the written characters into audible sound and mental images. But teaching a child how to read and teaching it to read were two totally different things. They had not taught them to read if they have not taught them to love reading. In reading one of the last numbers of The Journal of Education he was much struck by an experience of a schoolmistress. She had some difficulty with her school, till one day she thought of giving a lesson on animals. The effect seemed to have been magical; the children were delighted. She had no longer any reason to complain of absence or inattention, and they strove to behave well at other lessons for fear of being excluded from this one. Thus this lesson actually became a reward. No doubt in education they must have much that was tedious, much that taxed the memory. That made it so much the more necessary to introduce some subject of a different character. They did not ask for the introduction of any subjects of a difficult or abstruse character. They did not ask that any subject should be made compulsory. All they begged for was that those elementary lessons on familiar objects should be placed on the same footing as grammar—that the book of Nature should not be shut out from the schools of England.

MR. STORY - MASKELYNE said, that no reasonable person could doubt the advisability of taking some steps in the direction of the Amendment of his hon. Friend the Member for the University of London. He thought the managers ought to have the option of two or three different subjects. There would be difficulties raised, no doubt, to that course, and the same sort of answer would be given as had been given to the hon. Member for Ipswich (Mr. Collings); and they would be told that the Code was elaborate, but could not, in present circumstances, be made much less elaborate. The question as between the subjects under discussion, as it appeared to him, resolved itself into a discussion as to the relatively educational character of those subjects. And here he would assert that none of the other subjects presented to his mind a better educational implement than did some of the simpler forms of natural science. It was true that there was some difficulty in teaching those branches of science well, and they might easily be taught in a dry and uninteresting manner, so as to have little value. He knew that in teaching them they were often not made educational; but, on the other hand, neither were the other subjects. The subject of history, for instance, was by no means, even in their aspect as subjects for examination at the Universities, of high educational value. For history, as taught ordinarily, was little more than an exercise for the memory. English and literature, he admitted, had a very high educational value, while geography, to be taught at all usefully, trenched on more than one branch of science. Natural science, on the other hand, dealt with what the child was in contact with on every side, exercising his observant faculties and awakening his interest, while forming his mind by the more or less exact study of what was above him and around him. English and literature were not likely to be neglected by managers or teachers who had the whole career of the child in which to teach them; while, of the remaining subjects, he maintained that there was no one which could be made so educational as that of natural science. But the discretion ought to lie with the managers, who would teach what the staff were best qualified to teach, and what was most suitable to the wants of the children and the requirements of the particular district. He therefore supported the proposal of his hon. Friend, and hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to make some concession. But, before sitting down, he desired to express a hope that as time went on and Codes got developed, the right hon. Gentleman or his successors might get a firmer hold, at least on the children in urban and densely peopled districts, up to and beyond their 13th year; so that their education might be of some real value in the class of subjects to which the attention of the House had been drawn in the Amendment of his hon. Friend. In this way primary education might become the steppingstone to, without superseding, that secondary education which it might be hoped the Department would take in hand at no remote future.

VISCOUNT SANDON said, that the position of natural science had of late years materially changed in our elementary schools. Men were made shy of the subject by the grand terms applied in the New Code to its different branches. The question, in his view, was—What were really the subjects of instruction in elementary science to which children in the first four Standards were going to be subjected? After all, the first four Standards were the really important matter. Subjects 1, 2, and 3 were common objects, such as familiar animals; then came more advanced objects, such as animals and plants, with particular reference to agriculture, art, and manufacture, together with the thermometer. Now, those were very much, after all, what were considered formerly among the teaching of "common things." Those were subjects of teaching which gave very interesting views; and he thought, unless the Vice President of the Council suggested some very grave difficulties in this matter, that the time had come when it would be well to give a freedom to schools to allow the elementary science being taken up at the option of the manager. He thought the whole tendency of action in regard to schools of late years had been to feel their way towards giving the greater option to managers with regard to the subjects to be taught in the schools. It had been so when he was Vice President, and the same policy had been followed by his noble Friend the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton). As time went on, no doubt the tendency would be to give greater freedom in this respect; and he, for one, rejoiced in the prospect. The greater variety of choice the managers had, the better it would be for the children. His hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) had ably advocated, on that and other occasions, the claims of natural science. He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet that the great thing was to make children, as far as possible, observe and think. Reading, writing, and arithmetic were the three great primary objects. With reference to the Code generally, he would not like to go into details at that late hour; but he very much regretted that they apparently would have no opportunity of discussing this most important document. He did not know whether the Vice President could hold out to them any hopes of further discussing it; but he (Viscount Sandon), for one, must put in a distinct protest against that important Paper becoming the law of all schools without further sifting. It was probable it would be some months yet before those interested in it would have really understood or completely mastered it. He rejoiced at the prospect of simplification, for, from experience of four years in the Education Department, he was not quite so hopeful as the right hon. Gentleman of making it a simple Code. Though he recognized the earnest desire there was to make it simple, the more he saw the more he felt it was a duty to make it a simple document. However, it had his best wishes, as it had those of all who were interested in the schools. It seemed to him the whole action of the Code in the future turned very much on the conduct of the Inspectors in wielding the great powers which were about to be placed in their hands. It was to be regretted, however, that at the time when the Inspectors were made very important personages, they should be somewhat checked in the freedom of their criticisms on the action of the Department. He gathered from the Circular that in future they were not to criticize the Code which they administered. Whoever had been at the head of the Department had often received suggestions that the criticisms of the Inspectors, in their Annual Reports, should be checked; but he had always resisted any interference with the freedom of the Inspectors in this respect, because he thought it was of the greatest advantage to the country that there should be free discussion in the Blue Books as to our educational system. There was one important change made with respect to the grants for the three elementary subjects; of course, it was one of the cardinal changes of the Code. Just before coming to the House he received an important letter from the clerk of the school board at Liverpool, which had most admirably carried out the whole of the educational system for the last 10 years. With the permission of the House he would read from that letter a passage which raised a grave doubt as to one important matter in the Code. The writer said—

"You will observe that by Article 109 (e) the amount of this grant per head on the average attendance is to be regulated by the percentage of passes obtained to those which might have been obtained at an examination in which all children whose names had been on the rolls of the school for the last 22 weeks of the school year, and are so still on the day of inspection, must be presented. This makes it to be the direct interest of managers and teachers that no child should fulfil these conditions who is not likely to be successful in the examination, and, therefore, inevitably tends to the exclusion of backward children. To illustrate the working of the proposed grants for elementary subjects, I am desired to take the cases of two schools each with an average attendance of 100, one of which (a) having been gradually purged of all backward scholars as the day of examination approached, presents and passes 90 children; while the other (b), which has taken no such precautions, presents 100, of whom five fail. The grant to the two schools would be as follows—viz. (a) 100 times 8s. 4d., or £41 13s. 4d., and (b) 100 times 7s. 11d., or £39 11s. 8d.—the difference between 7s. 11d. and 8s. 4d. arising from the fact that the first school has passed 100 per cent of the number presented, and the other only 95 per cent, although the latter has actually passed five children more than the former, in addition to having given conscientious instruction to the five children who failed, but whom the first school would have excluded."

This letter raised a very important point, which he felt sure would receive careful consideration from the right hon. Gentleman. There was another point of change in the Code that he personally regretted, although he believed his right hon. Friend was justified in making it—he meant the dropping of the honour certificates. It was a very great pity that the scheme was not re-modelled, instead of being dropped altogether. He might have been faulty in his provisions respecting it; but still he thought the principle itself was a sound one—namely, that when the children of the whole working class were being driven into the schools, certain exhibitions should be provided to act as an encouragement to them. Thus, they would not be merely driven to school, but encouraged to remain there. He believed the honour certificate might be rendered very valuable if it were worth something like a small scholarship; and he hoped that, as time went on, the subject might be re-handled. Another change which he regarded with some suspicion was that relating to the grants to small rural schools. In the Act of 1876 the late Government provided that grants should be made to such schools, and there was a proposal in the New Code to strike off these grants. He must strongly plead for these small schools in the interest of the rural population, as it was most important that the children should not be forced to go to larger schools at a distance, at a greater cost of strength and anxiety. He desired now to make a few remarks on one of the most important clauses of this New Code—namely, that relating to the merit grant. The right hon. Gentleman had omitted the definition of discipline that had been in the Code for seven or eight years. The following was the definition which he put into the Code seven or eight years ago:—

"To meet the requirements respecting discipline, the managers and teachers will be expected to satisfy the Inspector that all reasonable care is taken in the ordinary management of the school to bring up the children in habits of punctuality, of good manners and language, of cleanliness and neatness, and also to impress upon the children the importance of cheerful obedience to duty, of consideration and respect for others, and of honour and truthfulness in word and act."

He and his Colleagues thought that it was very important that the State should speak out boldly on this subject, after having determined to take no part in religious teaching. School boards and managers of schools—Church of England, Nonconformist, and Roman Catholic—had written letters thanking the then Government, and himself as representing it, for having thus strengthened the hands of managers and teachers in maintaining a high moral tone in the schools. The most valued Inspectors hailed with the greatest cordiality the step which was taken at that time. One of them, who represented the Department in Yorkshire for some time, said—

"It is quite certain that unless discipline is well maintained the best instruction is worthless. I am very glad, therefore, that under the New Code a grant is to be made to schools where the discipline is satisfactory, and that certain requirements must be fulfilled for the grant to be earned. Unless I am much mistaken, this explicit statement of the teachers' duties will mark an important epoch in our educational history. Definite rules are now for the first time given, and the objects to be aimed at are distinctly prescribed. A wider and higher meaning is now attached to the word 'discipline,' which signifies not merely the maintenance of order, but moral training. The best opportunity of testing discipline is afforded by visits paid without notice, when the school is seen in its ordinary working dress."

Another Inspector, in the Sheffield district, observed—

"The special grant for discipline is evidently tending to make teachers more attentive to the bearing and conduct of their scholars. It is, I find, a matter of general satisfaction that the importance of moral discipline, as well as mere outward order, is now recognized by the Department. This declaration on your Lordship's part that the above are essential elements in the education which the nation desires to secure for its citizens is, I feel convinced, having a good effect; it is, as I have found by personal experience, not only a means of strengthening the hands of your Inspectors when they feel obliged to call attention to defects in the moral discipline of any school, but it is also an encouragement to those who cling to the belief that the true ideal of national education includes the training of the mind and heart, and the formation of the moral character."

Again, an Inspector from Wales wrote—

“ But, after all, to give true education, hand-in-hand with this mere instruction must go the discipline of mind and body; and with hearty goodwill did I greet those words on discipline first introduced some two years ago into the Code.”

It might interest the House to know how they came to insert this definition of discipline. What first brought it to his mind personally was the reading of a most remarkable definition laid down by the Queen as to the highest qualities of a British sailor on the occasion of Her Majesty giving a gold medal to a sailor on board one of the training ships. In much the same way their object was to lay down in the Code the model of the character which the teachers should attempt to encourage. The right hon. Gentleman opposite was, he knew, as eager as possible to promote the moral character of the schools; and, that being so, there could be no reason for taking away the standard that they wished the scholars to copy. The present time afforded a most admirable opportunity for efforts in this direction, as there would soon be 5,000,000 of children in the schools and an army of 50,000 trained teachers. There were many other matters connected with the Code to which he would not now call attention; but he wished, before he sat down, to make an appeal to his right hon. Friend. The prosperity of schools hereafter, from a monetary point of view, would depend on the attendance of children. For the sake of the thousands of children who attended no school, and for the sake of the hundreds who only attended irregularly, he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would lose no opportunity of impressing on the School Attendance Committees of school boards the absolute necessity of enforcing the regular attendance of children. He (Viscount Sandon) put a strong clause into the Act enabling the Vice President of the Council of Education to supersede School Attendance Committees for neglect, and appoint two or three gentlemen at a suitable remuneration for a period of two years to fulfil their duties. If the right hon. Gentleman would only appoint one or two of these Committees, there would be a general alertness aroused on the part of School Attendance Committees throughout the country. The country was greatly indebted to the right hon.

Viscount Sandon

Gentleman for his labours in reference to the children under his charge; and, having done so much, he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman would not forget that their moral welfare was quite as much cherished by the people of England and the parents of England as their intellectual qualities.

MR. LYULPH STANLEY, who had the following Amendment on the Paper:—

“ That the existing system of training colleges being mainly under denominational management, and the admission of students being entirely in the hands of the college authorities, is unsatisfactory and inadequate at the present day as affording no protection to the rights of conscience of the students, and as tending to exclude those students who come from Board Schools who are desirous and well qualified to pursue the career of elementary teachers; and that the School Boards of this country, which now educate a continually increasing proportion of all the children attending public elementary schools in England and Wales, are entitled for their teachers to an unsectarian system of training, with the protection of a conscience clause,” said, he agreed with the noble Lord opposite as to the importance of regular school attendance; but thought that this was a matter upon which his speech should have been addressed to the Home Secretary rather than to the Vice President of the Council. The experience of the London School Board was that the magistrates formed the most serious obstruction in the way of carrying out the work of elementary education; and, moreover, after parents had been brought before the magistrates, and after the magistrates had imposed a fine upon them, the Summary Jurisdiction Act, by substituting distress for imprisonment, had imposed an almost insuperable obstacle to the work of school boards. The London School Board had been obliged to leave the coercive bye-laws almost in suspense, because they shrank from applying so cruel a remedy against the poor. The imposition of a term of imprisonment in 99 cases out of 100 produced the payment of the fine; whereas, to enforce distress, might cost from £1 10s. to £2, and often caused great misery to innocent wives and children. In listening to the remarks of both the hon. Baronet and the noble Lord, he felt the difficulty of discussing the details of the Code in the House of Commons. Many of them were for the consideration of experts, and the question raised by the hon. Baronet was pre-eminently one of that category. The House was fitted well enough to deal with great principles, but not to settle minute details, and the Privy Council ought to have a wide discretion allowed to it with regard to minor matters. As to the subject of his Resolution, the Vice President of the Council stated in the debate last year that he was strongly of opinion that no student ought to be excluded from College on account of his religious opinions, and that he would look into it and take steps to remedy any grievance. Since that time the matter had been taken up by a great many school boards, including those of London, Bradford, and Ipswich; and the Department, in reply to the representations from Bradford, had stated that it was contemplated shortly to establish three new Training Colleges, two of which would be undenominational. But any such remedy as that would be quite inadequate to the grievance complained of. The grievance was that the entrance to the profession of teachers was almost entirely in the hands of Colleges which were irresponsible in their management, and mainly sectarian in their teaching. If the Training Colleges were strictly voluntary institutions, Parliament would have nothing to say to their management; but they were not in any respect voluntary or private. It was true that a great part of their original cost was defrayed by private subscriptions; but about three-tenths of it was supplied by the State. The question, however, was not the original cost, but the annual maintenance; and of the whole yearly expenditure of those Colleges only 15 per cent was defrayed by private subscriptions, while 85 per cent was defrayed by the State and by the fees of the students. If the Training Colleges defrayed their own expenses without coming to Parliament for a Vote, they might conduct their business on the narrowest basis they pleased. But when the managers came to Parliament for an annual grant to subsidize their labours, the House of Commons was morally as well as legally justified in looking into the system of management, and, if it thought fit, in imposing new conditions upon which the annual grant should be obtained. He did not think that he would have any difficulty in persuading hon. Members on that side of the House that the undenominational system of Training Colleges was the best. In 1839, when Lord Melbourne first constituted the Educational Committee of Privy Council, the first proposition was that the State should establish undenominational Training Colleges; but the proposal was defeated by the obstinate resistance of the Bishops and the Tory Party. He hoped the Liberals of the House of Commons in 1882 were not less in favour of undenominational and unsectarian teaching than their Predecessors more than 40 years ago. When the opposition succeeded, the State deliberately handed over to the various sects the task of doing the work of the nation. But all knew that when they undertook to encourage the sects, all the money and the patronage fell, in point of fact, into the hands of the most powerful sect which enjoyed the privilege of establishment. When there was a concordat between the Government and the Bishops, when the Government Inspectors were bound to be clergymen, when their nomination was to be approved by the two Archbishops, who could also, by withdrawing their approval, procure their dismissal, it was no wonder that from 1840 to 1870 they should have side by side a system of denominationalism in the day schools and in the Training Colleges. But in 1870 was passed an Act which, in spite of its shortcomings, was one of the most progressive this country had ever seen, and which first recognized the duty of providing national education. A truly national system was then established, which had increased with such rapid strides that nearly 30 per cent of all the children in this country were now educated in Board schools; and yet the Church Training Colleges had 580 more places than were necessary for supplying the Church schools; the Wesleyan and Roman Catholic Colleges had more than their share; while the Board schools and British schools, forming the undenominational part of our national system, which provided for more than 38 per cent of the children, had only 15 per cent of the Training College accommodation of the country. If undenominational school children had an adequate proportion of Training College accommodation supplied to them, there would be 780 more institutions for that purpose than there were now. He thought that great injustice was done by compelling undenominational students to enter the Training Colleges, because they were called upon to violate their consciences by taking part in the religious instruction of the College. It was most undesirable that students should be placed in such a position as to be tempted to barter away their consciences for the material advantages which those Training Colleges offered. He wished to ask hon. Members who were connected with Yorkshire if they had ever considered the wretched state of things existing with regard to Training Colleges there? That county, with all its activity, and what some hon. Members opposite might perhaps call its aggressive Nonconformity, had only two small Church of England Training Colleges—one for masters at York, and one for mistresses at Ripon. There was no choice there whatever. At Ripon the candidates for admission were asked if they had been baptized and confirmed, and the Communion was practically re-imposed as a test, although he should have thought Churchmen would have considered that a desecration of the Sacrament. There was also an entrance examination in the Prayer Book. Now, if the educational results had been good, some might make light of the religious difficulty; but, as the Reports showed, the results were deplorably bad, for at the 1880 Examination York College came out at the bottom of the list. Whereas, in the average of Training Colleges in England, 40 per cent of males passed in the 1st division, at York only 3 per cent passed; and instead of the average of 12 per cent in the 3rd division, it was there the very excessive number of 36 per cent in the lowest rank. Yet, young Baptists from Bradford and Halifax must get baptized in dozens, like the conquered Saxons, and get up a Catechism they did not believe in in order, if they went to a Church College, to have their intellectual ability spoiled and come out in the 3rd division. Turning to another important centre of the country's activity and industry—Lancashire and Cheshire—and omitting reference to the Catholic College at Liverpool, he found that there were only two Church of England Colleges available—one at Chester for males, and another at Warrington for females. At the latter there were the same conditions of admission as at Ripon; but neither Warrington nor Chester was as bad as Ripon or York, although both fell below the average. Surely much injustice was done to the activity of this great district; and no one could doubt that the energy which had there done so much for other purposes would produce satisfactory results if applied to the establishment of Training Colleges. Insufficiency of means caused this inefficiency; but he refused to recognize any vested interest in the ignorance of the people of this country. He thought the school boards ought to establish Colleges of their own. The interests of the country ought not to be sacrificed to the requirements of denominations. But he should be met with the usual charge of reckless expenditure. Let him take London as an example. The London School Board educated 270,000 children. There were 3,700 teachers, and would soon be 4,000. More than 300 fresh teachers were required every year. Therefore, they ought to have Colleges accommodating 600 pupils, as the course lasted two years; so that they might be enabled to supply annually 100 fresh masters and 200 fresh mistresses. In the existing Colleges the cost to the subscribers was £17 a-year for each male pupil and £12 for each female. He thought those sums were too small, and would allow £30 for the males and £20 for the females. The total annual cost would even then only be £7,000; and, allowing £3,000 as a sinking fund for the re-payment of capital, £10,000, or a sum less than a rate of one-tenth of 1*d.* in the pound. The Denominational Colleges should no longer be allowed to enjoy the monopoly they had hitherto enjoyed. If something was not done very shortly in that matter, he believed the claim would be raised that they should put an end altogether to that system of utterly irresponsible and private management which neither satisfied the rights of conscience nor gave security for efficient instruction.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he wished, before coming to the terms of the Motion to which he desired to call the attention of the House, to refer briefly to some of the speeches which had been made that night. And, first, as to the proposal of the hon. Baronet the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock), he confessed that he cordially sympathized with it. When he was himself Vice President of the Council, the hon. Baronet brought forward the proposal that natural science should be one of the class subjects in elementary schools; and, although objections were then urged against it by more experienced authorities on education, he had thought the balance of argument was in favour of the proposal. Since then the Vice President of the Council had made alterations in regard to those class subjects, and imposed some limitations to which the hon. Baronet objected; but unless there were very strong administrative reasons to the contrary, he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would give a favourable consideration to the suggestion of the hon. Baronet, and allow teachers and managers fuller option as to the subjects they might teach as class subjects. He had listened to the vehement denunciations of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) against the system of Denominational Colleges. That hon. Member had evidently a strong dislike of anything like denominationalism in connection either with schools or Colleges except in the case of the Roman Catholics. He was curious to know why the hon. Member made that exception, and he supposed it was because a great number of Roman Catholics who took an interest in the Training Colleges resided in Oldham. But, be that as it might, those Colleges had long been established, and they were recognized upon a certain understanding. If it could be shown that they had led to the violation of conscience, or to the imposition of unfair conditions upon candidates for admission, then it would be the duty of the Vice President of the Council to interfere. But he believed that, as a rule, the complaints in that matter came from candidates who had failed in the examinations, and who were, perhaps, naturally inclined to attribute their want of success to some unfairness. If it were true that the present Colleges were not sufficient to meet the growing demand for teachers, the remedy was clear; let them add to the number of Training Colleges. He certainly did not think the country would be of opinion that the Government ought to accede to the proposal of the hon. Member for Oldham, which practically meant the destruction of Colleges which had unquestionably done much to promote elementary education in this country. Adverting to the important Minute of Council, known as the New Education Code, he agreed with the hon. Member for Oldham that all those Codes must necessarily be very technical, and that it was almost impossible to discuss their detail with advantage in that House. There were, however, one or two points among the minuter details of the Code to which he wished to ask the attention of the Vice President of the Council. One of the alterations made in it was, that the number of hours during which pupil teachers might give instruction in the schools was reduced from 30 to 25. No doubt the motive of that change was a humane one—namely, to prevent pupil teachers from being overworked; but it must be remembered that they formed part of the teaching staff in every school, and especially in the rural schools, and that, if that abridgement of the hours was insisted upon, it would disorganize the whole arrangements of the school. He hoped, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman would not be unwilling to reconsider that point. The Resolution which he had purposed putting on the Notice Paper last Friday night if the House had not been counted out was to the effect that the House, while approving of many of the changes made in the Code, was of opinion that the introduction of the new Standard VII., under which children of the middle classes could, up to any age, obtain secondary education in primary schools receiving public money, was contrary to the understanding sanctioned in the Acts relating to elementary education. He had taken substantially the same position in a speech he had made two years ago which had been misunderstood. He admitted it was essential that if we were to maintain our commercial supremacy every facility should be afforded for certain of the children of the artisan class getting education in excess of that described as primary; but we were now going further than that. Of course, all children must start from the same point, and receive primary instruction; but the difference between primary and secondary instruction was considered to be determined by the age at which instruction was expected to cease. Elementary education was supposed to end at 14, and secondary education was supposed to be continued up to 16 or later; and there had been a good deal of legislation on the basis of the difference thus defined. Hitherto the Elementary Code had prescribed six Standards; but now a seventh was added, and whereas hitherto a scholar must be presented in a Standard higher than that in which he had already passed, he might pass more than once in the Seventh Standard. That would give masters and mistresses great inducements to keep children at school as long as possible. He would not in the least object to that if they were bond fide the children of the working classes; but it was clear that this would be the setting up of a system of secondary education, and that middle-class children would chiefly benefit by it. When he was Vice President of the Council he received communications on the subject from Bradford, Sheffield, and Barrow-in-Furness. They expressed a demand for higher elementary education, which he thought might be safely acceded to on certain conditions, and he sanctioned the establishment of a certain number of higher-grade schools at a fee of 9*d.* on certain conditions, which were embodied in the Code of 1880. The two safeguards were that the instruction was not to be continued above the age of 15, and that not more than 10 per cent of the scholars were to pay 9*d.* One school board had proposed to charge 1*s.* or more, and in order to bring the school within the statutory limits of 9*d.* per head to associate with the higher-grade school an infant school with a fee of 1*d.* In the New Code there was no definition of elementary education, so that any subject could be taught; there was no limitation as to the amount of money which might be spent; and there was no definition of the classes who might send their children to the schools. Even a Member of Parliament might send his children to them. He did not object to that so long as it was elementary and not secondary instruction that was given. With payments by results, the system encouraged teachers to prefer intelligent children who could do their home lessons well, pass examinations, and increase the grant earned by the school. One of the difficulties of everyone who had had any personal experience of the administration of the Education Votes was, that if they sanctioned a first-rate school with a low fee in a poor district, because the district was poor, there was the greatest possible inducement on the part of the teachers to try and draw into it children of a higher class than was intended for it. Taking all these things into consideration, it was quite clear that if they were going to set up a system of secondary education along with the primary schools, undoubtedly more and more of the middle class would go there, because they would attain, not primary, but secondary education. He believed that various school boards were setting up these schools. The Endowed Schools' Commission were re-organizing, on certain principles, the various endowments in England, and they were establishing secondary schools; but there was nothing to support such schools except the endowments, and, consequently, it was found necessary to insist on the payment of a fee enormously in advance of the fee paid for elementary education. He had hitherto stated only his own opinions. He frankly admitted that but very little weight might be attached to his opinions, because he had had very little experience in connection with the subject; but the Report on which he based his opinions was a Report made some years ago upon Education in England, which formed the basis of the action of the Endowed Schools and Charity Commissioners, and which furnished Mr. W. E. Forster, the then Vice President of the Council, with many of the arguments he brought forward in support of his Elementary Education Act of 1870. The Noblemen and Gentlemen who sat upon the Commission were Lord Taunton, Dr. Hook, Lord Derby, the Bishop of Exeter, Mr. W. E. Forster, Sir Stafford Northcote, Sir Edward Baines, and Sir Thomas Acland. The Commissioners, in their Report, summed up the whole matter in a few sentences, and placed in an intelligible form the precise difference between secondary and primary education. They said—

“It is found that, viewed in this way, education, as distinct from direct preparation for employment, can at present be classified as that which is to stop at about 14, that which is to stop at about 16, and that which is to continue till 18 or 19; and for convenience we shall call these the 3rd, the 2nd, and the 1st grade of education respectively. The difference in the time assigned makes some difference in the very nature of the education itself. If a boy cannot remain at school beyond the age of 14, it is useless to begin teaching him such subjects as require a longer time for their proper study; if he can continue till 18 or 19, it may be expedient to postpone some studies that would otherwise be commenced early. Both the substance and the arrangement of the instruction will thus greatly depend on the length of time that can be devoted to it."

And this was the conclusion to which the Commissioners arrived—

"It is obvious that these distinctions correspond roughly, but by no means exactly, to the gradations of society. Those who can afford to pay more for their children's education will also, as a general rule, continue that education for a longer time."

If that were so, what followed? Why, that the richer a man was the longer he kept his son at school, and the poorer he was the sooner he had to take him away. The children of the richer classes stopped at school longer than the children of the poorer classes, and if the Government grant was to go to these schools, then it followed that the longer a child was at school the more he got of the public money. Consequently, as the child of the rich man remained longest he received the largest sum, and that was exactly the reverse of the principle on which the grant was given, because the purposes and object for which the grant was originally given were to promote the education of the children who belonged to the humblest classes. [Mr. MUNDELLA: That is not the Act.] He (Lord George Hamilton) admitted that that was not the Act. There was nothing in the Act which made such a declaration; but he maintained that that was the object of the grant. And what must be the inevitable result? He contended that this spurious system of secondary education was detrimental to the elementary or primary education of the mass of the scholars who went to the elementary schools. He was aware that he spoke a little feelingly upon the matter; but he believed it to be one which afforded considerable ground for complaint. Every boy who went into a great public school was put through exactly the same course of classical instruction as if he were going to College, and were to aspire for honours; whereas, as a matter of fact, 19 boys out of 20 did not go to College, but left early, at the age of 17 or 18, in order to seek employment, and seldom obtained a thorough knowledge of Latin and Greek. In other words, their education was sacrificed in order that a few other boys might obtain the classical knowledge necessary to enable them to proceed to the Universities. He thought care ought to be taken that the children of the poorer classes, to whom a general knowledge was absolutely necessary, did not suffer from the efforts that were made to provide secondary instruction, and that all of them were thoroughly grounded in all elementary and more necessary subjects. He had now stated very briefly what were his reasons for calling attention to this important matter, in reference to the present Code. The Vice President, or rather the Lord President, was now raising the limitation in regard to age, and a boy could remain at school up to the age of 21. Certainly that was not the education of the children of the working classes. He did not believe that 100 children, above the age of 15, who were bond fide sons of working men, were in the schools of the Kingdom at the present moment; and if this system of education were suffered to continue, the children who received it would be the children of the middle classes. Who would obtain the prizes and exhibitions? The children of the middle classes, of course. He quite admitted the difficulties in the way of the Vice President in dealing with these graded schools; but if they were sanctioned it would be absolutely necessary to put a limitation of some kind upon them. Could they limit the expenditure? He admitted that it would be unwise to define the character of the children who were to be admitted; but they could lay down a limit in regard to age—that was to say, that no child after a certain age should attend the elementary schools, and if there were exceptionally able children belonging to the working classes, he would be quite ready to consent to a liberal system of exhibitions, or scholarships, by which such children would go on to the second grade or into the purely secondary schools. He could not consider that if the Code passed in its entirety, and there was no such limitation as he had mentioned imposed on the elementary schools or the scholars in England, it would be soon found necessary to legislate in one direction or the other. In Scotland, although the children of all classes attended the parochial schools, yet the practice was for the children to pay a higher fee in proportion to the Standard they attained, and the parents did not object to that. In Ireland there had been an endeavour in the last few years to improve the elementary education by an intermediate system of examination. What he felt was, that if anything was done in order to give facilities for the children in the elementary schools to obtain an education in excess of that which it was anticipated at the time the Education Acts were passed they would demand, he thought they ought to seek to bring forward some scheme that would be a little more uniform, and would not have the disadvantage of allowing one Department to compete with another. At the present moment they had the Charity Commissioners on one side of Whitehall, and the Education Department on the other, with schemes of education absolutely incompatible with one another. There could be very little doubt that if the Education Department were to succeed, and this Code were to become law, it would altogether kill the secondary schools established by the Endowed Schools Commissioners. He said, then, that whatever they did, let them do it openly; and he wished to warn the House against giving its assent to the passing of this Code without a protest, because, if it did so, it would be sanctioning, by a side-wind, a spurious system of secondary education. The proposed system, certainly, did seem to abolish all distinction which previously existed between primary and secondary education, by increasing the age and altering the bye-laws on which the schools now rested. He contended that the children who would suffer most from this spurious system of secondary education were the children of the working classes, for whom the existing system of education was mainly intended. He therefore said to the Government—Do one of two things. If you change the Code so much, bring in a Bill to put under Parliamentary control, not only the higher grade of elementary schools, but all the secondary schools now promoted by the Endowed Schools Commissioners. On the other hand, if they did not propose to go that length, and did not think that the time had arrived when secondary education should be promoted by money from the State, they would have no alternative but to come to the conclusion at which he had arrived, and accept this spurious system of education imposing some limit on the money grant, the subjects taught, or on the age of the children who attended the schools.

MR. MUNDILLA: If I do not answer all the speeches which have been made at the length I should if I had had the opportunity of answering them earlier, I hope, looking at the hour of the night (12.15), I shall not be thought disrespectful to any Member of the House. My hon. Friend the Member for the University of London (Sir John Lubbock) complains that we have not given sufficient freedom for science, and he is anxious for several things in reference thereto. His Resolution says—

“That it is desirable to allow School Boards and Committees to present children for examination in any of the recognized class subjects.”

Now, Sir, the whole of the evidence and the whole of the experience of the Education Department is that that is really impossible, considering the short school-life of the great majority of English children, to encourage children who leave the schools when they pass the Fourth Standard that they are not only to be acquainted with reading, writing, and arithmetic, but that they must also read history, and must attain English elementary science and geography as class subjects. That is more than can possibly be put on children who leave school when they have passed the Fourth Standard. A great number of our children having passed the Fourth Standard go out to labour at as early as 10 years of age, especially in the agricultural districts. Out of 14,000 there are 9,000 who go out after having passed the Fourth Standard, and I would ask anyone who has examined the question, whether it is possible, within the short school-life of those who have reached the Fourth Standard, to crowd all these subjects upon a child, and have them all equally well taught? The whole object of our Code is thoroughness. We want to secure that what is done is done well, that the children who only have reading, writing, and arithmetic shall attain—the girls needlework, and the boys English, with a knowledge of geography; and that they shall have a good acquaintance with them all. The experience of all of our best Inspectors is that any attempt to force more upon them is to dissipate their energies, confuse their minds, and leave them in the end ill-educated. If the House will only give to us what

Lord George Hamilton

Germany does, and what France has this morning given—namely, the power to keep the children at school up to a definite age, and not to allow a child to leave until he has reached 13 or 14 years of age, then we say—"You may teach such children the whole of these subjects; but, as long as they can in any way pass from the school, and, under bye-laws, go out to work at 10 years of age, it is impossible to exact from them all that you are attempting to obtain." Under pressure from my hon. Friend, I placed certain specific subjects in the Fourth Standard, and I pledged myself to the House that I would thoroughly investigate the question of science-teaching in the case of children who reached that Standard, and satisfy myself whether it would be possible to teach specific subjects properly in the Fourth Standard. And I said if I found I could not do so I would advance a Standard, and put those subjects in the Fifth. But I am bound to say that the result of our observations is, that to attempt to make children physiologists and political economists before they are 10 years of age is attempting too much. A system that aims at that results in mere cram, and under such a system the whole Standard-work is neglected, while the child's mind, so far from its being enlarged, is deteriorated. My hon. Friend refers to the case of Liverpool, and he says that the effect of the Code, as it stands, will be to cut off something like one-half or three-fifths of the science-teaching in that town, that is to say, with regard to children who have not passed the Fourth Standard. But, Sir, we have allowed what is, in fact, a large measure of science-teaching in addition to the Standard-work, and that is a point which my hon. Friend has apparently overlooked. We have made geography one of the class subjects, two of which can be taken up; and my hon. Friend complains that only two of the subjects named—English geography, and elementary science and history—can be taken up. Let us suppose that English, and one other class subject—say, geography—are taken up. Although we have simplified the subject of geography, we have included in that branch physical and political geography; and it no longer means something to be learned by rote, such as a number of names on the map—it is something to be done by means of reading books and oral lessons, illustrated, so far as possible, by maps, diagrams, specimens, and simple experiments; and the result is that a large amount of science-teaching is associated with physical and political geography, which are included in the 2nd and 3rd classes. The plan of instruction may, therefore, be so varied and worked as to include a large amount of what is really good and suitable in elementary science. I am well aware that science has been most successfully taught in the Liverpool schools. Liverpool has had rare advantages in this respect. It possesses one of the best and most public-spirited School Boards in England. In its schools, however, science is not taught by the ordinary teachers—it is specially taught, and a special Science Demonstrator is employed by the Liverpool School Board, with the successful result which I have alluded to. But if you were to engage the ordinary teacher to take this subject, he would most probably fail in all his work. Therefore, I think it is better to limit the teacher to two of the class subjects named in the Schedule, and that one of these should be English. I believe that a knowledge of our language imparted by the reading of standard English poetry and prose is of more value to the child than any other teaching which can be given to him. In this branch the main portion of the child's time would not, as my hon. Friend supposes, be devoted to grammar. English, in the sense used in the Code, does not mean the teachings of Lindley Murray, of which, I have no doubt, many hon. Gentlemen have a horror. It is a different thing altogether, and our arrangement is one that cannot fail to be most instructive to the child. Then, again, what can be better than to cultivate the imagination of children by imparting a knowledge of good poetry at the time of life when their memory is most capable of retaining imaginative impressions? On the whole, we considered that we could not do better than insist upon English in the First Standard. My own predilections are favourable to freedom, and I have endeavoured to carry out that principle in the Code. I shall give this subject further consideration, and will submit the question to the Council of Her Majesty's Inspectors and the able men who have assisted in framing this Code; and, if it be possible, I shall be only too happy to yield to what seems to be a general wish. The noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) has asked me whether there would be further opportunities for discussion? Sir, I regret that this opportunity has been spent in almost anything but discussion of the Code. That, however, has not been my fault, or the fault of the Government. This is not a time for requests and supplications to hon. Members to set aside their Motions in order to meet the wishes of other hon. Members, and I can only again express my regret that there has not been a better opportunity for discussion on the present occasion. But the noble Lords opposite, who have had so much experience in this matter, and who know all the bearings of the question, and who have faced all the difficulties which I myself have encountered, have, I think, expressed everything which, to their minds, appears in the nature of a shortcoming in the Code. Now, I believe that whatever may be the other merits of the Code, it has at least the merit of simplicity. For the first time we have a Code without cross-references, without foot-notes, and which anybody can understand. The credit of this is not due to me, but to the permanent officials in the Department, who deserve all the credit the House can give them. The next point which the noble Lord called attention to was that the Code gave enormous powers to the Inspectors. This is quite true; but in this respect the present Code is the same as its predecessors. Every School Board Code that has been issued gives enormous powers to the Inspectors; and I do not think, on the whole, that, except with regard to the merit grant, the Code gives larger powers than any which has preceded it. We were bound to secure fairness, and some approximation to uniformity of tests applied by Inspectors—a thing which at the establishment of our educational system was much easier than it is now, because formerly there were only some 20 Inspectors, whereas at the present time there are between 110 and 120. The noble Lord must be aware that there has been a great deal of heart-burning at the different tests applied by Inspectors; but we believe we shall be able to get rid of these difficulties by the system we have organized, which places the whole supervision in the hands of a small number of Inspectors. The noble Lord has expressed some regret at the issue of the Circular which places some restrictions on the criticisms of Inspectors with regard to the Code which they have to administer. But the Circular in question is not a new one, and I find it was in use when the noble Lord himself was in Office. It is, I believe, simply a reprint of a form which has been in use for many years. The noble Lord has given us the opinion of Mr. Hart, the clerk to the Liverpool School Board, who has expressed his fear that the effect of the regulation of the grant by the percentage of passes would be, in the case of some schools, that the masters would purge them of the backward scholars at examination time, in order to obtain a higher percentage of passes. No doubt, all schools are exposed to some acts of this kind; but it would be the duty of the Inspectors to see that the registers had not been cleared of the backward scholars, and if, on examination, it was found that children were absent without sufficient reason—in other words, if we discovered that any schoolmaster had turned out the dunces for the purpose of obtaining a higher percentage, I think it would be right to treat the act as a fraud, and to deprive that schoolmaster of his certificate. I do not think it very likely that such a practice will be resorted to; nevertheless, it is a matter we have not overlooked, and measures will be provided to deal with it. The noble Lord has also expressed regret that a change has been made in the matter of honour certificates. But as a matter of fact, it has been found that the system of honour certificates as given by the Department, did not always produce the best results, and we think that better results may be looked for from a system of honour certificates administered by the local authorities. We think that more encouragement to diligence is afforded to a child by the possession of a parchment testimonial, which can be taken away, framed, and hung up at home than by any intangible proof of merit. With regard to the objection by the noble Lord to the omission of a definition of discipline from the Code, I must remind him that this is hardly a subject which can be dealt with in the Code. It is a matter for the Inspector and the principles referred to in the definition read by the noble Lord are, of course, expected to be enforced in every school. With regard to the apprehension expressed by him, that the extra grants to rural schools would be diminished, I can assure him that there is not the smallest intention of any such reduction. The object of the change in relation to these grants is to prevent large schools in small districts which are fed by neighbouring parishes, from getting extra grants. The noble Lord has referred to the need of impressing upon School Boards and Attendance Committees their duties with respect to the regular attendance of the children, and has also recommended the disestablishment of two or three Committees in case of their failure to enforce regular attendance. Perhaps the noble Lord will be surprised to hear that I have already done this, in some instances with very excellent results. In one district, where the attendance was very bad, we found that the chairman of the Attendance Committee was a large employer of children, who were kept at work contrary to the Act. In this case—the action of the chairman being supported by his brother committeemen—we simply dissolved the Committee and insisted upon the appointment of a new one, with the result that the school attendance nearly doubled. The whole success of this Code turns upon the School Attendance Officers doing their duty; and I can assure hon. Members that the statement of the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Lyulph Stanley) is not at all exaggerated when he says that some of the magistrates in the country believe that they are doing parents a kindness in not enforcing the attendance of children at school. We have many appeals from poor men to allow their children to escape from what they believe to be the hardship of the Act; but it must be borne in mind that the hardship is not in compelling the attendance of the children at school, but in the fact that unless they pass the requisite Standards they cannot obtain certificates. Magistrates, therefore, do a most cruel thing in not enforcing the attendance of children at school during their early years. I will do my best to insist on local Attendance Committees doing their duty; and I wish I could do something with regard to the Summary Jurisdiction Act, which is a matter of much greater difficulty. Now I come to the very important point raised in the able speech of the hon. Member for Oldham. Nobody could have presented the case to the House with greater force, and yet I cannot agree with the proposition the hon. Member has made. I say at once that we should never have succeeded as well as we have done in enforcing compulsion in England if we had not enlisted all the forces at our command—religious and other bodies. We have 2,000,000 children in the Church schools. Why are they in the Church schools? Because the Church is willing to pay £500,000 or £600,000 a-year to give those children definite religious instruction in the principles of the Church. But how can she do this if the teachers are not trained in these principles? I cannot see how we can insist on sending teachers to Training Colleges which are founded on distinct conditions—which are the subject of special trusts, and have received money for special trusts. We cannot ask them to admit persons of all faiths and creeds, or of no faith or creed, into the family life of those Colleges—and it must be remembered that, after all, it is a family life. I have visited several of these Colleges, and what do I find? In Liverpool there is a Catholic Training College for women, excellently conducted, but practically of conventual life? How can you insist on persons of all creeds being admitted there? I want to know how we can carry out compulsion in England if the Catholics are not to be allowed to teach religious principles in their own schools? In towns like Liverpool, where you have 200,000 or 250,000 Roman Catholics, and like Manchester, Sheffield, and other great towns, it would be impossible to force children into the schools unless you had all the assistance which the religious denominations can give you for that purpose. My hon. Friend says we can trust to the day schools, and why not to the Training Colleges? But day schools and Training Colleges are not on all fours. In regard to the day schools, parents give religious instruction to the children, and can take them to their own church or chapel on Sundays; but what can be done in Training Colleges? There you may have 100 or 200 young women living a life in common, and joining in prayers in common; and how can you possibly separate the various religious faiths of those people? I must say I cannot see my way out of this difficulty, except by one method—and there I meet my hon. Friend. Any person who is a fit subject to enter an undenominational College, and desires to enter it, ought to have the right to receive that training. To that extent I am entirely with my hon. Friend, and I will endeavour to secure it; but if my hon. Friend says that will not meet his case, and what he insists on is that we shall break down the denominational principle in these Colleges, then I say you must first change your Act of Parliament, and break down the denominational principle in your schools. The Training Colleges are a necessary corollary of your denominational schools. Let us take the case as it stands. There are about 2,000,000 children taught in denominational schools, to educate whom the various Denominations spend about £750,000 a-year. Why do they do this? In order to give them religious instruction. Then we have the Training Colleges, on which the Church of England has spent £271,000; the Roman Catholics, £66,000; the Wesleyans, £68,000; the British and Foreign Society, £80,000; and the Congregationalists, £30,000; making altogether nearly £520,000, in addition to the Government grant of £114,000. Then let us take the annual income. The total cost of maintenance is about £149,000 a-year. Of this, £109,000 is the Government grant, and the remaining £40,000 is made up of £23,000 in voluntary subscriptions, and £16,000 or £17,000 in rates. The Board schools have 30 per cent of the children on the register; 30·4 per cent of the certificated teachers; 31 per cent of the pupil teachers; 24 per cent of the pupil teachers were admitted into the Training Colleges as students in 1881 from Board schools. In the Church of England Colleges alone about 19 per cent were from Board schools, and 17 per cent of the females and 20 per cent of the males in the Wesleyan Colleges were also from Board schools. It cannot, then, be denied that the teachers employed in the Board schools are of all religious denominations. Many of them—probably as large a proportion of them as of the people generally—are members of the Church of England, many are Wesleyans, many Congregationalists, and many of other denominations. Why, then, is the case so unfair as my hon. Friend seems to suppose? All I can say is, that men whom I believe to be thoroughly impartial, and who have investigated the matter with the greatest thoroughness, assure me that there is no practical injustice. However, there are two or three undenominational Colleges under the consideration of the Education Department. Further, I should be glad if I could see my way to establishing day Training Colleges in London. That, I think, would meet the whole case. I think the Church Colleges, and all the other denominational Colleges do very wisely to provide a conscience clause for day students. But my hon. Friend is not content with that, and says it must be outside the existing Colleges. I think that is pushing the matter to an extreme; for if there is room inside, I do not see any necessity for going outside. I stand up as strongly as my hon. Friend for the rights of conscience, and I should resent as strongly as he would the violation of the conscience of any pupil teacher. I will do my best to secure that every pupil teacher who desires undenominational training shall have it; but, at the same time, I cannot say that I would be a party to any attempt to destroy the religious teaching in these Training Colleges. I was sorry to hear what my hon. Friend said about the rudeness, coarseness, and absence of refinement in these Training Colleges. The last Report I have on the Colleges says the Inspector cannot speak too highly of the morale and general tone of the whole body of students. He says the arrangements are excellent, and that efforts are made in every direction to refine and cultivate the taste, and enlarge the ideas of the teachers; and I am sure, when that Report reaches the hands of my hon. Friend, he will find it in striking contrast with his remarks. Just one word more. I have two letters—one from the Principal of one of the British and Foreign Society's Schools, the other from the Principal of the College at Bangor—saying they hardly know how to place the teachers; that there are too many in the market; and that there is no necessity for any more Training Colleges for the middle students. Now I approach the remarks of the noble Lord (Lord George Hamilton), my Predecessor in the Office I now hold. The noble Lord first raised the question of the hours of work for pupil teachers; and I will tell him what decided me in reducing these hours. Since I have been in the Education Department, I have received frequent representations from the pupil teachers, especially the females, as to their breaking down through extreme stress of work; and I have proof positive from clergymen and medical men of the pupil teachers being shamefully overworked. I have a Memorial from the Liverpool Council of Education praying me to take some steps to reduce the hours. In January, I had an opportunity of going to Liverpool, and I visited the whole of the Training Centres there. There are three or more of them, assisted by the Lady Superintendents. I examined the female pupil teachers as to their hours of work, and I found numbers of those young women working from 7 or 8 in the morning till 10 and 11 at night—week in, week out. The representations made to me were that it was most distressing to see how they lost their health and tone, and became nervous and dyspeptic, through the overwork. I laid the matter before the Council and the whole of the senior Inspectors, every one of whom agreed that a change was desirable; and everyone since appealed to said the same thing—that, if the senior teachers will so arrange their time-tables that at certain hours these pupil teachers may get relief, the necessary relaxation can be provided. However, I am as anxious as the noble Lord that we should not derange the organization of the schools, and the matter shall have my most serious consideration, and no mischief shall result. No mischief can result, because the arrangement does not affect the existing contracts. By the existing contracts the teachers are bound to work 30 hours a-week, so that at present no harm can arise, and it will only be the future teachers who will be affected. The final point raised by the noble Lord, and the most important one probably to the House, is that we are trenching on the domain of middle-class instruction. I assure the noble Lord that he has been fighting a shadow, a ghost, or a monster of his own creation. What are the facts? The noble Lord said that we allowed children when they had passed the Sixth Standard to be considered as

“ex-6,” and to go on year after year taking three specific subjects, and, as the result, taking up what an Inspector to-day called “fads,” and not solid instruction—this and that of the specific subjects requiring the concentrated attention of the master to manage these few advanced and, probably, clever boys. But the Code of the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) and the noble Lord the Member for Middlesex (Lord George Hamilton) allowed these “ex-6” boys to be presented again and again till they were 18 years of age, if they chose to be presented. [LORD GEORGE HAMILTON: I put the limit at 15.] The noble Lord put a limit on the 15th year; but let us settle one thing at once. First, as to the curriculum. Is it better that boys who have passed the Sixth Standard in reading, writing, and arithmetic, should get no more instruction, no continuous and regular instruction in plain, good work, which could go on year after year—taking, say, a language and two science subjects, and two class subjects—and draw the full grant; or that, having passed the Sixth Standard, they should do something better in reading, writing, and arithmetic, and so raise the whole tone of the ordinary work of the school? That is all round education; the other is incomplete education; and that was the sole reason for introducing the Seventh Standard. I have the authority of all the best Inspectors for this. I have received hundreds of Memorials in its favour; and the first protest I have heard against it is that by the noble Lord, who thinks he sees an attempt to bring in middle-class education by a side-wind. I assure the noble Lord that that was the very last thing intended. What we want is that the clever boys shall not be driven out of the schools. Every year children are passing at an earlier age. Last year the noble Lord will find, by the Returns, that 150 children passed the Fifth Standard before they were 10 years of age; and some of them also passed the Sixth Standard. What are we going to do with them? They will be “ex-6” at 10 years of age. Can you turn them out of school? Are they to go on to 14, and have no continuous instruction? Are they not improving the whole tone of the reading, writing, and arithmetic, for the benefit of the whole of the children? That is the sole object of the Seventh Standard, and I am satisfied that the noble Lord will, on inquiry, find that I am right. But I will grant him one point—namely, that the limitation of age is well worthy of consideration. We simply adopt 18, because there are no children who stop till 18, except poor cripples or children who have been injured in early life, or have suffered long illness. We thought it unnecessary to continue that age any longer, and that misled the ordinary reader of the Code. But as for this year, children can only be paid on passing the Seventh Standard, and, as all the children who are now “ex-6” must pass the Seventh Standard, no harm can happen this year; and I will take care, before the Code is laid on the Table again, that there shall be a limitation of ages to prevent such a possibility as the noble Lord points out. The noble Lord himself created the very schools in which the clever boys are found; I have not had to certify for one; and it is rather hard that he should reproach me for giving this higher education of which he is himself, practically, the author. There are the Bradford School and the Sheffield School; they are the creation of the noble Lord, and they are doing excellent work; and in many instances the children are maintained from 12 to 16 years of age. How? The noble Lord visited the school at Sheffield, and he put forward a particular child, and then said—“This will not do.” What was the case? The child had won a scholarship of £10 a-year given by the manufacturers in the town. The child was the son of a poor woman who earned a living by mangling. She was paid £10 a-year to allow the child to continue at the school, and he is the most promising scholar in the school. I hope I have now said enough to satisfy the noble Lord, and to allay the fears of hon. Members who think that we are going to establish, under the pretext of secondary education, a system of middle-class education. That is the last thing we desire. I am afraid I have wasted my own time and the time of the House; but it was necessary to say this much to satisfy the House. I hope I have met, as far as I can, the wishes of the hon. Members who have addressed the House; and that, even late as it is, the House will allow me to make my Statement and to take my Vote.

Mr. Mundella

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, he thought this was one of the most inconvenient debates that the House had ever been called upon to take part in. Having had a desultory discussion for some hours on a subject brought forward by the Government—the Army Bill—and after a long and desultory discussion, the right hon. Gentleman now asked the House to allow the Speaker to leave the Chair at 1 o'clock in the morning in order that he might make his Statement on the Education Estimates. He never had been an Obstructionist, and did not wish to be; but he thought, if ever there was a case for insisting upon delay, it was this. Of course, he might have to give way; but he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would himself give way, and allow hon. Gentlemen an opportunity of considering the Statement, and would promise that, on the Report of the Education Vote, there should be an opportunity for the discussion which could not be taken to-night—

MR. MUNDELLA: I have no command of the time of the House.

MR. J. G. TALBOT said, the points he wished chiefly to impress upon the right hon. Gentleman were—first, the conditions under which the Inspectors were to act under the New Code. He thought that the right hon. Gentleman had sought to minimize the effect of the new alterations, and that his statements were unintentionally misleading, and would lead the House and the country to imagine that Inspectors would have no more influence on the ultimate grant in aid of education than they had previously had. But upon this he wished to point out that, with regard to the merit grants, the schools were to be considered excellent, good, or fair. If they were excellent, they received 3s.; if good, 2s.; if fair, 1s.—all on the average attendance. The case was stronger as to infant schools, which received 6s. for excellent, 4s. for good, and 2s. for fair. All that was to depend entirely upon the individual judgment of the Inspector. A few days ago he had put a question to the right hon. Gentleman, whose answer was, to some extent, satisfactory—namely, that he hoped to organize some system of appeal to the head Inspectors, in order to mitigate, in some degree, the extreme discretion given to the Inspectors. It was, however, a question of extreme importance whether, unless instructions to Inspectors were most specific, the schools which did the hard work of teaching the poor children in large towns and in the remote rural districts would not be injured by this extreme discretion. This license to Inspectors was given now for the first time. The right hon. Gentleman, in his natural anxiety to commend his work to the House, had rather misled the House by pressing upon them the necessity for this discretion being given to Inspectors. Then the right hon. Gentleman had gone out of his way, in kindness of heart, to make alterations in regard to pupil teachers. But kindness to one person might be cruelty to another; and there was such a thing as apparent kindness to pupil teachers which would inflict hardship upon the other teachers. Upon the question of reducing the hours of work, a body of school managers and teachers, meeting in Oxford, and having, unfortunately, no Member of their own for that City, had adopted the following resolution:—

"That serious inconvenience and embarrassment would be caused to managers and teachers by the proposed rule to restrict the employment of pupil teachers to 25, instead of 30, hours a-week, as at present. In support of this resolution it is submitted:—I. That the proposed change would be injurious to the order and discipline in the school. II. That in some schools, particularly in rural districts, it would be all but impossible for the head teacher to carry on the work of the school during the occasional absence of a pupil teacher, who may happen to be his sole assistant. III. That it would tend to the withdrawal of pupil teachers from the hour of religious instruction, as a convenient plan of reducing the time of their service to the 25 hours. IV. That there is great danger that the inconvenience resulting from the change would lead to a serious diminution in the number of the pupil teachers employed. V. That the reduction of the hours of employment in school is not the most desirable way of giving relief to pupil teachers, even supposing it to be a fact that they are in any cases suffering from an excessive strain."

Some weight ought to be given to the representations of these school managers, and the House should be very careful lest, in attempting to do an act of kindness to the pupil teachers, they were injuring the other teachers. The right hon. Gentleman had rightly remarked upon the strain put upon the pupil teachers; and if he (Mr. J. G. Talbot) had his way, he would agree with the hon. Baronet (Sir John Lubbock) as to preferring specific subjects, and in the case of almost all the pupil teachers, except the most advanced, he would not require them to be instructed in out-of-the-way subjects, and so diminish the strain put upon them by cramming into their minds all kinds of subjects, which were neither profitable to them nor necessary for them to teach.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER said, the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella) alluded to many subjects connected with the Code; but they had been mostly subjects relating to schools in large towns. He, being connected with rural populations and immediately connected with rural schools, wished to point out one or two facts which he thought ought to be brought before the attention of the House. The people in rural districts were most anxious that education should be promoted in every possible way; but, having himself been for many years a trustee of a national school and chairman of a Board of Guardians under whose superintendence the school education had been placed, he wished to express his hope that over-education would not be produced among the rural classes. He maintained that for the rural classes the rudiments of education were quite sufficient, and it was a great mistake to over-educate them. Let them have instruction in reading, writing, and arithmetic; but do not let their minds be crammed with other matters, which would not be of any use to them in their future walk of life. With regard to the question of the magistrates, who, the right hon. Gentleman had said, did not support the Committees in enforcing attendance, he wished to remind the right hon. Gentleman that the magistrates were placed in a very difficult position. The Attendance Officers were supposed to bring cases before the magistrates, and to require the attendance of the children's parents; but there was a certain laxity in the law at present, and he hoped the right hon. Gentleman would do his best to alter the law in such a way as to provide better punishment for persons who did not send their children to school. At the present time, if a parent was brought before a magistrate for the non-attendance of his child, a fine of 5s. could be enforced; but if that 5s. was not paid at the time, the law provided a very round-about way of enforcing that payment—namely, by a distress warrant, which increased the cost to the parent. He would urge on the Vice President of the Council that he should devise some means of imposing on a parent who did not pay the fines a certain term of imprisonment, say, seven or ten days. He urged this, because it was known amongst the people generally that there was this laxity in the law, and the magistrates were, in consequence, placed in a very unfortunate and very unpleasant position. If this alteration could be made, those who were members of school boards, and trustees of schools and Chairmen of Guardians, would use their best efforts to carry out the Code which was now proposed.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he thought the managers in small rural districts and poor suburban districts would feel great anxiety under the new proposal. He had had some experience of these small schools, and he thought the effect of this Code would be to increase the ordinary expenditure, decrease the Government grant, and throw a great many of the voluntary schools into the hands of the school boards. There were at least 30 per cent of these small schools in the country, with an aggregate attendance of 60 children. What would be the effect of this Code upon them? The Code changed the whole system. The basis of the grant was to be the average attendance of the whole year, instead of 250 attendances as before; and that, he thought, would be very detrimental to the small schools, because, though in towns there was no difficulty in the way of children attending schools, in the country, where distances were long and roads often bad, it was frequently impossible for the small children to attend. He had seen some of them coming two miles in the wet, and had known them remain four and five hours in their damp clothes, and without any refreshment. Under such circumstances as these, it was cruel for parents to send their children. Well, as to the other point—namely, the maximum they were going to give for the “three R’s,” they had reduced it from 9s. to 8s. 4d., whilst for class subjects they were giving the opportunity of obtaining 12s.; but small rural schools would not earn a farthing for these special subjects.

Sir Henry Fletcher

MR. MUNDELLA said, that, as against that, there was the 4s. 6d.

SIR MASSEY LOPES said, he was aware of that; but he was going to point out that, in increasing the amount from 4s. to 4s. 6d., the right hon. Gentleman had imposed new conditions which would render it impossible for small schools to avail themselves of the increased grant. There was one other grant—that in regard to music—which had not been touched on. They were giving 1s. per child for music; but that was to be curtailed by 6d., unless the children were taught by note or by some regular system. He maintained that it was impossible for children in rural districts to learn by note, for the reason that they would never be able to secure the necessary instruction. The right hon. Gentleman had told them that there was also a merit grant; but that grant was entirely at the discretion of the Inspectors. He wished to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that, in his opinion, the key to this Code was in his (Mr. Mundella’s) pocket at the present moment, because he had not given them the instructions he was going to issue to the Inspectors. The right hon. Gentleman had promised that these instructions should be placed upon the Table; but they were not yet completed. Until, however, they were presented to the House, hon. Members would not know what the effect of the Code was to be. He would like the right hon. Gentleman to tell them whether the same standard of intelligence and attainments was to be applied to the small rural schools as was applied to the large schools in towns? In forming an opinion as to whether these schools were good or bad, were the same rules to be applied to one class as to the other? If so, a considerable grievance would be created. What he (Sir Massey Lopes) urged was this—that the whole of the Code depended upon the instructions they were going to give to the Inspectors. There was another complaint he had to make—and the subject of it had been already alluded to. It was, that they were really by this Code going to give what he called “secondary education,” instead of that education which it was the sole object and intention of the Education Act to impart. They were not only undertaking to give primary education to the lower classes, but they were undertaking to give an advanced education to the middle classes. That was a grievance which many conceived to be a great one. They did not object to paying their rates for elementary education; but they said the Government were now not only imposing burdens on ratepayers for purposes which were never contemplated when the Act was passed, but they were also taking a Parliamentary grant, and using it for purposes for which it was never intended. He would not, at that hour of the night, any longer detain the House; but what he wanted to impress upon hon. Members was, that to small schools in rural places this Code would be a very serious thing, and would affect them very disadvantageously. It would be found for good schools a very good Code; but for indifferent—or what an hon. Gentleman had called “less satisfactory,” schools, it would take from them the very means they required for improvement. In the Code the Government were making no allowance for special circumstances and difficulties, and for what he would call the inequality of conditions in the different examinations.

—DR. CANILLA—THE PAPERS.

OBSERVATIONS.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, he wished to call the attention of the House to what appeared to him to be a breach of good faith on the part of the Government. He was obliged to bring the subject on at that late hour (1.30 A.M.) and he was sorry to be obliged to do so in the absence of the Prime Minister, of whom he had asked a Question earlier in the Sitting. They had Ministers of consequence in the House early in the day; but late at night only Ministers of less consequence remained, and it was sometimes a misfortune to hon. Members that they could not address themselves to all the Ministers. He was about to mention a breach of faith on the part of the Colonial Office; and if he did not obtain an answer he should renew it tomorrow, and whenever it might be open to him to do so. Before the 9th March he had brought before the House a question concerning Gibraltar. He had asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies whether there would be any objection, on the 9th of March, to lay Papers on the Table relating to the appointment of the Vicar Apostolic of Gibraltar, and the hon. Gentleman had informed him that there would be no objection. The next day, after the hon. Gentleman had arranged with him that he should put down a Motion for an unopposed Return of these Papers, the hon. Gentleman came to him and asked him to withdraw his Motion on the understanding that the Papers would be presented to both Houses of Parliament. He waited until the 17th of March, when he again asked the hon. Gentleman a Question on the subject, and the answer he received from him was that the Papers were already on the Table of the House. He (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) was certain the hon. Gentleman would not, knowingly, have made a mis-statement; but what had taken place showed an enormous administrative carelessness on the part of the hon. Member, inasmuch as he was the Minister who ought to have placed the Papers on the Table, and they had not been handed in up to the present moment. On the 24th March the hon. Member for Hertford, on his behalf, asked the Under Secretary for the Colonies when the Papers, which he had been told were laid on the Table on the 17th, would be presented; and the hon. Gentleman replied that he had been promised proofs on the following day—the 25th—and would then present them to the House, if no unforeseen circumstances occurred to prevent him. Another week passed, and on Friday last a noble Lord asked a Question of the Secretary of State for the Colonies (the Earl of Kimberley) in the other House, the reply being that these Papers would not be laid on the Table until after Easter. There were particular reasons why these Papers should be presented; but he would not detain the House by explaining them. He would merely say that he believed acts of great illegality had occurred at Gibraltar. At the present moment British subjects were imprisoned on accusations brought against them before a military magistrate. They had been condemned, and were not allowed to appeal; and it was for this reason, he believed, the Government dared not produce these Papers. But there was something more. It was perfectly well known that the action of the Government at Gibraltar had been taken at the dictation of the Vatican, and that this subject had an intimate connection with the negotiations between Mr. Errington and the Pope. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but it was, nevertheless, the fact. If he was to be interrupted in this way he should move the adjournment of the debate, and bring the subject on again to-morrow. What had been done was part of the arrangement with the Vatican for the appointment of Archbishop M'Cabe to the rank of Cardinal. That, he believed, was beyond a doubt. The Under Secretary for the Colonies (Mr. Courtney) chose to laugh at what he (Sir H. Drummond Wolff) said; but before he did that he ought to learn to keep his word.

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order. To say that an hon. Member has not kept his word is an expression hardly befitting an hon. Member.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF said, that if he had used an improper expression he would withdraw it, and express regret for having used it. The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Courtney) chose to treat with contempt statements made on the Opposition side of the House, and considered himself entitled to make allegations which were not borne out by facts. He wished to ask the hon. Gentleman whether it was the intention of the Government to lay these Papers for which he asked on the Table? If it was not, he should have to bring the matter forward again to-morrow.

MR. COURTNEY said, he quite allowed that the hon. Member, at 5 o'clock that afternoon, had considerable ground for complaint; but at 1 o'clock in the morning he could not be said to have the same ground for complaint, because a letter explaining the delay which had occurred in the publication of the Papers, which letter was in the House at 5 o'clock, but, unfortunately, had not been delivered, had since been received by the hon. Member. For his own part, he was as much annoyed as the hon. Member could be at the delay which had occurred in the printing of the Papers in question, and he still hoped that they would be on the Table on Tuesday. With regard to the suggestion that the matter to which the hon. Member referred was connected with Archbishop M'Cabe's Cardinal hat and Mr. Errington's visit to Rome, it might just as reasonably have been connected with the transit of Venus.

Sir H. Drummond Wolff

SIR MICHAEL HICKS-BEACH said, he really did not know whether the hon. Member had any ground for his opinion that there was some connection between Mr. Errington's visit to Rome and the proceedings at Gibraltar. But, whether he had or not, it was quite time that some official information of what had occurred should be furnished to the House. He understood the hon. Member to say that before the 9th of March the Under Secretary for the Colonies had promised him these Papers as an unopposed Return, and that on the 17th he had told the hon. Member that they were already on the Table of the House. He (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach) certainly thought it did not speak well for the arrangements in the Colonial Office that, in spite of those statements, the Papers should not have been laid on the Table by this time, and that it should be impossible to say that they would be delivered on Tuesday. The hon. Member had a Notice of Motion down for an early day after the Recess, and it was obviously essential that he should be in possession of these Papers before he brought on the discussion. He trusted, whether or not the Papers were presented to the other House, that there would be no delay in presenting them to this House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR said, it appeared that the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies had not carried out a promise he had given. He had first promised to lay certain Papers on the Table, had afterwards declared that they had been laid on the Table, and it now turned out that they had not been presented at all, and were not likely to be until after Easter. The Under Secretary had just stated that he had written a letter to the hon. Member which ought to have appeased his indignation at the non-laying of the Papers on the Table. Well, the hon. Member had shown him (Mr. A. J. Balfour) the letter, and he was bound to say there was no more explanation in it than there was in the speech they had just listened to from the Under Secretary. The letter, written by the Private Secretary to the Under Secretary, merely said that the hon. Gentleman "was sorry he could give no other answer than that which was given on Friday by the Earl of Kimberley"—that was to say, that the Papers would not be laid on the Table until after Easter. If the indignation of the hon. Member was justified at 5 o'clock, his indignation was not likely to be allayed by the receipt of that letter.

GENERAL SUPERINTENDENT OF

OBSERVATIONS.

VISCOUNT EMLYN wished to ask the indulgence of the House whilst he called attention to a matter arising out of a Question put to the President of the Local Government Board to-day. He did not wish to allude to the Bill of the right hon. Gentleman which was down on the Paper; but he desired to draw attention to the action of the Government at the present time apart from that measure. Under an Act of Parliament—the 7 & 8 Vict.—the Government had power—or were, he thought, obliged—to appoint a General Superintendent for turnpike roads in South Wales; and his contention was that under the provisions of that Act the Government were compelled to make such an appointment, and that until the Act, or a section of it, was repealed, they could not remove a General Superintendent from his office unless they appointed someone else to act in his place. The right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board had informed him to-day—though rather vaguely—in reply to a Question, that the General Superintendent's Office had ceased to exist, that the gentleman was no longer continued in his office. He (Viscount Emllyn) would read the section of the Act of Parliament upon which he founded his Question; and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman to take the opinion of the Law Officers of the Crown upon it, and see whether his contention was correct, and, if it was, to appoint someone to carry out the duties which now no one could properly carry out, the Government not having given the county power to appoint anyone in the place of the Superintendent. The section to which he referred of the 7 & 8 Vict., c. 91, said—

“It shall be lawful for one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State, in any writing under his hand, to appoint a fit and proper person, or two fit and proper persons if required, to superintend the management, maintenance, and repairs of all the turnpike roads within the said counties; and from time to time the discretion of the said Principal Secretary of State shall move such person from such office, and appoint another in his stead.”

He contended that unless the Government appointed “someone else in his stead,” they were not justified in removing the officer who alone could perform the duties. He would not argue the point, which was a legal one, but would merely submit to the right hon. Gentleman, who could refer the matter to the Law Officers of the Crown, that he was bound to continue the Superintendent in his office, or appoint someone in his place, at any rate until he had passed an Act to enable him to follow a different course.

MR. DODSON said, he did not concur in the interpretation which the noble Lord had placed on the clause he had cited from the Act of Parliament—namely, that—

“It shall be lawful for one of Her Majesty's Principal Secretaries of State to appoint a fit and proper person,” &c.

The words, “It shall be lawful,” were sometimes obligatory and sometimes permissive, according to the nature of the Act in which they were found; and if the noble Lord would give a little further consideration to this Act, he believed he would perceive that in the present instance they were not intended to be obligatory upon the Secretary of State. The Government having advanced money in the Welsh counties, a Superintendent was appointed for the double purpose of superintending the efficiency of the roads and their expenditure, in order to maintain the productiveness of the tolls and provide the Government with security for the debt. He was also to guard against any further debt being incurred calculated to impair that security. The debt having been paid off, the reason for the appointment ceased both with regard to the finance and the superintendence of the roads. The noble Lord said that the Act made no provision for the discharge of the duties of Superintendent. Although he agreed with him that the present was not the time for entering into a discussion of the Bill which had been introduced, he would point out that the County Boards had power, by the 74th section of the Act, to appoint clerks, treasurers, and any officers they might require, and power, under the 95th section, to pay them out of the tolls. But there appeared to be no power for the Boards to appoint a General Superintendent, or Superintendents, and obtain payment out of the county rates to make good a deficiency of tolls without such an officer. The Bill which he had introduced, however, gave power to the County Boards to appoint such Superintendents, if they wished, jointly or separately, and to obtain assistance out of the county rates. That Bill had been delayed principally at the wish of the noble Lord himself. He was only waiting until the noble Lord and other hon. Gentlemen came to an agreement upon it, and as soon as their wishes with regard to it were ascertained he should be quite ready to proceed. But no practical inconvenience would result from this delay, inasmuch as the Estimates for the year had been framed by the late Superintendent before his term of office expired.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH said, he had understood his noble Friend to ask two questions—first, as to whether the Government were not under an obligation to appoint a Superintendent in place of the gentleman who had been dismissed; and, secondly, as to whether the Government had power to dismiss the late Superintendent under the section of the Act to which he called attention? It appeared to him (Mr. Sclater-Booth) that the section referred to did not contain the power of dismissal; and he could not but regard it as great neglect on the part of the Local Government Board to remove this Superintendent of the Roads in the six counties without providing an entirely new system. The Superintendent who had been dismissed would seem to have been the key-stone of the system; and he regretted that a change should have been made which might lead to a complete break-down of the road management in the district concerned.

PEACE PRESERVATION (IRELAND) ACT,
1881—RETURNS AS TO NUMBER AND COST OF ARMS SURRENDERED.

QUESTION.

MR. HEALY asked when Returns relating to the surrender of arms in Ireland, and the amounts paid for the same, would be laid upon the Table of the House?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER) said, in the absence of the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he would make it his business to procure the information asked for.

VISCOUNT SANDON suggested to the Vice President of the Committee of Council on Education that, in view of the lateness of the hour—1.50—it might be more convenient if his Statement were postponed until to-morrow.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he thought it best to proceed, notwithstanding the delay which had taken place. He should, however, address the Committee as briefly as was consistent with clearness.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

ART.

(1.) £2,199,863, to complete the sum necessary for Public Education (England and Wales).

MR. MUNDELLA: Sir, the sum required for public education in England and Wales for the year 1882-3 is £2,749,863, as compared with £2,683,958 granted by Parliament for the year 1881-2, showing an apparent increase of £65,905, or £82,086 less than the estimated increase of the previous year. But the real increase on the expenditure of last year is £111,500, the Estimate for 1881-2 having proved to be £45,000 in excess of the sum actually required for the service of that year. The true difference between the two years, therefore, is the increase in 1882-3 of £65,905, as it appears on the Estimates, to which is to be added a saving on 1881-2 of £45,500, making a total increase of £111,500, almost the whole of which occurs under the sub-head of the Annual Grant for Elementary Schools, and is accounted for by the anticipated increase of 140,000 additional children on average attendance at day schools. The rate estimated last year at 15s. 8½d. has proved to be less by 1½d. per head than the sum actually assigned; and the estimated rate of 16s. per head for the coming year allows for a further increase of 2d. per scholar, as compared with the increase of 2½d. of the previous year. There are also some small increments under various sub-heads, with the particulars of which I will not, at this late hour, occupy the attention of the Committee. I may, however, mention a slight increase of charge for two senior Inspectors and six Sub-Inspectors at a lower rate of pay, an arrangement that will ultimately effect a saving on the Inspectorial Vote. The sum granted in 1881-2 was £2,683,915, and the sum expended, £2,638,500. The saving occurs almost entirely under the sub-head of Annual Grants to Elementary Schools. We estimated the average attendance in the day-schools for last year at 2,983,682; but the result has shown only 2,909,000 in average attendance, and an increase of 150,000 scholars on the rolls. There has been a considerable decrease in respect of the evening schools, the estimated average attendance at which was 42,763, and the expenditure £18,709; whereas the actual attendance and expenditure were 37,940 and £15,142 respectively; and there seems to be no doubt that, under the existing Code, the night schools will gradually become extinct. The attendance at them has been steadily decreasing for some years past. The statement I have made will show that it is becoming more and more difficult to get in a number of the neglected children who are still outside. The attendance is certainly not as large as it ought to be; nevertheless, when I come to show the educational progress we have made, I think the Committee will have every reason to be satisfied with the work of last year. Probably at no period since the passing of the Act of 1870 has there been more satisfactory evidence of solid progress in education than there has been during the past year. The by-laws are beginning to tell on the quality as well as on the quantity of the education given in the schools. The number of children who leave our schools for labour may be reckoned for the past year at 7,000 per week, whereas the number entering the schools weekly is no less than 10,000; and this excess has been going on year by year during the last 10 years. The increase during last year in the number of scholars is 120,000, and we anticipate for next year an increase of no less than 140,000, the normal increase, according to the growth of population, being something like 150,000. Now, there are only two tables which I shall trouble the Committee by referring to, for the purpose of illustration. The first of these shows the decline of the dunces, or neglected children, and the second the advance of the children in intelligence. I have here a table showing the number of scholars over 10 years of age presented for examination in the three lowest Standards. In these Standards the total number presented in 1872 was 118,931, and of these 14·71 per cent were presented in Standard I.; in 1875, 481,094 children were presented, of whom 11·83 per cent were in Standard I.; in 1878 there was a percentage of 10·48 in Standard I., out of a total of 775,772 presented; while in 1881, out of a total of 1,011,208 children presented for examination over 10 years of age, only 5·48 per cent were presented in Standard I. I will now take the higher Standards. In Standards IV. to VI., in the year 1872, the number of children presented was 144,799; in 1875 it was 194,509; in 1878 it was 324,517; and in 1881 it was 535,442, showing a growth of about 420 per cent since 1872. The statistics of the past year show that there is now accommodation for 4,389,000 children in our schools, being an increase in that respect of 159,000 in the past year. The number of scholars on the register is 4,045,000, or an increase of 150,000 on last year, and the scholars in average attendance number 2,863, which shows an increase of 112,000. The average attendance is the highest yet attained, and amounts to 71 per cent of the number of scholars on the Books. Of scholars examined the total number is 1,995,000, which shows an increase of 91,000 on the year 1880. The percentage of passes in the "three R's," as it is termed, was 81·82, and that is the highest number of passes we have ever had. The proportion of scholars in Standard IV. and passing was 23·8; on the whole, a very large increase upon previous years, and showing a steady increase. The certificated teachers numbered 44,600, being an increase of 3,174, and of pupil teachers there were 33,639, showing a slight decrease. Now, as to the expenditure and the cost of maintenance of these schools. The cost per scholar in board schools averaged £2 1s. 6d., or a decrease of 5½d.; and in voluntary schools, £1 14s. 10½d., or a decrease of 2½d. But in the London board schools the cost per scholar was £2 15s. 10½d., a reduction of nearly 2s.

per head; and the cost per scholar in the Provincial board schools was £1 17s. 10d. The London board schools earned 16s. 9½d. per head, or an increase of 2d.; and the voluntary schools earned 15s. 7½d., or an increase of 2½d. Satisfactory as these figures are as to the increase in numbers and payments, there is still great scope for improvement. We have school-places for 4,389,000 children, and there are 4,045,000 on the registers; but the highest average attendance we have yet reached was 2,863,000. This shows an average daily absence of 1,182,000. Now, what does this mean? It means a waste of expenditure, a loss of power, and a loss of grants to the schools. The teachers are there, the buildings are there, the expenditure on the schools is the same; but yet there is this large absence. Everything that can be done, as the noble Lord the Member for Liverpool (Viscount Sandon) suggests, shall be done to increase this average attendance and to improve the quality of education in this country. I will not detain the Committee at this late hour with a statement as to Scotland; but I want to mention one illustration as to the attendance. There are two or three instances of the same kind to show what can be done when there is a proper staff, and when there is a steady pressure to increase the average attendance. There are two schools in this country which are striking illustrations of what can be done under the greatest possible difficulty. First, there is the Jews' School at Manchester, a very large school, and 50 per cent of the parents speak broken English. Three or four languages are spoken in the families of the scholars, yet 99 per cent of the children pass. At the Jews' schools in London 2,400 children passed this year, which is 98½ per cent, or the highest education obtained by any children in Her Majesty's schools. These children, many of them, have come to the schools within the year with an imperfect knowledge even of the English language. Well, the figures I have given for England, although they show a general steady advance, compare unfavourably with those for Scotland, as I will point out. The percentage of average attendance of the number on the Books in England is 71, whilst in Scotland it is 75·2. The percentage of passes in Standard subjects in 1881-2, in Scotland, was 88·32. In England the percentage of scholars, in all schools individually examined in Standard IV. and upwards, was 26·83, and in Scotland 36·13, showing that there were at least 10 per cent of older children in Standard IV. in Scotland more than there were in England. I believe that in England there is just a trifle over 1 per cent of all the 4,000,000 of children in the schools over 14 years of age. In Scotland there are more than 3 per cent; and when you come to the payments there is no comparison between the two countries. It must be remembered that the public schools in Scotland combine elementary education with secondary education, and that every year they are sending up increasing numbers to the Scotch Universities. The rate of progress is shown by the Returns of Inspection made on the 30th of September. These seem to indicate that the school boards in Scotland have not much more room for gathering in children. They only increased the number in the schools last year by 11,000. They have completed nearly the whole supply of accommodation for the whole of the children, and, no doubt, the field they have before them now is a very limited one. But the attainments of the children are increasing in a greater ratio than their numbers. The estimated grant in Scotland for 1881-2 was 17s. 6d. per head. They actually earned 17s. 7½d.; and I have estimated for the present year 18s. per head, which will give Scotland 2s. per head more than England. They have accommodation in the schools of Scotland for 612,483 scholars. There are on the registers 545,000, and the average attendance is 410,000 scholars. The percentage of attendance to the number on the Books is 75·24. The percentage of passes in the "three R's" is 88·32, and the expenses of maintaining the schools in Scotland are these—In the public schools, £2 2s. 7½d. per head, being an increase of 3d. per head; in the voluntary schools, £1 16s., being a decrease of 1s. 3½d. The grants earned in the public schools were 17s. 9½d. per head; and in the voluntary schools, 16s. 8½d. It is impossible for me to close my remarks about Scotland without saying that that country has done wonders since the passing of the Education Act of 1870. Great as has been the progress in England, the progress in Scotland, both as regards numbers and completeness of attainments, has been much more marked; and, no doubt, Scotland has done more, in an infinite degree, towards the completion of her national system of education than England. Nevertheless, the educationists in Scotland are now looking forward anxiously and impatiently to the further development of their national system. Some localities are, it is said, without the means of higher education. There are gaps that require to be filled up, and which demand, and are receiving, the best attention of the Scotch Education Department in connection with the recommendation made last year by the Endowed Schools Commissioners. The most important and pressing measure for Scotland is the Endowed Schools Bill, which, I hope, will receive the sanction of Parliament this Session. With the power to utilize her endowments, with a Code that admits of increased expansion and usefulness, with the elementary schools linked to the Universities, Scotland will become possessed of a truly national system of education which Englishmen must, I fear, be content, for at least a generation to come, to regard with envy and admiration. I had intended to say something about the New Code; but, at this hour of the morning, I will not detain the Committee longer. I have made a statement which, I hope, will warrant the Committee in granting the Vote for which I ask. I can assure the Committee, in conclusion, that there never was an educational proposal more thoroughly considered, and one where the suggestions made were more carefully weighed and sifted. I admit the friendliness with which the Code has been criticized; and I believe the fears expressed by some hon. Members as to its operation will be dissipated in the first 12 months' experience. I beg to move the Vote of £2,199,863, for Public Education in England and Wales, and the expenses of the Education Offices in London.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he did not rise for the purpose of opposing the taking of this Vote, even at that very late hour of the morning; and he hoped the Government would duly appreciate the great consideration hon. Members were exhibiting towards them, especially when he reminded them that when he held the Office of Vice President of the Council he was never allowed to take a Vote after half-past 11 without having every prominent Member of the present Administration dividing the House against him. His reason for not opposing the grant to-night was that about 10 days back, when he questioned the Government as to the propriety of giving hon. Members an opportunity of considering the Education Estimates before the Easter Recess, those Estimates were put down for to-night. It was not the fault of the Government that the whole evening had not been devoted to the discussion of them. The Votes for England and Scotland might be taken to-night; but the Government should undertake not to bring on the Report to-morrow, but to postpone it until after Easter. They had already sufficient money to last them for two months, and the Education Question should be allowed to come on at a time when it could be thoroughly discussed. Would the noble Marquess give them an assurance that the Report would not be put down until after Easter?

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: An arrangement that would be convenient to the noble Lord would be, that we should not attempt to take Supply to-morrow, but put down the Report, in order, if there is time, that discussion should be taken. If there is not time, then, of course, it could be postponed until after Easter. I would not propose to take Supply to-morrow, but to put down the Report of this Vote after the Committee on the Army Bill.

VISCOUNT SANDON thought that if the debate on the Report were put off until after Easter, hon. Members would, in the meantime, have an opportunity of consulting with their friends outside the House who were interested in the subject of education. The matter was much too formidable to be hurried over. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Mundella) had himself stated that he had intended to go into the question of the New Code, but had been prevented by the lateness of the hour. He (Viscount Sandon) was quite sure the Government would not lose anything by accepting the suggestion for the postponement of the Report.

THE MARQUESS OF HARTINGTON: If it would be more convenient to the House for us to postpone the Report until after Easter we will adopt that course.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he rose to call attention to a question which was of some importance to Scotch constituencies. He proposed to move the reduction of the Vote.

THE CHAIRMAN: The Scotch Vote will come on presently.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL said, he wished to move the reduction of the English Vote. If he had waited for the Scotch Vote to come on, he believed he would not have had the opportunity he sought; otherwise he should have been most happy to meet the convenience of the Vice President of the Council and the Committee. He proposed to reduce the Vote by £1,000, in order to call attention to a point on which, he believed, Scotland was rather unfairly treated. There was no allowance made to Scotland in respect of needlework. It was provided for in the English Code. The grant in Scotland was conditional on plain needlework being taught in elementary schools. Article 17 of the Scotch Act was to this effect—that before any grant was made to a school, the Department must be satisfied that, among other conditions, girls were, as a rule, taught plain needlework and cutting out as part of the ordinary course of instruction. But needlework was entirely excluded from Schedule III. of the Scotch Code, and was excluded from the subjects in Schedule IV., for which alone the grant was made, whereas in the English Code there was provision for a grant of from 2s. to 4s. per head; and if they examined the Irish Estimates they would find a still greater discrepancy—£140 was provided for needlework in the Normal School in Dublin; and a salary for an instructress in needlework of £45 a-year was provided in the Model School. The amount was only £39 last year, and it had since been increased. There was also a sum of £100 for needlework materials. [Mr. MUNDELLA: Not in the English schools.] No; in the Irish schools. He was pointing out the discrepancy between the Scotch Votes and the English and Irish Votes, and the apparent unfairness with which Scotland was treated in the Estimates. It would appear, further, from the Irish Estimates that a sum of no less than £2,500 was provided for the salaries of 170 workmistresses in the National Schools. He did not mean to say that full value was not obtained for the money voted, and he believed that it was most desirable to teach needlework; but what he wanted to draw the attention of the Committee to was this—that Scotland was not fairly treated in the matter. He had often been told as the reason why Scotland did not obtain fair consideration in regard to these grants in aid was that the Scotch Members were too bashful to ask for them. He wished to impress upon his Scotch Colleagues that it was their duty to ask the Vice President of the Council for some encouragement in this branch, or some equivalent, at all events, equal to that which had been offered to the Irish schools. If he failed to obtain such encouragement he should feel obliged to put the Committee to the trouble of dividing.

MR. MUNDELLA remarked, that it had been found unnecessary to provide needlework in the Scotch schools, except where it was taken as a special subject. Where it was taught as a class subject, according to the Schedule, a grant was given, and the same principle applied to Scotland and England equally with Ireland. He could assure the hon. Member that Scotland already earned her fair share of the grant.

SIR HERBERT MAXWELL was satisfied with the statement of the right hon. Gentleman.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £358,512, to complete the sum necessary for Public Education (Scotland).

Motion made, and Question proposed,

“That a sum not exceeding £291,400, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1883, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Science and Art Department, and of the Establishments connected therewith.”

MR. SALT hoped that the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council would not press this Vote at that hour of the morning (2.30). It was clear to him that it was impossible for the Vote to receive a fair discussion. He was quite aware of the difficulties which the Government had to contend with, and he was not desirous of interposing additional ones in their way; but it was really a serious matter, in regard to the financial arrangements of the country, that, night after night, the Votes in Supply were brought on for discussion at 2 or 3 o'clock in the morning, and that many most important Votes were passed without any discussion at all. Now, with regard to this Vote, and to the question of education generally, it was most important that suggestions and expressions of opinion should be obtained from hon. Members in every part of the House, in order that full information as to the feeling of the country might be obtained. They had already passed two Votes quietly on the assurances which had been given to the Committee by the right hon. Gentleman, and they had agreed to stop what might have been a most valuable discussion.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he thought the subjects involved in this Vote had been very well discussed in the early part of the evening. The debate, indeed, had been almost entirely confined to matters connected with this Department, and he hoped the Committee would now allow the Government to take the Vote. He had been in attendance since 4 o'clock in the hope that he would be allowed to take these Votes.

LORD GEORGE HAMILTON said, he thought the Committee ought to have some little regard for appearances. Either they had a serious function to perform or they had not, and it was a perfect farce to pass Votes of this magnitude at that hour of the morning. When he filled the Office of Vice President, he was never allowed to take a Vote after half-past 12 o'clock. The Government had already got two large Votes, and had been able to make their Statement; and he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President ought now to rest content. They had so far succeeded without a division, and he hoped the Government would give way.

MR. MUNDELLA said, he could not press the Vote against the desire of the noble Lord and hon. Members opposite; but in regard to the remark of the noble Lord that he had never pressed forward a Vote at so late an hour, he must remind the noble Lord that he never had the same excuse.

QUESTIONS.

POST OFFICE — THE AMERICAN MAILS.

MR. THOROLD ROGERS asked the Postmaster General, Whether he will consider the propriety of saving time in the conveyance of passengers from England to the United States, by discontinuing the practice of calling for the mails at Queenstown, especially as the causes which led to the practice have been wholly superseded by the almost daily mails to the United States, and since the delay is a great inconvenience and discomfort to passengers and a hindrance to the transaction of business?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, the advantage of the packets calling at Queenstown for mails to the United States is, that it gives a later despatch by 24 hours from London than if the mails were embarked at Liverpool; while it gives even greater advantage to correspondence posted in Ireland. I do not think, therefore, it would be desirable to make the change suggested by my hon. Friend. I may add that mails are only sent by three out of the several lines of steamers to America; and I cannot help thinking that it is a convenience to passengers, and especially to passengers from Ireland, to have the opportunity of embarking from Queenstown.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JOHN HEALY.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any reply has been returned to the application of Mr. John Healy, suspect in Limerick Gaol, to be allowed out on parole to enable him to take steps to collect his debts?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) (in the absence of Mr. W. E. FORSTER), in reply, said, that His Excellency the Lord Lieutenant had been pleased to order the release of this man.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. JAMES HOLDEN.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mr. James Holden, of Shanborgh, near New Ross, who has undergone over five months imprisonment in Naas Gaol, was arrested at the same time and on a similar warrant as Mr. Hugh Mahon, who has long since been released; and, whether, considering that the district around New Ross is in a peaceable condition, he thinks it necessary to detain Mr. Holden longer?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER), in reply, said, that Mr. James Holden had been imprisoned in Naas Gaol. During this period Mr. Hugh Mahon, who was arrested at the same time, was discharged because it represented that his life was in danger. Mr. Holden's case had been recently considered by the Lord Lieutenant, who found that he could not at present recommend his release.

MR. REDMOND inquired whether the district of New Ross was not in a perfectly peaceable condition at present?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER) said, he could not give any information on that point; but it did not follow that because a district was peaceable after arrests that it would necessarily continue to be so if the prisoners were released.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881 — MESSRS. GANNON AND JOHN RYNOLDS.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether Messrs. Gannon and John Rynolds have not been in Monaghan Prison since 30th October last charged with inciting others not to pay rent, and of which charge they declare themselves innocent; whether the district in which they formerly resided is not now perfectly peaceable; and, whether, under all the circumstances, these two suspects should not now be released?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER), in reply, said, that these men had been arrested, not for inciting others not to pay rent, but on reasonable suspicion of maiming cattle. No such representation as those mentioned in the Question had been made to the Government. The districts where these men were arrested had undoubtedly improved; but the cases were considered last month, and it was found that they could not at present be released.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE “EMERGENCY” MEN—CASE OF JAMES CARSON.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true, as reported in the “Belfast Morning News” of the 29th March 1882, that James Carson, one of the emergency men who accompanied the expedition from Monaghan to save Captain Boycott’s crops, was, at Monaghan Petty Sessions, on the 28th March instant, charged by the police with cursing the Queen, cursing the Pope, and drawing a bayonet from a soldier, and threatening to shoot said soldier with a revolver, for which series of outrages said emergency man was merely fined in forty shillings; and, if he will explain what steps he has taken against the magistrates who heard the case and inflicted such mild penalties?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER), in reply, said, the facts were not correctly stated by the hon. Member. James Carson had been charged with disorderly conduct, with refusing to leave licensed premises, and with having assaulted a soldier. Sergeant Jones, upon whom the assault was alleged to have been committed, regarded it only as a joke. Carson was fined 30s. and costs for the disorderly conduct, and 10s. and costs for the assault, and it was believed that a summons would be issued against him for having used seditious language. It was not the intention of the Government to take any steps against the magistrates who had adjudicated in the case.

STATE OF IRELAND—THE “EMERGENCY” MEN—ASSAULT AT MANULLA STATION—DECISION OF MAJOR BOND.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If it is true, as reported in the “Belfast Morning News” of the 29th March instant, that at Balla Petty Sessions, held on the 28th March 1882, an Emergency man was fined in £10 for presenting a revolver and threatening to shoot a Railway guard, at Manulla Station, on the 18th instant; if the said offence was indictable, for what reason the magistrates acted summarily in a case so grave and serious; and, if the Major Bond, R.M. who presided at the trial is Major Bond, late of Birmingham?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER), in reply, said, that at Balla Petty Sessions an Emergency man was charged with having presented a revolver at two railway officials. After hearing the case the Bench were unanimous in treating it as one of common assault, and not one that should go to the Superior Courts. They therefore dealt summarily with it, as they were entitled to do. The Major Bond referred to was Major Bond, late of Birmingham.

EVICTIIONS (IRELAND)—CASE OF MRS. IRWIN, OF BROOTALLY, CO. ARMAGH.

MR. HEALY asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether it is a fact that Mrs. Irwin, of Brootally, county Armagh, a widow over 90 years of age, was evicted on the 23rd March by her landlord, Mr. Thomas Hansom, who, it is alleged, broke into her house, smashed her furniture, delf, &c., destroyed her potatoes, hay, and straw, and left her lying on the roadside, although she offered him the rent, and asked him to wait for two hours until her daughter proceeded to Armagh to consult a solicitor about the sheriff's costs; and, whether it was legal for the landlord, before the two months' "stay" had expired to evict Mrs. Irwin; and, if not, what notice Government propose to take in the matter? The hon. Member said, that portion of the Question had been omitted, and it was this—The County Court Judge had given a stay of execution in the case, and it was before that stay had expired that the eviction took place.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER), in reply, said, that it was true that Mrs. Irwin had been evicted for non-payment of rent. There was no ground for the statement that her house was broken into and her furniture destroyed. The door was open when the party arrived, and Mrs. Irwin herself stated that no damage was done to her property. She was re-admitted three or four hours after the eviction, having paid her rent in the meantime.

SOUTH AFRICA—CETYWAYO, EX-KING OF ZULULAND—VISIT TO ENGLAND.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND asked the Under Secretary of State for the Colonies, Whether it is still proposed to bring the ex-Zulu King, Cetywayo, to England, and by whom the expenses of the journey are to be borne, whether by the ratepayers of the Cape Colony or of this Country?

MR. COURTNEY: Sir, Her Majesty's Government have not relinquished the intention of bringing Cetywayo over to this country; but the arrangements are not completed, and no time has yet been fixed for his departure from the Cape. The expenses will be paid by this country.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—JOHN O'BRIEN.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, On what grounds John O'Brien, of Clogheen, county Tipperary, now detained as a suspect in Naas Gaol, has not been released, seeing another prisoner, arrested at same time on same charge of intimidation, has been released; whether the district of Clogheen is perfectly peaceable; whether it is true, as reported, that the sub-inspector of the district stated the suspect would be kept in the full term, as he had been arrested in 1866, and should be punished again for the offence committed at that time; and, whether the continued detention of John O'Brien has been influenced by the Report of said sub-inspector?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER), in reply, said, the case of this man had been considered, and it was not thought safe to release him at present. He did not think he should state the grounds upon which his further detention was deemed necessary.

POOR LAW (IRELAND)—BALLYCARY DISPENSARY DISTRICT AND LARNE WORKHOUSE.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, What is the largest number of paupers who have been inmates of Larne Workhouse from the Ballycary Dispensary district during the past year; and, how many persons have received outdoor relief from same district during that time?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER), in reply, said, the Returns would be given unopposed.

STATE OF IRELAND—ALLEGED OUTRAGE IN WEXFORD COUNTY.

MR. REDMOND (for Mr. BARRY) asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether any report has reached the Government of an outrage committed by the wife of the sub-inspector of police at Taghmon, county Wexford, who, it is alleged, on the 8th instant, fired a revolver at her servant man, whose face was scorched by the discharge, the bullet passing through a window and lodged in the woodwork of a house on the opposite side of the street; and, if the Government will cause inquiry to be made into this case?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER), in reply, said, the facts of the case were being inquired into; and if the hon. Member would repeat the Question when the House re-assembled, he hoped to be able to give him all information.

Mr. Healy

POST OFFICE (CONTRACTS) — THE
DUBLIN.

MR. FINDLATER asked the Postmaster General, When the Contract for the Mails between London and Dublin will be renewed; whether he will secure, under the new Contract, such acceleration of the service as will enable persons in the provinces in Ireland to answer letters from London by the same day's mail from Dublin; and, whether the terms of the Contract will be laid before Parliament before their final ratification?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, the contract is still in force, and can be terminated only on 12 months' notice. Such notice has not yet been given, although tenders for the sea service have been called for with a view to the question being considered. While in some parts of Ireland letters from London can already be answered by return of post, it would not, in any circumstances, be possible to secure the same advantage to all parts of Ireland; but the question of acceleration referred to by my hon. Friend the Member for Monaghan shall not be lost sight of. As in the case of all contracts for sea service for a term of years, it will be necessary that a new contract for the Irish mail service should be laid before Parliament for ratification.

PERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MESSRS.
CULLEN AND LYNOTT.

MR. BIGGAR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether the district of Manorhamilton, county Leitrim, is reported by Mr. Waters, County Court Judge, and by the Rev. Patrick O'Reilly, C.C. in "Freeman" of 21st March, to be perfectly peaceable; and, whether, under the circumstances, it is necessary further to imprison Messrs. Cullen and Lynott, more especially as they declare themselves innocent of the charge of intimidation which has been brought against them?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER), in reply, said, the cases of all these men were considered last month, and it was decided that they could not be liberated at present.

AND MUSIC HALLS (METROPOLIS).

MR DIXON-HARTLAND asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether he has received from the head of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade any Report regarding the condition of the London Theatres, or any of them, with reference to sufficiency of exits and means of prevention of fires; and, if so, whether he will state the nature of that Report, and when he will be prepared to lay it upon the Table of the House?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: In the absence of my right hon. and learned Friend I will answer this Question. The Secretary of State for the Home Department received, a few days ago, a Report of the nature described from the chief officer of the Metropolitan Fire Brigade on certain of the London Theatres. The Secretary of State is in communication with the Lord Chamberlain and the Metropolitan Board of Works on this important and urgent subject; but, pending consideration of such measures as the Report may render necessary, he does not propose to lay it on the Table of the House.

LEGISLATION.

MR. BURT asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If his attention has been called to the case of Hannah M'Carthy, who died in the Shoreditch Infirmary, on Thursday last, from lead poisoning; whether he has seen the evidence given at the inquest by Mr. Forbes, medical officer of the Shoreditch Workhouse, who is reported to have said:—

"Cases of lead poisoning, fatal and otherwise, are of frequent occurrence. The deceased worked at a lead factory in Southgate Road, where she had been engaged for ten months only. The nature of the work was very deadly. . . . My experience tells me that the workers in lead factories require more looking after. I have had sixteen cases under my care in a few months, and the worst of it is that the married women who work in lead factories absorb the poison, and give it to the suckling child in the milk;"

whether he can compel the owners of lead factories to adopt means to prevent what the jury, in their verdict, characterized as "the wholesale poisoning by lead" which now goes on in these places; and, if he has not now sufficient power, whether he will apply to Parliament for any alteration in the Law, so as to afford protection to the lead workers while following their employment?

MR. BROADHURST asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, Whether his attention has been called to a report in the "Daily News" of yesterday of an inquest held on the body of Hannah M'Carthy, by the coroner for East Middlesex, who died from the effects of lead poisoning after only ten months employment at the lead works, and to the recommendation of the jury

"the Legislature should at once take steps to compel the proprietors of lead works to provide proper protection to those in their employ ;"

whether the present Factory and Workshops' Acts are sufficient to give the necessary protection to the lives of the people engaged in these deadly works; and, if not, whether he is prepared to ask Parliament for increased power in respect to lead works; and, whether he would consider if it would not be advisable to prohibit the employment of women and young persons in lead works?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, this case has already engaged the attention of my right hon. and learned Friend the Home Secretary, who has called for a special Report thereon from the Chief Inspector of Factories. The recommendations of the jury and the suggestions of the hon. Member will receive due consideration.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—JOHN HOOLIHAN.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether he is aware that John Hoolihan, of Lacka, Ballyduff, county Kerry, has been imprisoned, on suspicion, since the 16th April 1881; that he emphatically denies having taken any part in the act to which he is accused of having been a party; that two other men from the same district have been discharged, though arrested long after Hoolihan; and, whether, under such circumstances, it is his intention to prolong this man's imprisonment beyond a year?

Mr. Burt

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER), in reply, said, that the case of this man had been recently considered by the Lord Lieutenant, who now saw his way to order his discharge.

STATE OF IRELAND—JURIES IN THE KING'S COUNTY.

MR. TOTTENHAM asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, Whether his attention has been directed to the failure of justice at the King's County Quarter Sessions just terminated, and whether the Chairman, Mr. Neligan, Q.C., is correctly reported in the Irish newspapers to have said as follows:—

"His Honour said the case was one of the simplest that ever went before a jury, and he expressed his astonishment that they were unable to arrive at a verdict. It was not, he said, this case alone that was at issue, but the system of trial by jury was on its trial; and, if a King's County jury could not agree after such evidence as they had, he could only say that it had been reduced to an absurdity, and, if you cannot come to a decision, I must decline to try any more prisoners, and (addressing the Crown Solicitor) Mr. Mitchell, you need not send any more before me. You may send them to the Assizes ;"

and, if report be correct, what steps Her Majesty's Government intend to take to prevent a recurrence of similar failures?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER), in reply, said, he had not seen the report in question; but he had no doubt it was correct. The Government would be only too anxious to prevent the recurrence of such a state of facts.

MR. HEALY asked if it was proposed to deal with the question of the Grand Juries in Ireland at the same time?

LAND LEAGUE MEETINGS (ENGLAND).

MR. BIGGAR asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If it was by his instructions the police did, on Sunday 2nd instant, order Michael Barrett, White Swan, Old Gravel Lane, Wapping, to refuse to allow a Land League Meeting to be held in his house; and, if not by his instructions, will he give orders that for the time to come the police are not to interfere with peaceable political meetings?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, from inquiry made of the police authorities it appears that such a meeting did take place at the time and place mentioned. The landlord was desirous of having the house cleared; but the police declined to interfere in any way. It therefore appears unnecessary to issue any instructions to the police such as the hon. Member asks for.

LANDLORD AND TENANT (IRELAND)
—THE MERCERS' COMPANY AND THEIR TENANTS.

MR. LEAMY asked Mr. Solicitor General for Ireland, Whether his attention has been called to a resolution passed at a meeting of the tenants of the Mercers' Company recently held at Kibrea, county Derry, condemning the action of the Company in attempting to force tenants in arrear to sign agreements not to apply to the Court for the purpose of having a fair rent fixed; and, whether the Government intend to take any notice of the statements in the resolution?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER), in reply, said, it appeared that the tenants of the Mercers' Company had made certain complaints; but he had not yet had an opportunity of investigating the circumstances. It would be obviously improper on his part to express any opinion on the complaints themselves, and the matter was not one in which Her Majesty's Government ought to interfere.

CHARITIES OF THE CITY OF LONDON.

MR. JOHN HOLLOND asked Mr. Attorney General, Whether he is aware that several of the Boards of Trustees of the Parochial Charities of the City of London have inquired of the Charity Commissioners whether they can sanction the application of the funds of their charities to the purpose of opposing the Public Bill which has been brought into the House dealing with these charities, and promoting the Private Bill brought in for a similar purpose, and that the Charity Commissioners have replied that they consider any such application of charitable funds to be illegal; whether he is aware that, in spite of their reply, certain Boards of Trustees in the City of London are now making contributions out of the charitable funds under their management for the above-mentioned purpose; and, whether, under these circumstances, he will consider the propriety of taking legal steps to have these Boards of Trustees restrained from such a misapplication of trust funds?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): Sir, my attention has only been called to the Question this morning; and I have, therefore, had very little opportunity of making inquiry. I understand that application was made to the Charity Commissioners that they would enable certain Trustees to spend money in opposing or promoting certain Bills, and the Charity Commissioners expressed the opinion that the expenditure for such a purpose would be illegal. They have received a communication from the solicitor to one of the Charities to the effect that, in the opinion of eminent counsel, such expenditure would be legal. My own opinion is in accordance with the decision of Lord Eldon in 1826, who decided that the expenditure of Charity funds in promoting Private Bills which are not afterwards passed into law is illegal. If the Charity Commissioners ask my advice, of course the matter shall be fully considered.

CRIMINAL LAW—THE CONDEMNED PRISONER LAMSON.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department, If he will lay before Parliament the Despatch sent by the Government of the United States to Her Majesty's Government, or communicated by the Minister of the United States to Her Majesty's Government, relative to the convicted prisoner Lamson, and the answer of Her Majesty's Government thereto? The right hon. Gentleman said, perhaps the House would allow him to make a short explanation in regard to the Question. He wished expressly to exclude the Memorial itself and the statement of facts, which the Home Secretary stated yesterday was for himself and not for the House. He also desired to say that he made this inquiry in no spirit of hostility to the Government, but in order to strengthen their hands, and in order that the country might have an assurance that there had been no attempt on the part of any foreign Power to interfere with the administration of our Municipal Laws.

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: I am glad the right hon. Gentleman has made the explanation, for, in the absence of my right hon. and learned Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department, I was about to say that if the right hon. Gentleman's Question referred to the same Papers as those referred to by the hon. Baronet the Member for South Warwickshire (Sir Eardley Wilmot) yesterday, I could only have repeated the reply of my right hon. and learned Friend, that to lay on the Table Papers with respect to the exercise of mercy by the Crown would, in his opinion, make it absolutely impossible that that prerogative should be exercised. If, however, as I suppose, the right hon. Member refers to the formal Correspondence with the United States Minister, I may state that the Foreign Office will have no objection to lay it ultimately before Parliament.

SIR R. ASSHETON CROSS: Will the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department lay it on the Table himself, or shall I move for it?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: He will lay it on the Table himself, but not immediately.

CIVIL SERVICE (IRELAND)—APPOINTMENT OF MR. CROKER.

MR. SEXTON asked the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, If he has conferred the appointment of Poor Law and Grand Jury Auditor on a Mr. Croker, of Ballinagarde, county Limerick; if Mr. Croker has ever held any other office in the Civil Service; if he possesses a certificate of qualification from the Civil Service Commissioners; if not, what test of qualification and fitness was obtained in his case, what examination he underwent, how many candidates there were for the office, and how many members of the existing staff of the Local Government Board were eligible for and applied for the appointment; and, on what grounds he set aside their applications and selected a person from outside the Civil Service?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. PORTER), in reply, said, he understood that Mr. Croker had been appointed to this position, although not on the Staff of the Local Government Board. The same was the case with the last three persons appointed; but his appointment was made subject to his obtaining a Civil Service certificate. Mr. Croker was selected from the other candidates, as he was the best qualified, having been a bank clerk of many years' standing, and eminently fitted for the position.

POST OFFICE (TELEGRAPH DEPARTMENT)—THE TELEGRAPH SERVICE IN IRELAND.

MR. CALLAN (for Mr. GRAY) asked the Postmaster General, with reference to the recent appointment of Telegraph Superintendent in Dublin by the transfer to Dublin of the Belfast Telegraph Superintendent, Whether the vacancy thus created in Belfast has been filled by the transfer to Belfast of the late superintendent of the Dublin Telegraph Department; and, if that is not the case, whether the vacancy in Belfast has been filled by the promotion of a Belfast clerk; whether, if it be contemplated to fill the Belfast vacancy by a promotion from the Belfast staff, the nett effect of the change will be to deprive, not by their own fault, the entire Dublin staff of four promotions; whether it is a fact that the assistant superintendent of telegraphs in Dublin has for a considerable period satisfactorily discharged the duties of superintendent, and is an officer of long service and of high character; whether, since it is regarded to be of importance that there should be transfers from office to office, and from one part of the kingdom to another, so that persons in the service of the Post Office in Ireland and Scotland should have an opportunity of being appointed to positions in England, and persons in England should have an opportunity of being transferred to Ireland, he could quote to the House any instances in which such transfers resulted in the promotion of Irish clerks to English or Scotch offices; whether it is a fact that whilst frequently transfers of this kind, involving the loss of promotion to the Dublin telegraph clerks, have been made from England and parts of Ireland to Dublin, or corresponding advantages have been obtained by the Dublin telegraph clerks in transfers to other parts of the kingdom; whether it is a fact that, by the interference with the regular system of promotion, the Dublin telegraph clerks have within the past year been deprived of no less than ten promotions, notwithstanding the fact that they have been thanked for the manner in which they performed their work; and, whether he will take any steps to secure that the transfer now referred to shall be effected in such a manner as not to deprive the staff of telegraph clerks in Dublin of their legitimate promotion, and to secure that in future such changes shall not militate against their legitimate claims?

MR. FAWCETT: Sir, both at Dublin and at Belfast there has been a recent change of Telegraph Superintendents. The Telegraph Superintendent at Belfast has been removed to Dublin, and the Telegraph Superintendent at Dublin has been removed to Belfast, though no longer in the capacity of Telegraph Superintendent. While officers at Belfast have gained promotion, those at Dublin have not lost any. The Assistant Superintendent at Dublin is an officer of long service and high character, and has discharged his duties satisfactorily; but I thought that on the whole the transfer of the Telegraph Superintendent from Belfast would most conduce to the interests of the Service. With regard to the question of promoting officers from Ireland to England, among other instances I may refer to the fact that two very important offices on the English establishment—namely, those of Provincial Surveyors—are now held by gentlemen who were originally in the Secretary's Office in Dublin. As regards the remainder of the hon. Member's inquiry, I am not aware that the Dublin Office has been unduly deprived of promotion.

PUBLIC WORSHIP REGULATION ACT— THE REV. MR. GREEN.

MR. J. G. HUBBARD asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether, on the adjournment of the House for the Easter Festival, he will consider the position of the Rev. Sidney Faithorn Green, now, and for a year past, incarcerated in Lancaster Gaol, under these circumstances: Mr. Green was prosecuted for an alleged infraction of the legal Ritual of the Church of England, and for this offence was visited with the punishment of imprisonment; and, whether, considering that Lord Penzance, who tried him, a Judge created by the Public Worship Regulation Act, and exercising the function of Official Principal, had never completed his qualifications in the usual way, and, considering also the severity of the penalty inflicted for a Ritual irregularity, he will devise some means of terminating Mr. Green's prolonged detention in Lancaster Gaol?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, this Question relates to the case of the Rev. Mr. Green, who is now, and has been for some time, in prison under, I believe, the Public Worship Regulation Act. My right hon. Friend asks me whether we will consider the position of Mr. Green? We have had occasion to consider this case carefully in consequence of various Memorials and representations made to Her Majesty's Government. But my right hon. Friend asks me whether I will devise some means of terminating Mr. Green's prolonged detention in Lancaster Gaol? Well, Sir, what I am advised is that Her Majesty could not, without going beyond the limit of Constitutional practice, which it would be wrong in us to transgress, apply the Prerogative of mercy or any other power which she may possess for the release of Mr. Green by her own order. With respect to devising some means of terminating the imprisonment of Mr. Green—which must mean legislative means—I think that is rather a business belonging to the consideration of the high authorities who devised and who passed the Public Worship Regulation Act than it is for Her Majesty's Government.

INTERNATIONAL LAW—PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRE- LAND) ACT, 1881—INTERVENTION OF THE AMERICAN GOVERNMENT.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether any representations have been made to Her Majesty's Government, by the Government of the United States, relative to the detention in Ireland of suspects of American nationality; and, whether any answers have been received from the United States Government to the representations made to the Government of the United States, as described on the 20th of June 1881 by him, as to the incitements carried on in that country to outrages in England; and, if so, whether such answers can be laid upon the Table?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, representations have been made to Her Majesty's Government by the American Government in relation to certain subjects of the United States now detained in Ireland among the "suspects." Those communications are in progress, and I am not in a position to give any account of their purport or issue at the present moment. In regard to the second part of the Question, I have to say that communications were made last year in respect to a particular description of literature in circulation in the United States; but no answer has been received from the American Government on the subject.

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether he could state, for the information of the House, how many of the "suspects" in Ireland claimed American nationality?

MR. GLADSTONE: I have no exact information on this subject, but my impression is that the number is very small indeed. [Mr. HEALY: Four.] I was going to say either four or six.

LAND LAW (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—THE LABOURERS.

MR. A. MOORE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, Whether his attention has been called to the difficulties which beset labourers in endeavouring to avail themselves of the provisions of the Land Act; and, whether the Government will consider during the Recess what steps may be taken to render the Act more accessible to the deserving class?

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, my attention has been called to the subject, particularly by my hon. Friend the Member for County Cork (Mr. Shaw), of the difficulties of the labourers in certain districts of Ireland, and after considering during the Recess what steps could be taken, I have only to say that I have no reason to despair of the subject. It is possible that the Act may be improved; but I am not able to say that we have in our minds any exact plan for that purpose. Any suggestion tendered by my hon. Friend, or any other person acquainted with the position of the labourers, will receive our careful attention.

Sir H. Drummond Wolff

NAVY—LAUNCH OF H.M.S. "COLOSSUS."

SIR H. DRUMMOND WOLFF asked the Secretary to the Admiralty, Why the workmen who were employed from half-past one and three o'clock in the morning in preparing for the launch of the "Colossus" were not paid overtime in accordance with custom; and, whether the Admiralty considers that an allowance of only the same time as was worked during the nights in question is fair to the men concerned?

MR. TREVELYAN: Sir, the time given in lieu of extra time worked at night exceeds the actual time worked by one-third. That is the rule, and it, no doubt, was observed on this occasion; and, if it was not, I will see that it is made up. These details are in the hands of the Admiral Superintendent; but if the matter had been referred to the Admiralty, the Board would not have refused the payment of the work in money instead of in time.

TUNIS—COMPENSATION TO BRITISH SUBJECTS.

SIR MICHAEL HICKS - BEACH asked the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Whether any compensation has been awarded by the French Government to Mr. T. L. Smith, a British subject farming at Matu, near Tunis, for injury to his crops and farm in the year 1881; and, whether any Papers on the subject can be laid upon the Table?

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE: Sir, Her Majesty's Ambassador at Paris has brought Mr. Smith's case before the French Government with a view to the re-consideration of his claim for compensation, or the reference of it to arbitration. No reply has yet been received; but the Papers will be included in the general Correspondence which will ultimately be laid upon the Table with regard to British claims for losses sustained in Tunis.

IRELAND—MR. PARNELL—REPRESENTATION OF LIVERPOOL.

MR. SEXTON said, that in the absence of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, he wished to ask the Head of Her Majesty's Government, Whether his attention had been called to a correspondence between Mr. Thomas Evans and the Chief Secretary for Ireland, with reference to the request on the part of some of the electors of Liverpool to visit Kilmainham next Friday or Saturday to present an address to Mr. Parnell with reference to the representation of Liverpool; whether they were not right in appealing to the central Government, and not to the gaolers, to give a direct reply to the appeal?

MR. GLADSTONE said, that he had no knowledge whatever of this subject, nor could he undertake to answer in the absence of the Chief Secretary for Ireland. The right hon. Gentleman would, he had no doubt, give full consideration to this matter, and he had no doubt that these gentlemen were entitled to appeal to the Chief Secretary for Ireland, and to have the answer of the responsible Government on the subject.

CUSTOMS DEPARTMENT—RECENT APPOINTMENTS—MR. WALPOLE.

MR. O'DONNELL asked Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, with reference to an alleged necessity of appointing to the post of Secretary of the Customs a person having qualifications outside the ordinary experience of the Customs, Whether Mr. Walpole, the assistant-secretary, has performed most important duties outside the ordinary experience of the Customs; whether Mr. Walpole has represented this Country in three conferences abroad; whether Mr. Walpole's services on those occasions received the marked approval of two successive Secretaries of State for Foreign Affairs and of Her Majesty's Government; and, whether it is true that the sugar trade, which was the industry represented at those conferences, signified to Her Majesty's Government their warm acknowledgments of the ability and zeal displayed by Mr. Walpole in those negotiations; also, with reference to the alleged advancement of Mr. Walpole to a salary of £1,000 per annum, in compensation for the introduction of Mr. Herbert Murray into the Secretaryship of the Board of Customs, whether, since Mr. Walpole's salary already figures on the Estimates for the current year at £925, rising to £1,000, the Treasury, in awarding Mr. Walpole the immediate salary of £1,000, together with a gift of about £150, has fairly compensated that gentleman for the loss of the Secretaryship, and the other members of the Secretary's staff for the loss of their promotion?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GLADSTONE): Sir, this Question is founded on a misapprehension. So far as I know, the duties upon which Mr. Walpole was engaged on various occasions were inside, and not outside, the ordinary duties of his office, though not within the routine of those duties. With regard to his services, and the acknowledgment of them by Secretaries of State, I am not in a position to answer that part of the Question, nor could it be answered without laborious search in the Department. With respect to the approval of his ability and zeal by the members of the sugar trade, it may be so, but I am not able to say. I should not, however, attach very much importance to that, as the trade has been actuated by very peculiar views of these proceedings as to the sugar duties. It is true that Mr. Walpole has taken part in several conferences—three, I think—and that his conduct has been approved by the Treasury. With regard to the latter Question of the hon. Member, it is absolutely necessary that the Government should take their stand on this position, that however desirous they may be to promote from within a Department, the public interests absolutely require that they should retain in their own hands the power of making appointments from the outside.

MR. O'DONNELL asked whether the clerks in the Customs Department had memorialized the Treasury, protesting against the appointment of a stranger, and whether the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer would lay a Copy of the Memorial on the Table of the House?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (MR. GLADSTONE): Sir, I have received that Memorial, but I am not at all prepared to say I should lay it on the Table. I do not think it would be a good precedent in the working of the Executive Government.

MR. O'DONNELL gave Notice that he would move for the production of the Memorial, and also for Copies of the strong expressions of approval of Mr. Walpole's conduct by his official superiors.

PRISONS (IRELAND)—CLONMEL GAOL.

MR. HEALY wished to know whether the Solicitor General for Ireland could now give any information respecting the outbreak of fever in Clonmel Gaol, and whether it had spread through the cells?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER), in reply, said, he had not all the information on the subject; but he could state that the recent case of fever was a mild one, and the patient had been removed to the fever hospital, out of the prison altogether. An inspection of the prison had been made by competent sanitary authorities, and the cause of the disease had been traced to an obstruction in one of the closets, which was situated in a part of the gaol remote from the place where the prisoners were now confined. Arrangements had been made to prevent any danger arising to the prisoners.

MR. HEALY inquired whether the warders had not caught the infection, and whether, under all the circumstances of the case, the "suspects" are to be detained there?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER) said, there was no case of fever in the prison at present. There had been only three cases, one a "suspect," another an ordinary prisoner, and the third a warder.

MR. HEALY: What is the date of the last case?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. PORTER): The last case was on the 29th of March, and the patient had been removed to the fever hospital outside the gaol. The report of the Sanitary Inspector was that there was no danger to those inside the prison.

ASIATIC TURKEY—SMYRNA QUAY—

In reply to Mr. M'Coan,

SIR CHARLES W. DILKE said, the delay in the production of the Papers relating to Smyrna Quay arose from the fact that it was found necessary to make some slight change in the Report. They would be ready not later than Monday, and he would endeavour to send advance copies to the hon. Member and to right hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MOTION.

PARLIAMENT — ADJOURNMENT OF THE HOUSE—THE EASTER RECESS.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That this House, at its rising, do adjourn until Monday 17th April.—(Mr. Gladstone.)

CRIME (IRELAND).—OBSERVATIONS.

MR. GORST, in rising to call attention to the proceedings at the recent Assizes in Ireland, and to the evidence thereby afforded of the increase of agrarian crime and the general collapse in the administration of justice, and to ask Her Majesty's Government what steps they proposed to take in relation thereto, said, it was of the utmost importance that the truth about the present state of things in Ireland should be known, not only to the Members of Her Majesty's Government, but to the House and to the country. The facts which he intended to lay before the House were, he ventured to say, new to the great majority of Members, and, at all events, to the majority of the people of this country. The first step towards the inauguration of a better policy in Ireland was to obtain full and accurate information of the state of things in that country, to look at the facts fairly in the face; and if the supporters of Her Majesty's Government had been for the last 18 months living in a "fool's Paradise," the sooner they got out of it the better for themselves and for the country. Now, the facts he was about to adduce rested on the best of all evidence—namely, the statements of the Judges, made not for political purposes, but in the discharge of their regular official duty, and from the sworn testimony of witnesses called in the Courts of Justice during the last Assizes. In County Longford, Lord Justice Deasy found at the late Assizes 98 cases, as against 75 in the preceding year; and of these 98 cases, 3 were cases of firing at the person, 9 of arson, 13 of malicious injury to property, 5 of obtaining forcible possession, and 6 of stealing cattle. The Judge said that in a few cases only was the Crown able to bring forward any evidence. In County Clare, on March 7, Mr. Justice Barry said that there extensively prevailed a spirit of insubordination, and lawlessness manifested itself in crime and outrage. There was an absence, not of crime, but of criminals being made amenable. In that county there were 356 cases of agrarian outrage, as against 127 in the preceding year; but as this latter number represented the crime of four months only, while 356 was the number for eight months, the Judge corrected his statement by saying that the proper comparison would be between 856 and 254 outrages. In Leitrim, Chief Justice May found some signs of improvement; but one of the cases brought before him was that in which Keegan, an old man, had been attacked and half roasted alive. The prisoner pleaded "Not Guilty." The sworn evidence of Michael Keegan, who was described as a feeble-looking old man, was as follows:—

"I reside near Cloone. I remember the 12th of August last, on which day I was working for Mr. Houston, a land bailiff. About 4 o'clock next morning the door of my house was knocked in, when I heard a voice calling on me to come down. I went down into the kitchen, where I saw 10 or 11 men with both guns and pistols in their hands. They put me on my knees and kicked me several times. The barrel of a pistol was two or three times thrust into my mouth. I then got a blow from a gun on the back, and was knocked down. The party then took the fire out of the fireplace and spread it on the floor. They then pulled me off my knees and put me over the burning coals. My shirt then caught fire. I then received a deep gash across the breast about seven inches long. I also received other wounds. My grandson, while I was over the fire, tried to tear off a portion of my burning garment, when he got a blow from one of the party which rendered him senseless. One of the party then said to him, 'What made you go to cut the meadows?'"

The Judge said it was a sad state of things that such a crime should be committed in any community. The jury then retired, and after an absence of some hours were discharged, on their stating that there was not the slightest probability of their agreeing to a verdict. In the county of Louth, Mr. Justice Lawson commented on the increase of offences committed with a view to prevent people paying their rents, and observed that no persons were made amenable for those offences. In the great county of Tipperary, Mr. Justice Fitzgibbon observed that in the North Riding there were 159 agrarian crimes this year, against 75 in the preceding year, an increase of more than double; and that in the South Riding there were

230 agrarian crimes, against 106 in the preceding year, the proportion being considerably more than double. Therefore, in the whole of the county the total number of agrarian crimes in the present year was 389, against 181 in the previous year. The Judge noticed not only the increase in the actual number of offences, but the alarming character of the increase of the more serious kinds of crime—for instance, the wilful injury, killing, and maiming of cattle, which had grown from 13 in the preceding to 48 in the present year; firing with intent to murder; breaking into dwellings at night, which had increased from 20 last year to 63 in the present year, or more than three-fold; and the Grand Jury, at the close of the Assizes, made a formal presentment to the Court, in which they said—

"The Grand Jury wish to draw the attention of Her Majesty's Government to the alarming increase of the so-called 'Boycotting' in the South Riding of the County Tipperary, whereby men of all classes are affected and obstructed in their legitimate business, isolated, and deprived of the very necessities of life. The Grand Jury respectfully suggest the necessity of making 'Boycotting' a malicious injury, giving the sufferer the usual claim for compensation, or stamping it out by such other measures as Her Majesty's Government may deem fit. They would further suggest that the cost of the extra police in disturbed districts should be placed on smaller areas than counties, and also that compensation be given for injury to the person."

He made no comment on these things, because in cases of the kind comment was needless. In the county of Westmeath, Mr. Justice Fitzgerald said that there were 86 criminal offences, against 84 in the previous year, and that in the whole 86 evidence was forthcoming only in two cases of a petty character. In the county of Limerick, Baron Dowse said that, leaving out of consideration the Winter Assizes altogether, he found that 315 criminal offences had been specially reported to the police, against 244 in the preceding year; that out of the 315 cases there were 246 in which offenders were not known, and there were some 300 persons who refused to give information to the police or make any deposition. In only 65 out of the 315 cases were there any persons charged. In the county of Kilkenny, Judge Harrison found 50 cases, against 39 in the preceding year. In King's County, Chief Justice Morris said that there were 184 serious cases, of which 83 were threatening letters; and as they had heard a good deal in that House about such letters, perhaps he should be excused if he read the observations of the learned Judge. Chief Justice Morris said—

“Since the last Summer Assizes no less than 184 serious cases are reported to me on the list furnished to me by your County Inspector, a gentleman with whom I have been long and favourably acquainted. That list contains no less than 83 cases of threatening letters—ranging over every species of business that it is almost possible to conceive—threatening to murder, threats of violence, threats of various kinds connected with the various relations of life that must exist in a large and busy community. Gentlemen, sometimes persons of great courage—one of whom I do not profess to be, having merely ordinary fair courage—persons of great courage sometimes suggest that they do not mind threatening letters at all. Well, possibly, when these threatening letters are not seen to be accompanied by any effects, a person may, to a certain extent, possibly arrive at such a conclusion; but when I find that since the last Assizes no less than seven persons have been fired at with, apparently, intent to murder, at various times and in various places—when two of the persons so fired at are members, if not of your Grand Jury, at least of other Grand Juries—when, in four cases out of seven, the person fired at was more or less wounded—in three cases they escaped altogether—when I add as a commentary upon these threatening letters that there have been 46 cases of burning houses, four of hay and other property, that there have been various cases of other malicious injuries to property, and of firing into houses with intent to intimidate—when all these are remembered, I can only sum up this melancholy list by stating that it amounts to 184 cases.”

In the county of Sligo, Judge Ormsby found 138 agrarian crimes, against 97 in the preceding year. In the county of Cavan, Mr. Justice Fitzgerald found 158 cases, against 125 in the previous year. The offenders in 100 of these cases had not been made amenable. There had been 15 or 16 cases of successfully taking away arms, and hardly any of them had been discovered. In the Queen's County, Judge Fitzgerald found 62 cases, against 21 in the preceding year. There were 26 of threatening letters, 2 of murder, 2 of letters threatening absolutely to murder—letters of a very dangerous character—2 of firing at the person with a view to murder, and 2 of assaulting dwellings at night; and the learned Judge especially called attention to a most atrocious case—the murder of a man named Martin Rogers. He said—

terized by great audacity. It took place in a populous neighbourhood, between 12 and 1 o'clock on the 3rd of December last, near Rathdowney, on the borders of Kilkenny. The unfortunate murdered man had local knowledge—he had been clerk to an eminent solicitor—here. He had gone to reside in Dublin to pursue his vocation there till he was induced to come down here on the 2nd of December last to serve four writs in this county, as the local process-servers could not be prevailed upon to do so. This young man came down to serve these writs, which were not ejectments, but were intended simply to enforce the payment of rents. He was a small infirm young man. He had lost the use of the right arm. His very helplessness ought to have been his defence, for he was incapable of defending himself. He was offered the protection of the Constabulary; and his reply was—‘I know the county well; I do not need protection.’ He went and delivered a copy of the writ at each of the four houses. One of the parties charged is a person named Bergin, who is accused of being active in the murder. His house, I collect from the informations, was the last served—the murder, at all events, took place very near his house. This murder must have been witnessed by a number of individuals in the locality; I daresay any one of them could tell every circumstance connected with it; but one of the lamentable features of the case is, that no one in the vicinity of the occurrence will give the hand of the law the slightest assistance. On the other hand, those who have been examined have obviously endeavoured to mislead justice. I gather from that, that there is not only sympathy with crime, but that there is a disposition to defend the murderers. The evidence to come before you will be that of a man who represents that he was actually passing up at the time of the murder. He says he saw two men coming from the one direction, and three from the other, and that, being alarmed, he concealed himself behind a ditch where he was not seen, and from that position he deposes that he saw the murder perpetrated. He says that the five persons accused were the persons engaged in the murder. He described in a graphic manner what occurred—says that the young man cried for assistance and for mercy, and then he said he heard no more. The body of the murdered young man lay on the roadside. The police came and found his head literally battered to pieces. They found there stones with which the murder had been perpetrated. The medical man made a post mortem examination, and he found several extensive fractures of the head, which had been battered. The unfortunate young man had endeavoured to ward off the blows; but so outrageous was the assault made on him, that they fractured his arm in more than one place, and also the fingers of his hand.”

Perhaps the House would remember a similar case of murder at Lough Mask, which must have been witnessed by several persons, not one of whom came forward to give evidence; and it was not until three weeks after the murder that the place where the bodies were deposited was discovered. Mr. Justice

Barry found there were 379 agrarian cases reported by the police, a decrease upon the number of the preceding year ; but the Judge thought proper to call special attention to two cases which had happened since the list was made out, the details of which, he said, would horrify Christendom. An armed party visited a person suspected of having paid his rent, or committed some other offence against some secret organization. The man was shot dead, his wife had her thigh shot away, and a poor girl who struggled to protect her father was beaten and injured in a most savage manner. It was, said the Judge, a most humiliating thing for an Irishman who loved his country to have to state these occurrences in open Court. Within the last two nights, he continued, another man was shot through the window of his house because he was suspected of having paid his rent. At the same Assizes a very remarkable case was heard, in which a man named Jeremiah Mahony was charged with posting threatening notices. The prisoner was caught, as it were, red-handed. There was not the slightest doubt about the case. The jury returned into Court, and stated that if they were locked up for three days they would not agree ; and then one of the jury—Mr. A. E. Herbert—intervening, complained that one of the jurors said if kept for a week he would not agree to a verdict. Since the report of that case, Mr. A. E. Herbert had been murdered, his flocks slaughtered, and at his burial the people would not provide a rope to lower his coffin into the grave ; and so violent was the revenge against him, that it was feared his grave would be outraged. In Roscommon, Chief Justice Morris found 84 cases, against 30 in the preceding year, and he called attention to a horrible case of murder, where a man, named Brennan, was shot dead in his own house ; and what was his offence ? It was that his brother was supposed to have paid his rent. The Judge described this case as frightfully horrible. Another man was assassinated because he was called upon to collect the seed rate. What must be the state of feeling among the lower orders in Ireland when men were assassinated for such things ? In the county of Cork, Baron Dowse stated that there were no less than 375 cases reported to the Constabulary, including 45 cases of threatening to murder, 32 cases of arson, and 2 of murder, besides cases of malicious injury, treason-felony, unlawful assembly, and riot. In the West Riding of Cork there were 372 cases very much of the same class of offences ; and out of the whole number of 659 cases in the two Ridings, only 21 were not of an agrarian character. In Donegal, Lord Justice Deasy found 105, against 45 in the preceding year. In almost every case tried, the prisoner was acquitted or the jury discharged without finding a verdict. In Mayo, there was a clear case in connection with cutting off the ears of a man named Nolan. Nolan himself gave evidence, as well as his wife and son ; but the prisoners set up an alibi in each case, and they were all acquitted. Prisoners sometimes behaved in an extraordinary manner. There was a case in which Patrick Fahy was indicted for assaulting a process-server heard at the Mayo Assizes. Baron Dowse said there was no doubt the prisoner was guilty, but that if he pleaded guilty he would be allowed to stand out on his own recognizance. After consultation with the solicitor for the prisoner, the counsel for the defence said they would leave the case to the jury. Baron Dowse said that was the first time he ever heard of such an offer being refused. But the jury, without leaving the box, found the prisoner "Not Guilty," and he was discharged. Not only was the disease apparently on the increase in those counties where it had existed before, but it seemed to be spreading, because he found in the county of Londonderry, where the Land League was not very powerful, Baron Fitzgerald found 49 cases, as compared with 15 in the preceding year, and in more than half of these cases, a majority of them being cases of malicious destruction of property, no person had been arrested or made amenable. In Wicklow, the cases were 69, against 40 in the preceding year, and Mr. Justice Harrison called attention to the increase, and said that Wicklow had hitherto been free from the disease. Allusion had been made on a former occasion to the observations of Mr. Nelligan, one of the most efficient Criminal Judges in Ireland, who, at a trial in the King's County, finding that the jury would not agree in one of the plainest and simplest cases that had ever come before him, said the system of trial by jury was on its trial, and that if a King's County jury could not agree after such evidence, it had been reduced to an absurdity. One of the jurors then said—

"Your Honour, if I had to sit here until 12 o'clock at night, I would not agree."

Whereupon Mr. Neligan said—

"Then trial by jury is reduced to an absurdity. If you cannot come to a decision, I must decline to try any more criminal cases;"

and, addressing the Crown Solicitor, he directed him to send them to the Assizes. In Galway, Lord Chief Justice May said the number of outrages reported was 360, against 335 for the preceding year, and that in only 30 cases had persons been made amenable to justice. The Lord Chief Justice, furthermore, in his address to the Grand Jury, said—

"There was no doubt the country was in an unsound and disorganized state; but he trusted the powers of this great Empire would be so exercised as to put a stop to a condition of things that was a disgrace to any civilized community."

He had strictly confined himself to the statements of the Judges and the evidence of sworn witnesses; but he could not help referring to a recent case, which every Member of the House must have read with horror, as confirming the impression made by the history of the recent Assizes, in which an innocent lady, resident in Dublin, when on a visit to her brother-in-law in Westmeath, was shot dead on Sunday when returning from church. While there could be no doubt as to the deplorable condition of Ireland, there might be a difference of opinion as to how far the evil was due to the policy pursued by the Government. In connection with that question, a speech delivered in that House by the hon. Member for Tipperary (Mr. Dillon) possessed a peculiar significance. It was delivered, he might say, at the time when the Chief Secretary for Ireland shadowed forth in somewhat ambiguous phrases the policy of mingled coercion and conciliation pursued by the Government for the past 18 months. The hon. Member for Tipperary said—

"The statement which they had heard from the Chief Secretary for Ireland was a new and remarkable departure from the line of policy pursued by the Government. . . . He only promised protection to the Irish tenant in the event of circumstances arising which would cause him to introduce a Coercion Act. He said that it was only when there was a prospect of disturbance he would bring in such a measure; but he had forgotten that it ~~must~~ ^{ought} be the duty of Irish Members to ~~their~~ ^{their} constituents to get up such a condition of affairs as would force the right hon. Gentleman to give the other Act which he had promised, even if he had to pass a Coercion Act. Never had such an extraordinary promise been laid before Parliament by a Minister as to say that what he could not do before Parliament rose he would do, if his hands were forced, in Ireland during the Recess. . . . What use was there in putting a premium on disturbance?" — [3 Hansard, cclv. 2040.]

Most people would consider that the policy of coercion and conciliation—coercion neutralized by conciliation, and conciliation neutralized by coercion—had failed. He understood the Chief Secretary for Ireland himself to admit that it had, at least, partially failed; and the distinction made by the right hon. Gentleman was remarkable. He said the Coercion Act had failed to maintain law and order; but it had been successful in enabling them to destroy the power of Mr. Parnell and his associates, and the government that they had thereby exercised over the Irish people. It was a strange confession that the partial success of the policy of the Government should have been due, not to the Land Act, but to the Coercion Act. Now, if the Chief Secretary for Ireland were in his place, he would probably reply by saying he should be very much obliged if the House would tell him what to do. The Prime Minister took a more accurate view of his duties and responsibilities. He would admit that a private Member had fulfilled his duty in laying the facts of the case before the House. It was no part of his duty to make any suggestions to the Government as to what measures they should adopt to combat an evil which was described by Lord Chief Justice May as a disgrace to civilization. He had no desire to draw the Government into hasty explanations. He did not expect an immediate answer to the question of what policy they were now going to pursue in Ireland. The matter was urgent; but everyone would willingly give the Government the Easter Recess to think over it and mature their plans. He believed, however, that as soon as Parliament re-assembled after the Easter Recess the country would expect from the Government some clear declaration of their Irish policy—some declaration which would not be made in the ambiguous language of the Chief Secretary for Ireland when he thought aloud in that House; but in the shape of clear and well-defined measures which the Government would lay on the Table of the House, and to which they would ask the assent of Parliament. Unless the Government pursued some course of that kind, and made some proposal to cope with the terrible state of things in Ireland which he had described, he thought everyone would admit that they had not done their duty either to the House or to the country.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, considering the extreme gravity of the facts cited by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst), I cannot express either wonder or surprise at his having brought them under the notice of the House. But I do regret that the warning that this subject was to be brought forward was not given when my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland was in his place in this House, so that he could have been present to have given a complete view of the state of Ireland, and not when my right hon. Friend had quitted his place in this House in order to resume his place in Ireland, and to perform his very serious duties there——

MR. GORST: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon. I gave the Notice at the Sitting of the House yesterday, when the Chief Secretary for Ireland was present.

MR. GLADSTONE: I certainly had been under the belief that my right Friend had quitted the House before Notice of the hon. and learned Gentleman's statement was given; but, certainly, my right hon. Friend had framed all his plans for returning to Ireland. In any case, I do not think that so very grave a challenge, winding up with a statement that, in the opinion of the hon. and learned Member, the Government must, at a certain time which he thinks fit, declare their policy and plans for Ireland, I do not think such a proposition was wisely or conveniently brought forward after Notice of less than 24 hours. My right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary for Ireland would have been most anxious to have been in his place had it been in his power; and undoubtedly it would have been exceedingly desirable that he should have been here, inasmuch as the hon. and learned Gentleman has made pointed reference, not unnaturally, to the declarations made by my right hon. Friend. In the absence of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, it is my duty to give a brief outline or view of the state of facts in Ireland. I think that on certain points I might perhaps say that the hon. and learned Gentleman has coloured them in language that even exaggerates the most grave, nay, the enormous, mischiefs which prevail; as, for example, when he described—if I understood him rightly—the threatening letters as in themselves forming a class of serious offences.

MR. GORST: I only quoted the language of the learned Judge to whom I referred.

MR. GLADSTONE: I beg the hon. and learned Member's pardon. If it is the language of the Judge, I must take the liberty of noticing what I think is some error in the language of the Judge. But it has been taken up, adopted, and repeated in the most distinct manner by the hon. and learned Gentleman. This is a very grave matter. Nothing is to be gained by over-colouring it. I have no disposition to reduce this matter below the tone which it merits. Threatening letters are an evil in Ireland; they are undoubtedly the sign of a disturbed state of society, and they are occasionally connected with the actual commission of crime. But I think it is an over-statement on the part of the hon. and learned Member, or on the part of the Judge whose language and sentiments he has adopted, to describe them as falling into the class of serious criminal offences. The hon. and learned Member has likewise laboured under the difficulty, for which I do not blame him, of not being able to draw a correct distinction between the state of agrarian crime and the state of crime which is not agrarian. Therefore, in what I have to say I shall not follow the precise course of the hon. and learned Member in referring to county by county, but state what I believe to be the condition of agrarian crime in Ireland generally. Now, the hon. and learned Member, if he does in some respects draw a darker view than mine, draws in other respects a lighter view of the state of Ireland. My contention is, that the Government of the country has had, since the foundation of the Land League, to deal with a state of things in Ireland entirely different from any that had been known there for 50 years, and that when you go back for 50 years what you find is a miniature of the operations which have been going on for the last three or four years—I mean that the resistance to tithe, which completely defeated the Government of that day, with all its means, and the Parliament of that day, was, after all, but a miniature of the resistance to rent which has been the basis of the present movement. It was with the greatest astonishment the other day that, when referring to this subject, and attempting to draw a distinction between a political and a social revolution, I heard an hon. Member opposite say they were the same thing. I cannot imagine the state of mind, the state of political vision, of a person who thinks that a political and a social revolution are the same thing. With a political revolution we have ample strength to cope. There is no reason why our cheeks should grow pale, or why our hearts should sink, at the idea of grappling with a political revolution. The strength of this country is tenfold what is required for such a purpose. But a social revolution is a very different matter; and I am grieved to say that, in my opinion, a large number of hon. Members who sit opposite, and among them the hon. and learned Member for Chatham, obviously have not appreciated the gravity of this social revolution. The hon. and learned Member says it may be a fair subject for difference of opinion whether or how far the present state of things in Ireland is owing or is not owing to the Government; and by all means let the hon. and learned Member accuse the conduct of the present Government on this matter or that; but if he could make good every one of his accusations, he would be far, indeed, from showing that he had measured the gravity of the case, or had comprehended what kind of a movement really has been going on in Ireland. Sir, the seat and source of this movement is not to be found during the time the present Government has been in power. It is to be looked for in the foundation of the Land League. The Land League was founded on the doctrine, not of “no rent,” but the arbitrary choice of rent; and the right to dissolve and break contracts was proclaimed. No measures were taken against this League—no measures were taken against this doctrine. I am most unwilling to refer in his absence—I do it only historically—to Mr. Parnell; but the plans of that Gentleman were distinctly declared and announced, as far as their principles were concerned, long before this Government came into Office, and Mr. Parnell remained at large. Certain persons were apprehended, but their trials were not prosecuted with the vigour and the expedition that might have been used by the Executive Government. These are facts which cannot be shaken. I do not intend to make them the subject of severe imputation, because I admit that it was difficult to judge. [A laugh.] An hon. Member opposite jeers at that; but the subject is really one too serious for me to be turned aside by the manner in which the hon. Member may think fit to receive observations of very great gravity which I make on my responsibility. This is a far larger question than the conduct of any Government. I do not make it a subject of severe censure that the late Government did not foresee the magnitude to which the Land League was to grow, or how it was to take a hold upon the minds of the people of Ireland over a circle infinitely wider than any which has been touched by any movement for the last 50 years. I admit the difficulty of the case, and I do not wish to reflect upon them for it. But at the time when this Government came into Office the Land League was firmly and well established in the land; it had held 200 meetings for its purposes; and the only instrument which had slipped from our hands, inasmuch as only 10 days were left us for the renewal of the Act, was the Peace Preservation Act. I see the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir Stafford Northcote) smiles. He need not think I am going to make much of this. The only instrument was a Peace Preservation Act, with respect to which I say—that whether it were renewed or whether it were not renewed, was a question infinitely small and insignificant with reference to this great social revolution. The Land League had been founded under the Peace Preservation Act; Mr. Parnell's declarations had been made under the Peace Preservation Act; the Land League had grown and thriven and planted its roots firmly in different quarters of the land under the Peace

Preservation Act; and to say that the non-renewal of that Act was a great and important fact in connection with this controversy indicates a state of mind which wholly fails to appreciate the gravity of the issues before us. I cannot but think that hon. Gentlemen would have lifted themselves above the level on which they have been content to stand had they clearly appreciated the character of this social revolution, and had they been content to fall back on that remarkable declaration of the Duke of Wellington, which I never quoted in this House last year, because it would then have been mischievous, but which it is right and safe now to quote—that warning which he gave to King George IV.—that if ever the time came when there was a war against rent and tithes, the Government would be reduced to extremities, and would have no resources to bring to bear against such a movement. These, Sir, were the circumstances in which we have made a claim on our political opponents; but on the reply to that claim I will not make any observation whatever, except to say that I gladly acknowledge, and have acknowledged in this House, the character of one speech made by the junior Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Gibson) at the commencement of this Session which completely answers, as far as we are concerned, to the demand that we made. As to the doctrine laid down by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) at the close of his speech about our policy of mingled coercion and conciliation and about the responsibility of the present Government for the state of Ireland, I will not at present say anything further; but I will give my view of the state of Ireland. The hon. and learned Member brought forward the dark side of the picture only. He did not bring forward the whole case. Nor can I undertake to state the whole case; but I will give an enumeration of its principal features. The hon. and learned Member might have borne in mind that active resistance to the enforcement of the law—I am now mentioning the more favourable circumstances of the case—has ceased in Ireland. So far as I know, it can hardly be said to exist. The payment of rent in that country has been largely and extensively going on; and it is in the power of those who desire to assert their legal claims—if they have no other means of doing it—to enforce them by the law. The action of the Land Act, to which my right hon. Friend the Chief Secretary of Ireland, in common with myself, looks as constituting our principal reliance, is daily quickening in extent and laying its hold upon a continuously increasing proportion of the people. We have, in fact, for six months been engaged in—there is no mistake about it—a deadly conflict with an adverse power; and considering that the object of that power was to put an end to the payment of rent, and considering the announcements which were made in other days as to the position in which the Government would be placed when once an organization for that purpose was established, I do not think that we have, on the whole, great reason to be dissatisfied with the progress that has been made in confronting and in conflicting with that adverse power; because, as to its main and principal object, putting an end to the payment of rent, in the terms of the “no rent” manifesto, I will not say absolutely that it has failed, but it has certainly not succeeded, and the power of the Executive and of the Law has made considerable way against it. On the other hand, the hon. and learned Gentleman is perfectly justified in most of the features of the picture he has drawn. It is true that in regard to agrarian crimes, of which alone I speak, we witness the painful spectacle of disagreeing juries and of the escape of offenders. It is true—and it is a marked feature of the case—that there is a most painful character attaching to the present outrages in relation to the causes for which they are inflicted. They are generally inflicted, not because the persons who are the objects of them exercise their rights, but simply because they perform their duty; and it is hardly possible to conceive anything more grievous than a state of things in which that is the case. It is true that there is, I am afraid, on the whole, an aggravation in some degree in the character of the outrages committed, if we compare them with what they were 18 months ago. It is also true that there is an increase in the quantity of those outrages, according to the standard which the hon. and learned Member has adopted. He has followed the figures,

I have no doubt, with fidelity, as supplied in the reports of the Assizes. But I do think that those figures fail to convey a full view of the case. We have before us the Reports of Agrarian Offences in the first three months of the present year. One feature of those Reports is the exceedingly large proportion of threatening letters; and, so far as that goes, it is not an aggravation, but a mitigation of their character. But I do not, on the whole, say that the character of the outrages is mitigated. Nor do I think it unnatural that they should become more cruel and severe, guilty as they may be, in proportion to the desperation of those who commit them, and of the persons by whom they may be encouraged. The obvious standard of comparison would be the three first months of last year; but that would not be quite a fair standard, because there can be no doubt that, from whatever cause, at the commencement of last year, there was an almost exceptional reduction of outrages. If we go so far back as last December, and compare that with the previous December, before Parliament met, and the plans of the Government were matured, we find a satisfactory reduction. Since last December the number of outrages has continued without any very great variation, but the case appeared to be rather worse for a time. Whether or not that was owing to a temporary influence arising from the consideration in the House of the Protection of Person and Property Act I cannot say. Subject to that qualification, I do not at all wish the House to suppose that we are otherwise than deeply impressed with the unsatisfactory state of outrages. There is another point in the outrages to which the hon. and learned Member did not refer, and which appears to me to be by far the gravest subject—the absence of evidence that the outrages in Ireland are not associated with some influence behind them higher than that which belongs to those who commit the outrages. It is not for me to explain that influence; but, undoubtedly, I should be very glad to be assured that the funds of the Land League were not made available for the commission of the outrages. I only know one instance in which the subject has been directly mentioned in this House. It was not long after the commencement of the present Session that my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland alluded to a case in which money had been sent down from Dublin to a place where Assizes were held for the purpose of defending one of those who I believe were associated with "Captain Moonlight." My right hon. and learned Friend stated on his own knowledge that the counsel for the prisoner had received a fee of 100 guineas; and he asked in the face of the House whether that 100 guineas was or was not contributed from the funds of the Land League? No answer has ever been made to that question. I hope it will be answered; but when we consider what has taken place in Ireland, the language that has been held, the natural effect of that language upon uninstructed minds, the tendency of every movement of this kind to draw into its own channel and to imbue with its own spirit, that part of the population who are naturally the most restless or the most prone to crime, I cannot but say that I think it is in the power of some Gentlemen who regard themselves as more than any others the Representatives of the Irish people, to repress outrage; but, instead of doing much in that direction, they appear to me to be doing nothing at all. There is quoted in a journal of this morning a letter of the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy)—I refer to it in order that it may be denied if not true—in which he says—

"I look upon the English in Ireland as a gang of brigands, whose rule has degraded, and whose actions have impoverished our country; and the captain of the gang is W. E. Forster —"

MR. HEALY: The major portion of the quotation is accurate, but what I said about the captain of the gang came on a later part of the speech.

MR. GLADSTONE: The report has, no doubt, been compressed. But what must be the effect of this sort of language in Ireland—language which holds up to the people in Ireland all the agents of the Government and of the law as being English and as being a gang of brigands? If the Government and the agents of the Government are a gang of brigands, then resistance to the Government is lawful and right, and if that resistance cannot be carried on in the open field then no very great blame would attach to those who carried on the resistance in secret. If the Government are the enemies of society, those who resist the Government have, at all events, some title to be considered as the friends of society. If language of this kind does not directly lead people to the commission of crimes as horrible as those quoted by the hon. and learned Gentleman, it brings them dangerously near the commission of those crimes. When other passions, perhaps private passions, are all in a state of susceptibility, and when stimulants of this kind are administered, I cannot but say that, in my opinion, that item which the hon. and learned Gentleman has omitted from his case is by far the most formidable feature in it—namely, the sadly strong presumption that behind the commission of these outrages there are influences at work higher than any that belong to those who commit them. I will endeavour to give a fair and rapid view of the state of Ireland, so far as I am able to give it. It is by no means one of an unqualified character. I think that the means and materials for improvement are working powerfully in the country. I think that as regards outrage we can say that the condition of the country is anything but highly satisfactory. The hon. and learned Gentleman says it would be our duty to make proposals in the matter immediately after the Easter Recess. I am much obliged to him for advising the Government as to the time they should select for announcing their proposals on a subject of this character; but it must be obvious to the House that it is the duty of the Government to choose that time for themselves. No man can suppose that, after a measure so exceptional and remarkable as that of last year, we can pass on through the present year, or pass onwards to the time for the expiration of that measure, without bringing the whole matter before the House, and making known to the House what proposals we may think necessary, or the reasons why such and such proposals are not made; but as to the time for that declaration, we must reserve that to ourselves. We cannot accept from the hon. and learned Gentleman the indication of that time. He is not responsible. We are responsible; and we are sensible of the gravity of that responsibility. I believe it is the gravest that has ever rested on the shoulders of any Government with respect to Ireland since the great war of resistance to the tithes. I think it was, to a certain extent, on the shoulders of the late Government, and they were but little conscious of it; although I am not making that a matter of accusation or complaint. We, at any rate, ought to be conscious of it by this time, and we shall act, I hope, as men who are conscious of that responsibility. Most certainly neither the Chief Secretary for Ireland nor myself should be guilty of such dereliction of our duties, and attempt to throw on the right hon. and learned Gentleman, or others, the burden of suggesting what measures, remedial or otherwise, may be necessary for dealing with the state of Ireland. The responsibility belongs to us; we recognize the difficulty, and we must choose our own time and the method of performance. The hon. and learned Gentleman will see that no advantage would be gained by my attempting to anticipate the period at the present moment; but I can assure the House that there is no disposition on our part to undervalue the gravity of the matter, and that as far as our thoughts and energies will carry us, we shall endeavour to apply them to the performance of one of the gravest duties that was ever incumbent upon any Government in this country.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE: I cannot but think, Sir, that the speech to which we have just listened is not only a disappointing, but, to some extent, an alarming speech. I must say that I think the opening remarks of the Prime Minister, and his comments on the course taken by my hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham in bringing this matter before the House, were rather unreasonable. Everybody must have felt that it was not to be expected that Parliament should separate at the present time and under the present circumstances, without some reference being made or some question being addressed to the Government on the condition of Ireland. Even if no Notice had been given, I think it would have been the duty of the Minister chiefly responsible for the government of Ireland to be in his place to answer questions. But the case is a great deal stronger than that, for my hon. and learned Friend gave Notice of his intention to call attention to this matter at a time when the Chief Secretary for Ireland was in his place, and I think we have a right to complain that the Chief Secretary for Ireland, unless prevented by very strong reasons, is not here to give some explanations upon a subject which interests, not only this House, but the whole country. Nobody can deny that there is upon this subject a feeling in the country of great anxiety on the one hand, and of great indignation on the other, excited by the reports we have from day to day, and statements made in the most formal and official manner, as to the condition of Ireland, and the insecurity of life and property that prevails in that country. My hon. and learned Friend has, I think, taken a course entirely consistent with his duty as a Member of Parliament in simply calling the attention of the Government in the most temperate manner, and because the most temperate therefore the most telling manner, to the state of things in that country. He says—"I will not endeavour to cast any blame upon the Government, but I will simply ask them this question—Are you prepared to deal with this state of things? Or will you be prepared to do so when the House re-assembles? Or what will you do?" It is natural that the Government should say that they require the Easter Recess to consider such a question as that, but it was in their power to materially qualify the statements made by my hon. and learned Friend. They have not only not qualified those statements—they have intensified them—they have given them a more serious character than they previously bore. What is the reply they make? It is to a certain extent an attempt to throw upon their Predecessors the blame for the existing state of things. I will not go into that, for I think it is unworthy to endeavour to divert attention from a question of such pressing importance as the existing state of things in Ireland by entering upon the question as to whether or not the Land League should have been prosecuted earlier. If the Government comes to comparisons, I think we could make not a bad case as compared to that of the present Government. But I leave that aspect of the case on one side, because it is blinding the House and the country to the real issue. The question before us is, whether the condition of that country is one compatible with the first demands of a civilized Government, and whether the Government will tell us that they are prepared, or when they will be prepared, to make proposals to remedy that state of affairs? I am told that a great deal can be said with regard to the difference between a political and a social revolution, and that if this were merely a political revolution, there would be no difficulty in dealing with it, but as it is a social revolution, the difficulties are great. But the more this case is different from a mere political revolution, the more necessary is it for us to ask ourselves—"What is this revolution that is going on? What is this evil of which we see the signs and concerning which we hear a good deal of vague and general language? How is it to be dealt with?" So far as we can gather from the Prime Minister, it is to be dealt with only by leaving it alone and leaving it to the operation of the Land Act. When we compared the state of crime now with that a year ago, we have always been told we were not making fair comparisons, because crime in former years was due to the state of the law. That has now been altered; there is an Act passed by the Government to meet the case, which, we are told, is working well—and yet, what do we see? Outrages have not only not diminished, but they have increased, and the state of the country is worse than ever. I think we have reason to apprehend from the language we have heard that even now Her Majesty's Government have not made up their minds to face the difficulty. If there is anything to be done they must be prepared to act and to act with vigour, founded upon conviction, without too much regard to the disagreeable taunts or obstacles which they may have to overcome. It cannot be pleasant for the Government—we know it cannot be pleasant for any Government—to have to deal with such a state of things. Still more, we feel how unpleasant it must be, how particularly mortifying it must be, to those who, in former times, have used such language with regard to the condition of Ireland and with regard to the mode in which they were going to deal with all the evils of Ireland to have to confess themselves wrong and to act in this matter. We call upon them—the country calls upon them—to show themselves equal to the emergency. I think the observations that have previously been made by the Prime Minister, and to a certain extent again to-day, to the effect that he does not receive the support that he ought to receive from his political opponents, and that he does not receive the support he ought from the landed gentry in Ireland, are beside the question, and are altogether unjustified. We have to thank my hon. and learned Friend for having called attention to this subject, and for the manner in which he has done so; and I must express my great disappointment at the tone and the substance of the answer he has received.

MR. JUSTIN M'CARTHY said, he had listened, as no doubt every Member of the House had listened, to the speech of the Prime Minister with the deepest attention. He was in hopes that they might receive from the right hon. Gentleman some idea or suggestion of what might possibly be a new development of his Irish policy. They had not received any such suggestion. He did not expect that the Prime Minister would state to the House the exact way in which he proposed to deal with Ireland. But he did think the right hon. Gentleman would acknowledge the utter failure of his coercion policy. His speech contained no suggestion or opinion of that kind. On the contrary, he seemed to be in the same state of mind as heretofore, and he seemed to show that the Government still thought all they had to do was to charge the disturbance in Ireland upon the Leaders of the Land League and their policy, and to ask the House to follow him in enacting any repressive measures which he might introduce. The right hon. Gentleman at the same time made a distinct charge, the most distinct, perhaps, they had yet heard made in the House, against the Leaders of the Land League in connection with outrages in Ireland. He said, in effect, and the words might as well have been spoken frankly, that he believed the outrages in Ireland were associated with some influence behind and higher than those who actually committed them; and he expressed a doubt whether funds collected for the Land League had not been applied in some cases to the encouragement of outrage. Well, he was not a member of the Executive of the Land League. He held no place whatever in its body, except that of an ordinary humble member; but those who were administering the affairs of the Land League he knew well. He knew what they did, and what their hopes and ambitions were with regard to Ireland; and he would say that there was not in that House any body of men against whom such a charge could be less justly brought than the Executive Committee of the Land League. They were men not one of whom was capable of having the slightest sympathy or part in the commission of outrage. From the Prime Minister himself down to the obscurest Member of the House, there was no man less likely to be guilty of such acts than every member of the Executive of the Land League in Ireland. That was the only refutation he could give to the charge of the Prime Minister; and from his knowledge of the men—the House might take his knowledge for what it was worth—he could declare that the accusation was not only unjust, but was preposterous. A not very generous use had been made by the right hon. Gentleman of the expressions employed by the hon. Member for Wexford in speaking of a Member of the English Government in Ireland as being something like a king of the brigands. The right hon. Gentleman asked whether stigmatizing a Government in that way did not amount to a declaration that private acts of revenge might be as legitimate as resistance to the Government? The right hon. Gentleman, therefore, charged his hon. Friend with distinctly inciting to crime and assassination. He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) would like to put a case to the right hon. Gentleman, and he was only sorry that the Prime Minister was not in his place to give them his fair and impartial judgment upon it. The right hon. Gentleman once denounced the Government of Naples, and stated that open resistance to that Government would have been lawful and just if the people were strong enough. His words undoubtedly bore the interpretation that he would countenance such resistance if it were strong enough to be successful. Did he mean to say that he was thereby making himself responsible for the encouragement of crime and assassination in Naples? If he did not mean to say that, could he with candour or with justice endeavour to connect the hon. Member for Wexford with outrage or crime of any kind?

The right hon. Gentleman had also spoken of the employment by the Land League of counsel for the defence of a prisoner accused of having committed an outrage. Did he mean to infer that because they employed counsel in a case, they sympathized with the commission of outrage? He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) knew nothing whatever of the transaction; he did not know whether counsel was employed or not; but even if the Land League did pay for counsel, he did not see how that showed their sympathy with the criminal or with the accusation brought against him. Surely the Crown itself would retain counsel to defend prisoners who had no other means of obtaining defence. If that be the only ground upon which the Prime Minister rested the charge against the Land League of complicity with outrage, he should say he was surprised the right hon. Gentleman should have brought so flimsy and foolish an accusation forward in the midst of a discussion so grave and serious. He (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) had listened with great attention to the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst). Although he (Mr. Justin M'Carthy) looked at these matters from a different point of view, yet had the hon. and learned Gentleman introduced some few alterations in his Amendment, he should have been inclined to agree with him. He was ready to admit that there had been an increase in agrarian crime, that the administration of justice and of the affairs of Ireland generally had failed, and also that the case was one of extreme gravity. As regarded the remarks of learned Judges referred to by the hon. and learned Member, he was sorry to say that Judges in Ireland did not hold the same relation to the public as they did in this country. In this country there was no partizanship on the part of the Judges; but in Ireland they exercised functions which almost compelled them to be politicians. Many of them, for instance, were members of the Privy Council, and when they had in that capacity procured the proclamation of a certain district on the ground that outrages were committed there, they were then sent down to the same district to try the persons accused of those offences. Recently they had had the case of a Judge being obliged to retire from the Bench on the hearing of a political case, because he had committed himself to an opinion concerning it in a previous Charge. All this was hardly compatible with a sound administration of justice, and was not compatible with freedom in the public mind from suspicion of these Judges. Some of these Judges who now bore so hard on violent speech-making and agitation had been noted in their younger days for their passionate utterances and keen agitation. The speeches and actions of embryo Judges in Ireland were of such a character that it was impossible for the words of an Irish Judge to have the same influence over the Irish people as the words of an English Judge have over the people of this country. He did not in the least dispute the assertion that crime had increased of late in Ireland. A great part of the case he wished to make out consisted in the admission that crimes in Ireland had recently increased, both in numbers and in gravity. But he wanted the House to believe that it was the coercive policy of the Government which had brought about the present state of affairs. In the discussions on the Coercion Bill in the House, one of the strongest arguments which the Irish Party endeavoured to impress upon the Government was that if the Government removed the Leader of such a movement as the Land League, and prevented its meetings, there must, as a matter of course, be a return to a régime of midnight conspiracy. But that was distinctly what the Government had done in the present case. They had put down the Land League and had restored to their former power the Ribbon and other secret conspiracies. It was the honest, patient, earnest effort of Mr. Davitt and his colleagues to put an end to the era of midnight conspiracy in Ireland; but the right hon. Gentleman had prevented politicians from discussing their grievances on public platforms before their countrymen, and had brought back the conspirator to take the place of the agitator. The Government, therefore, could not be surprised at what had since happened. A striking instance of the effect of that policy occurred in the county of Longford. At the time of the discussion on the Coercion Bill he had challenged the Government to show a single instance of agrarian crime from that county. But now, although the

Land League there had been totally suppressed, the number of such crimes had assumed serious proportions. That was the actual result all over Ireland of the policy of Her Majesty's Government. The right hon. Gentleman referred to the social revolution which was going on in that country. He was glad that the right hon. Gentleman admitted that the agitation had assumed that character. The right hon. Gentleman had also referred to a remark of the Duke of Wellington. He thought he might as well have quoted from a speech of a later day which was made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster. In his speech on the Coercion Act of 1866 or 1867 the right hon. Gentleman declared that the difficulty seemed to be that they were threatened in the future with a strike against rents, and if that came about it would be impossible for a Government to meet it with any success. If the Government were possessed of so much prescience as that, why were they not prepared with some policy which was more fit for the occasion than the clumsy, ineffectual, and miserable Coercion Act which had recently been passed? But he could not discern any signs of change in the mind of the Government from which he could hope for any improvement, and the state of things must grow from bad to worse the longer the Coercion policy continued. The Government had of late been pursuing a policy at once truculent and mean. Sheridan had described the administration of India in the days of the East India Company as the rule of a man who wielded a sabre with one hand and picked a pocket with the other. In the same way the policy of the present Government might be described as that of a man who thrust home a bayonet with one hand and opened a letter with the other. That was a policy which never would bring peace to Ireland, nor win the people of that country to sympathize with the English Government. The practice of arresting young women and convicting them for having publicly uttered a few words, which were not even taken down by the informer, was not calculated to discourage conspiracy or outrage. So far as the Government had gone, they had been the direct cause of the revival of conspiracy and midnight outrage; and he warned them that if they persisted in the course they were pursuing, they would find that they had repressed agitation only to create conspiracy.

SIR JOHN HAY said, he had listened with great interest to the speech of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Chatham; but he was sorry to say that the reply which was made by the Prime Minister, and, to some extent, the answer to him made by the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the Opposition, he could not think had been satisfactory to the House. They heard a tale of crime and outrage in Ireland which was disgraceful to civilization, and they were told by the Prime Minister that against a political revolution he would know how to deal, but that he was entirely ignorant how to deal with a social revolution. He did not believe that any person in the position of Prime Minister of England should acknowledge that there was any danger which could exist in the presence of which his heart should quail or his cheek turn pale. That must be unsatisfactory to the country. One thing that appeared to him to be wanting was courage — and what he thought was necessary was that the present system of administration in Ireland having signally failed, and the remedial legislation which had been tried having been shown to be a failure, the House itself, by its independent Members, should point out in what manner the government of Ireland might be conducted so as not to be a disgrace to Europe and civilization. They had been told that the amount of crime in the month of December was decreasing; but, so far as he could judge, the statement of the Prime Minister was inaccurate. He had the Return for the month of December and the months preceding, and found that in October the number of cases was 511, in November 534, and in December 574—a gradual increase—there being a total of 4,439 crimes committed during the last year. That was a statement of crime which must surely excite the contempt of this country. If it had happened in Bulgaria, or Russia, or Naples, the Prime Minister himself would have called for remonstrances; and one was only surprised that the Great Powers of Europe did not remonstrate with the Government of this country for the condition which Ireland was in. About a year ago the Protection of Person and Property Act was passed. The statement that then was made was, that if that Act was passed, if it were given to the Government, the result would be an immediate reduction of the amount of crime in Ireland. It was pointed out by the Chief Secretary for Ireland that the Westmeath Act had been passed, and that the result of it was so summary and so expeditious that only 19 outrages were brought to trial since it had been passed. But while the agrarian outrages in 1880, omitting threatening letters, did not amount to more than 1,253, they now had to contemplate, after making a similar omission, more than 4,000 outrages, or treble the number that occurred in the year he had mentioned. The prediction of the right hon. Gentleman, therefore, had not been verified. The Chief Secretary for Ireland also pointed out, as an argument in favour of the Protection of Person and Property Act, that, if it were passed, it would aim at persons who were beyond reach; that its object was to deter by arresting persons whom, if he had knowledge of, he would immediately arrest; and that there were three categories who, if known to the police, would be arrested. These were members of the old Ribbon Societies, Fenians, and persons—mauvais sujets—well known to the police, who, he explained, if at large, must incite to crime, but whose arrest would at once put a stop to crime and outrage in Ireland. The result had been a decided failure. The arrests under that Act amounted to 800, and at this moment 600 persons were in gaol, at the instance of the Chief Secretary for Ireland, under the authority of this Act. So far as they knew—and they accepted his statement as being thoroughly accurate—the Chief Secretary for Ireland himself had personally investigated every one of these 800 cases. Some Friends said that not above 10 per cent of the persons reported to him were arrested; and if that were so, he had examined, with all his other duties, 8,000 cases, and that must be a labour which few Judges would undertake. However, they had his word for it that at least he had examined personally 800 cases; and each of them, if there were no more, had been

persons whom he fairly could suspect of inciting to violence, or being, in some way or other, connected with the categories he had mentioned—Ribbon Societies, Fenians, or mauvais sujets. He (Sir John Hay) had looked over the Return laid on the Table. It was stated that hon. Members who represented more especially the persons arrested would have an opportunity in the House of challenging and inquiring into the condition and cases of the arrested persons under this Act; but, as far as he knew, none of these persons were suspected either of being members of Ribbon Societies, of being Fenians, or generally of being village ruffians, and he did see with great regret a document of that importance placed on the Table, containing the names of batches of persons who were at this moment undergoing punishment—undergoing solitary confinement for no crime assigned. There were pages with “ditto” after the names, and they had to go over page after page to ascertain for what reason these persons were deprived of their liberty. They might be guilty; but he said these men were entitled to trial, and trial could not be too soon, either to prove them guilty or free them from arrest. They had no knowledge of the mode or process by which a criminal information was laid before the Chief Secretary for Ireland to enable him to investigate these matters. Who suspected? So far as they knew, it was the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Who was the witness? So far as they knew, it was the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Who tried the cases? So far as they knew, it was the Chief Secretary for Ireland. Who was the gaoler? So far as they knew, it was the Chief Secretary for Ireland. He was Judge and jury and everything but executioner, for which office, no doubt, his heart was too humane, and that was not in his power; but he (Sir John Hay) thought that it was monstrous that above 30 murders should have been committed in Ireland, and that not one single execution should have taken place in consequence of them. If crime were arrested by these means, there would be some satisfaction, both to the House and the country; but even by these high-handed proceedings, contrary to law, crime was not stopped. The crimes went on as before. Persons were locked up, against whom they had no charge, and these persons being locked up, the same crimes went on, and they had no sort of means of knowing that by locking these persons up they either stopped the crime, or that they had been guilty of inciting persons to commit crime. That was unsatisfactory to the country, and it pointed, in his opinion, to that which he trusted to have heard from the Government, and which he should have been glad to have heard suggested by his right hon. Friend the Leader of the Opposition—that which had been recommended by a Committee of the House of Lords, presided over by a noble Marquess who had been a Member of Her Majesty's Government—namely, the suspension of trial by jury in Ireland. It seemed to him that after they had heard the statements of the Judges, there was but one logical conclusion to the statement of the Prime Minister, and that was that trial by jury should be suspended in Ireland. But his right hon. Friend the Member for North Devonshire and the Prime Minister said it was not the time for making any further suggestion for the government of Ireland. He should not hesitate to indicate the course which he had indicated elsewhere. He might be told he was not responsible. In one sense he was not; but he was responsible as a Member of the House, who had voted for the Protection of Person and Property Act for the government of Ireland. It seemed to him, in the first place, that they should recall the Lord Lieutenant, that they should abolish the system of governing Ireland from Dublin Castle, and that they should govern it through the Home Office as they governed Scotland and the Isle of Man. So long as they maintained the Government at the Castle, such as it was, it seemed to him that so long would they have dissatisfaction in Ireland, and they would have Ireland misgoverned, as it had been for generations. With regard to the process by which it should be governed, in his opinion they should give the military authorities power, with the enormous force they had in Ireland, to maintain law and order there; and they should appoint a Committee of Irish Judges to proceed through the country, under the protection of the military authorities, to try every person who was in prison, and acquit those who were found innocent, and punish those who might be found guilty of breaches of the law. It seemed to him that unless some exceptional course such as that was taken by the House and the Government, the state of Ireland would continue a disgrace to civilization, and a disgrace to Europe. It might be said that, in addition to that, Irishmen would not be satisfied until they got some measure of Home Rule. He would give them some measure of Home Rule. He would allow Ireland to continue to have a qualified representation in this House, and to have, in their respective Provinces, such Parliament—if they pleased so to call it—or Local Government Board, as might be settled by Parliament, for the administration of law and government in Ireland. He did not hesitate to suggest this, because he believed it had already been suggested by a great statesman—Lord John Russell. There they would find a sufficient mode of governing Ireland, with some satisfaction to those who were within its borders; and, after all, that was what was already admitted in one part of Her Majesty's Dominions—the Isle of Man—the best governed part of the Empire. The Islanders had their Local Parliament, and full control over all their local affairs, yet the Central Government retained within its hands the Customs Revenue, the Postal Revenue, and the Army and Navy. There would be no difficulty in introducing a like system in Ireland, where already the greater part of the Inland Revenue charge was excused, as were also the Land Tax, the Inhabited House Duty, and the Railway Passenger Duty. Under such a system, the internal affairs of Ireland would be much better conducted than they were now. Imperial affairs might well be managed through the Home Office, as was the case with Scotland. But, in his opinion, no measure dealing with Ireland would be satisfactory unless large provision were made for emigration. He saw with regret that the slight increase and improvement in the harvest in the last year had considerably diminished emigration from Ireland. In 1880 the number of emigrants was 95,857, whereas in 1881 there were only 78,719. It seemed to him that unless they encouraged, and, in some degree, almost compelled, the reduction of the population of Ireland, it was impossible to look for good government in that country. They had had it stated in Returns that there were in Ireland 200,000 tenants living on patches of ground under five acres, and 200,000 more on patches under 10 acres. There was a total population of 2,000,000 living on these patches under 10 acres. He knew something of land of that kind in the part of Scotland in which he lived, and knew that it was utterly impossible for a man to live on less than 20 acres. If 1,500,000 persons were removed by emigration there would not be the destitution and crime which existed at present in Ireland. No doubt objection would be raised on the score of expense. Each emigrant would cost £9 or £10; and the total amount required would be about £18,000,000. But that would only represent an income tax of one-third of a penny in the pound; and if we had given £20,000,000 for the abolition of slavery in our West Indian Islands, £18,000,000 was hardly too high a price to pay for order and contentment in Ireland. That sum of money given to Ireland would benefit our Canadian and other Colonies, and would at once relieve the plethora and congestion of population, which was the main evil from which Ireland suffered. As a Scotch Member, who had himself done something in the reclamation of land, and as an employer of Irish labour, he ventured to make that recommendation to the House; and he ventured to think that he could do so with some degree of authority. There was another suggestion he wished to make. He was no supporter of the Land Act; but as it had interfered in the relations between landlord and tenant, he saw no reason why a like interference should not be made between the unfortunate tenant and the usurers who kept them in a state of perpetual poverty. Why should not so much of the old Usury Law be re-enacted as would prevent exorbitant charges of interest, and its accumulation on the heads of these unfortunate persons, or some similiar measure be passed for their benefit? He ventured to make these suggestions for the consideration especially of his right hon. Friend the Member for North Devon and his right hon. and learned Friend the Member for the University of Dublin.

vernment had, in his speech that afternoon, again displayed his masterly policy of evasion. The right hon. Gentleman was the patron and promoter and admirer of the Land League until it had ceased to serve his political purpose. The right hon. Gentleman had tried to shuffle off some of the responsibility which attached itself on to the shoulder of some Members of that House, who were dimly hinted at, and who, in some mysterious manner, were supposed to have subsidized outrage. In the whole course of his experience in that House he never before heard anything so remarkable from the lips of a person upon whom so much depended for the promotion of harmony, or for the dissemination of discord and distrust, as the suggestion of the Prime Minister that because counsel were feed, or alleged to have been feed, for the defence of accused prisoners, therefore American money was being employed to subsidize outrage. Why, if it was Lamson, the poisoner, or the most wretched criminal that ever appeared at the bar, and there was any question as to whether he would receive fair play, was there an honourable man who would hesitate to contribute some mite to at least giving him an opportunity of placing his case before the jury who were trying him for his life? With regard to the trial of the miserable M'Lean, which was now coming on—why, the very Government that was prosecuting him had also furnished him with counsel to defend him. Were they to conclude that because Her Majesty's Government had feed the counsel that were to defend M'Lean, that, therefore, they were in favour of the detestable crime of which M'Lean was charged? If the right hon. Gentleman were to make such a statement before a meeting, not of Irish Americans, but even of Yankee Americans, he would be greeted with a torrent of hisses. Never had he heard so paltry and unworthy an insinuation from any responsible person. He was well aware that dreadful outrages had been committed in Ireland. He had never spoken without condemning them; and he was perfectly sure that if the Irish Member and others imprisoned in Dublin, and all the Land League agitators, had been fully and correctly reported, their speeches would be found to be full of denunciation of outrage. The opinion on the subject in this country was formed from the exaggerated and unfounded statements of the Dublin Correspondent of The Times, who was editor and part proprietor of The Daily Express, the rabid Tory organ. That man was denounced by the moderate Isaac Butt as a professional liar. Nine-tenths of the people of Ireland would endorse the declaration that the statements daily inserted in the London Times by Dr. Patton, who was a moral criminal, were inserted with the deliberate purpose of misleading English opinion and of blackening the character of the Irish people. No man in Ireland, he believed, within his opportunity and during his time, had done as much to set nation against nation as the Dublin Correspondent of the London Times. But he did not say that his conduct was of a much graver character than the officials of Dublin Castle. Irish Members had been blamed for not condemning outrage. The charge was untrue. But, he would ask, why did not Englishmen denounce the outrages innumerable—the violent assaults, murders, and nameless crimes which took place in this country? No English Members had spoken half so strongly against those outrages as Irish Members had spoken against Irish outrages. But he could not but remember that the same charges brought by the Prime Minister against Mr. Parnell and his Friends had been brought by him three or four years ago against the whole Conservative Party, whom he accused of indifference to the outrages which had been perpetrated in Bulgaria. But there were two classes of outrages—first, outrages of revenge; next, outrages of provocation. Irish Members deplored and condemned both classes; but English Members confined themselves to denunciation of the crimes of revenge. What could be expected when magistrates who were discredited and dismissed from English appointments were thought good enough for Ireland, and when Englishmen's ideas of Ireland were derived from such unscrupulous libellers of all classes in Ireland—from the priest in the sanctuary to the humblest peasant, as Terence M'Grath? He challenged the Government to deny was not Henry Blake, that little Cossack, despot of the West of Ireland? What could be thought of a Government which was driven to have recourse to a Statute of Edward III., framed for the punishment of "sturdy vagabonds and suspected bandits," in order to imprison a delicate girl, Miss Mary O'Connor, the sister of a Member of that House? It had been proved, and was admitted by the Castle authorities, that Miss O'Connor had steadily recommended an abstinence from outrage, and had counselled the people to pay a fair rent, and her definition of a fair rent was the one given by a Catholic Prelate, Archbishop M'Cabe. Why did not the Government, instead of arresting a girl of feeble health, strike high, and arrest the venerable Archbishop? But Miss O'Connor's definition of fair rent was not only identical with that of the Archbishop, but was virtually the same as that given by Mr. Justice O'Hagan himself, the Chief Commissioner under the Land Act, who defined a fair rent to be that under which a tenant might "live and thrive." And yet she had been imprisoned under an Act intended for sturdy vagabonds and suspected bandits. These were some of the outrages and provocations which stimulated outrages of revenge. At this moment Miss O'Connor's brother, the hon. Member for Galway (Mr. T. P. O'Connor), was addressing vast audiences of Irish-Americans; and the recital of this one cowardly act of the Government would be more certain to rouse a desperate and hostile feeling against them among all who sympathized with the Land League than 100 incendiary speeches from the Home Rule Benches. The Government were trying, under cover of a miserable failure of the ghastly Land Act, to introduce new measures of coercion; but he told them there was a spirit abroad which, in these days of civilization, defied the resources of Liberal civilization. So long as the Government continued the policy of brute force, most assuredly the present condition of affairs in Ireland would remain. He was still, as he had been two years ago, in favour of a fair settlement of the Irish agrarian question—a settlement which should be fair to the landlord as well as to the tenant. The suspension of the Constitution in Ireland had only resulted, as had been prophesied, in giving a great increase of power to Ribbon lodges and the midnight assassin. The Government would have to revert to a policy of justice to Ireland. He hoped it was not too late. He was glad to say that the policy sketched out from the Front Opposition Bench would be infinitely more favourable to the Irish tenant, and more conducive to the peace and harmony of Ireland, than the brutal and cowardly procedure of the so-called Liberal Government.

MR. REDMOND said, he considered that the heavy indictment framed by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) lay entirely, not against the Irish people, but against the Government. All that had been said that afternoon pointed directly to the one great fact that the policy of the Government in Ireland had been a dismal failure. The Prime Minister had alluded to the Coercion Act; but from beginning to end his speech contained no fact or argument to show that the Act had succeeded. The Chief Secretary for Ireland had attempted to prove that it had been a partial success, in that it had defeated the "no rent" manifesto. But that manifesto was the direct result of the Coercion Act. Therefore, the argument of the Chief Secretary for Ireland was this—that the "no rent" manifesto having been created by the Coercion Act long after the latter became law, the "no rent" manifesto was now partly overcome by the Coercion Act. No one could fail to be impressed by the description of the condition of Ireland given by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham. But it seemed to have been forgotten that what had happened was only what had been directly and solemnly predicted by himself and his Friends. Up to the date of the arrest of the leaders of the Land League the land movement in Ireland had been carried on with less violence and outrage than any similar movement in any country of Europe. If an increase of crime had followed the recent action of the Government, it was certainly not the consequence of the action of the Land League, but of the action of the Government. When the Land League was first started it was an open organization, with every meeting open to the light of day; but the Government had stepped in and deprived Ireland of the only restraining influences which stood between the prisons and the wrongs of the people and the promptings of a terrible but foolish revenge. The course the Government had taken and were pursuing was one which would plunge Ireland deeper and deeper into a state which was a disgrace to any Government which professed to be civilized. Day by day, through the fault of the Government, the condition of Ireland was becoming worse. The police had been proved to be useless; they were unable to arrest the men who committed outrages; and then the Chief Secretary for Ireland came to their aid, and, acting upon their dark hints, took up and imprisoned, not the village ruffians who committed the crimes, but the most respectable men in the locality, whose influence had always been exercised to prevent outrage, and whose arrest increased the exasperation of the people. The Prime Minister had made an unjustifiable—he would say a brutal—attack upon the men whom he had under lock and key in the prisons of Ireland, when he charged them with complicity in the outrages which had been committed. And, having put them in prison, the right hon. Gentleman now turned to the Irish Members and asked them to assist in putting outrage down. If the Prime Minister considered any men on those Benches guilty of encouraging outrage he was acting a cowardly part in not bringing them into a Court of Law, and giving them an opportunity of dealing with the charge. It was said that the funds of the Land League were spent in encouraging the commission of outrages. That charge was not made by the Prime Minister, who evidently thought it was true, but shrank from making it. The sole foundation for such an insinuation was that a certain sum was paid to defend a certain prisoner. But an accused person was to be regarded as innocent until he was convicted; and, therefore, those who supplied money for his defence would be perfectly justified in doing so. The veriest criminal in this country, from the liberality of the English people or otherwise, found means for paying for his defence. But, in his opinion, there was a fund from which men who committed outrages were paid, and that was the Secret Service Fund. ["Hear!" and "No!"] He did not mean that the Government offered a man money for committing outrages; but the police went about the country asking people whether they knew anything about outrages which were to be committed, and then some designing fellow instigated some foolish or passionate man to commit crime, and, having done so, came and claimed the money from the police. He was glad that before the rising of the House allusion had been made to the arrest of Miss O'Connor, who had been sent to prison for six months. She was not the only lady who had been so treated. He held in his hand some Papers about the imprisonment of Miss M'Cormack, who, in bad health, was now in Limerick Gaol. Miss M'Cormack had the misfortune to carry on her operations in the district ruled by Mr. Cliford Lloyd. She was brought before him without warrant, and without any explanation given; no evidence was produced, and no opportunity for defence was allowed. She was charged with inciting to discontent—a vague accusation—and was immediately ordered to find security for her good behaviour for three months, or in default to go to gaol; and when she claimed to be sent to trial she was committed to prison under powers given to the magistrate by an old law of Edward III. Thus, the result was that a young lady of 20 was imprisoned without being heard in her own defence. Another lady was imprisoned for six months. It was to be borne in mind that although these ladies were not subjected to the treatment inflicted on male prisoners, they had, nevertheless, to suffer solitary confinement; and it was nothing less than inhuman for any Government to pursue such a policy as that. He drew the attention of the Solicitor General for Ireland to this matter, and would ask the Government what was to be their course of action in the future? The Prime Minister had said that he would not take from the hon. and learned Member for Chatham any directions as to the time when a new policy might be announced; but surely that time had nearly come. The English people were beginning to see that coercion had failed, and were asking when, where, and how it was all to end? If the Government had pursued one policy alone, either of repression or redress, they might have succeeded. He could understand, and even respect, the man who believed that Ireland could be ruled only by force; but was that the belief of the Government? If so, they must proceed by coercion, and hang and flog as well as imprison on suspicion; and as for the Irish people, he could only say that they had survived the attacks of men who had a greater capacity, if a less desire, for repression than the present Chief Secretary for Ireland. He believed, therefore, they would survive the force of oppression to-day. The only way, however, to bring Ireland back to a condition of peace, and quiet, and contentment, was by adopting a wise policy of conciliation; and if they had done this at first, and kept coercion as a stone in the sleeve with which to punish the Irish people if the Land Act failed, they would have succeeded far better than they had done. He asked the Government, in all seriousness, to abandon the hateful measures which had proved utterly useless for the suppression of outrages and agitation, and to substitute for them measures of conciliation, which was the only remedy for the present unhappy condition of the country. If they did not, they would be only hastening the day when the Irish people, freed from the oppression of England, would be able to legislate well and wisely for themselves in a Parliament of their own.

MR. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT said, he wished to avoid saying anything that might in any way add to the difficulties of what the Prime Minister had just described as the "grave position" in which the Ministry now found itself with regard to the government of Ireland. It was impossible for the Prime Minister to accuse Members of the Conservative Party of anything like factious opposition to the Government on this question. Hon. Members on that side of the House had loyally supported the Government of the Queen even in cases where their natural feelings were opposed to its action. The Conservative Party assisted the Ministry in passing the Act which they declared necessary for the protection of life and property in Ireland. When the Land Act was before the House—a measure which, in the opinion of hon. Members on that side of the House, was in the highest degree unjust and impolitic, and that view had been completely justified by the course of events since its enactment—they did not offer to that Bill an unreasonable opposition. The Conservative Party in the House of Lords had it in their power to reject the Land Bill altogether; but they refused to take a step which, they were told, in the judgment of the Ministry, would have been injurious to the interests of order in Ireland. But the right hon. Gentleman made certain statements which required immediate and complete refutation. The Prime Minister endeavoured to shift the responsibility for the deplorable state of Ireland upon the Conservative Party by statements which were absolutely inaccurate, as he would show. He said that the Land League had acquired overwhelming influence and power in Ireland before the fall of the late Government. He also ridiculed the idea that the abandonment of the Peace Preservation Act had led, in any way, to the present anarchy in Ireland, and that its maintenance would have preserved order in that country. Neither of these allegations of the right hon. Gentleman would bear examination for a single moment. The Land League had little or no influence in Ireland when the present Ministry came into Office. It had not been founded more than nine months. Lawlessness and crime had hardly begun to raise their heads, and they were at once checked by the firmness of Lord Beaconsfield's Government. Agrarian outrages of all kinds, which, in November, 1879, had reached a total of about 150, at once began to diminish after the arrest of Michael Davitt. Month by month they grew less, until in April, 1880—that was the month in which Lord Beaconsfield resigned—they only amounted to 69. The moment that the fatal impulse of the weakness and incapacity of the present Ministry was recognized in Ireland the tale of outrage steadily and rapidly increased, until, in December, 1880, it had swollen to the enormous total of 867—a number of crimes in one month exceeding the total which had been committed during the whole 12 months of 1879, when a Conservative Ministry was in Office. The agrarian offences, which numbered 863 in 1879, increased to 2,590 in 1880; six-sevenths of these took place in the last eight months of that year, when the right hon. Gentleman was in Office. In 1881 they had risen to the monstrous total of 4,713. During the first three months of this year the increase in number had been still more alarming, while the character of the crimes had been peculiarly atrocious. These facts were a complete answer to the statement of the Prime Minister; and they fixed the responsibility for the existing state of Ireland, beyond the possibility of escape upon the Prime Minister and his Colleagues. The Peace Preservation Act which he had treated with so much contempt, was originally his own production. It was considerably mitigated by Lord Beaconsfield; yet the late Government were able with it to maintain order and peace in Ireland. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India once compared that Act to a "garde engine;" but it was with this "garde engine" that Lord Beaconsfield governed Ireland well and peacefully for six trying years—years when the earth refused to return her fruits, and when the commercial and social distress that prevailed might have furnished an excuse for agitation and disorder. The present Ministry had had in their favour two bountiful harvests in Ireland; yet they stated of that country presented a terrible contrast to what it was under the Predecessors. The Prime Minister spoke in tones of supernatural gravity about the difference between "social" and "political" revolution. The agitation in Ireland, which began as a political movement, had acquired its present hold over the mass of the Irish people solely through the want of firmness shown by the Government in dealing with it. It was only "social" because it appealed to the greed and avarice of the people. It was Communistic in its aims and methods, which did not differ from similar movements that had been repeatedly set on foot on the Continent; these have been overcome by a statesmanship which had, unfortunately, been wholly wanting in Ireland. A revolutionary agitation in Spain had just been put down in three days by firmness, at the cost of but two men wounded, and this among the Catalans, a population more independent and difficult to govern than the Irish Celt. So much for the "social" revolution. But what a deplorable effect would it not have upon the propagators of disorder in Ireland when they read the Prime Minister's confession to-day—that the Government was at the end of its resources. The right hon. Gentleman told the Conservative Party that they did "not rise to the level of the situation," and did not "grasp the full gravity of the state of Ireland." The difference between the Ministry and the Conservative Party was this—that the Conservative Party grasped the gravity of the situation tw years ago, when the right hon. Gentleman and his supporters were wholly unable to foresee to what mischief their blundering was inevitably leading. Not only did the illustrious statesman, who was now no more, warn the Liberal Party that their unpatriotic policy would produce "a state of things in Ireland worse than pestilence and famine," but every Conservative Member who spoke added his warning to the voice of his Leader. They warned the Prime Minister that the unnatural alliance with the Revolutionary Party, by which he gained Office, must have disastrous results. Over and over again, during the last six months of 1880—that fatal period in the history of Irish anarchy, when the tale of agrarian crime, unpunished and even unrebuked, was swelling week by week, until the "terror" had enveloped the whole country—did they warn the Ministry against their ruinous inaction. They knew, indeed, now, from the confession of the President of the Board of Trade, that "to have stifled the agitation then would have been to prevent reform"—that was the Land Act. But that disgraceful confession had not been adopted or approved of by other Ministers. After the Coercion Act was passed, the Conservative Party warned the Ministry that to be effective it must be administered with consistency and firmness. It was this mixture of extreme severity and almost servile coaxing which had been so fatal in the administration of the Government. They had run from the extreme of coercion to the extreme of bribery. They had aggravated Irish feeling, without intimidating the violent or repressing the criminal. Their failure to govern Ireland was now so conspicuous, and their plight was so desperate, that pity almost silenced our criticism. The Prime Minister, instead of addressing himself boldly and in a statesmanlike way to the pacification of Ireland, had given the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) no satisfactory reply to his convincing speech, but had endeavoured to call public attention from the failure of his policy in Ireland by charges against the Conservative Party which could not be substantiated. A few weeks ago he accused them of advocating the suspension of trial by jury in Ireland. He (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) did not know of any body of Members on his side of the House who had recommended such a step. It was a measure which, in his judgment, must be entirely left to the initiative of Her Majesty's Ministers, who had the best sources of information as to the state of Ireland, and who were responsible for its government. The Prime Minister said, in tones of apparent fervour—"Abolish trial by jury!" "Why, you would do away with one of the safeguards of Irish liberty!" What a mockery were those words in the mouth of the right hon. Gentleman. "Irish liberty!" What liberty was there in Ireland under his Administration? Was there liberty for the Irish popular Party? Over 700 of its principal members were in prison without trial. Many of these, no doubt, deserved even a severer punishment than the Capuan confinement in which they were kept. The condition of the Nationalists was not one of liberty. And, on the other side, what liberty was there for the loyal and the honest? There was absolutely none; a foul terrorism enshrouded the whole land in its demoralizing folds. The landowner who claimed that which was his due; the farmer who paid his just rent; the labourer who rendered the work he was bound to do, had not even bare security for their lives, much less anything that could be dignified by the name of "liberty." Let the atrocious murder at Lough Mask of that aged bailiff and his youthful nephew; let the assassination of Farmer Moloney before the eyes of his agonized family; let the terrible murder near Mullingar, on a peaceful Sunday afternoon, of an unoffending lady, testify what liberty the loyal inhabitants of Ireland of every class enjoyed under the present Ministry. The Prime Minister had denounced the hon. Member for Wexford (Mr. Healy) for speaking of "the English in Ireland as brigands," and as encouraging disorder by his violent language. They all condemned such speeches as that of the hon. Member for Wexford; but he (Mr. Ashmead-Bartlett) was somewhat surprised at the rebuke coming from the Prime Minister. He ventured to hope, with all respect to the right hon. Gentleman, that he would himself in the future be more cautious than he had been, in the use of expressions which had undoubtedly served as a stimulus to agitation and lawlessness in Ireland. His well-known reference to the "blowing up of the Clerkenwell Gaol," and to "the murder of the policemen in Manchester," as bringing Irish grievances "within the range of practical politics," were such incentives. His denunciations of what he called the "Upas Tree of Protestant ascendancy," and of the "English garrison" in Ireland, were but rendered by the Member for Wexford in language coarser and more blunt than that used by the Prime Minister. He had listened with amazement to the sneers and the attacks levelled by the right hon. Gentleman in that House at the "English garrison," which, as a statesman and an Englishman, it was his duty to maintain. He would not have entered upon this subject had not the Prime Minister, by his statements, challenged contradiction. The state of Ireland after two years of Liberal Government was "grave" indeed—it was appalling. The Prime Minister found that country peaceful and orderly. To quote his own expressive language, used in March, 1880—

"There is an absence of crime and outrage, and a general sense of comfort and satisfaction such as was unknown in the previous history of the country."

The right hon. Gentleman went further than this. After he had taken Office as Prime Minister, he and his Colleagues also made repeated references to the satisfactory and peaceful state of Ireland. The Ministry went, indeed, far beyond words; they alleged that as a reason—in the Queen's Speech, and afterwards in Parliament—for not attempting to renew the Peace Preservation Act. How, then, could the Prime Minister, without completely stultifying himself, now turn upon the Conservative Party and say that "the Land League was firmly established in the land" when he came into Office; or that "the seat and source of this movement" was to be found before that date—namely, April, 1880. Such an allegation was opposed to the right hon. Gentleman's own declarations no less than to notorious facts. The power of the Land League rested on outrage and terrorism, as the Prime Minister had often told them. By that test, in April, 1880, when he came into Office, its power did not exist, for agrarian crime was at its minimum. The Minister and his Colleagues had, in a brief space, reduced Ireland to a state which, again, in his own words, spoken

16 months ago in the Mansion House of this City, and practically repeated to-night, was a "shame and disgrace to England in the eyes of the civilized world."

MR. HEALY did not intend to have taken any part in this debate, but for the association which had again attempted to be established by the Prime Minister between the Members of the Irish Party and those who committed outrages in Ireland. The policy of the Government was to fix the blame upon them for everything that occurred in Ireland, and on the principle of throwing plenty of mud, in order that some of it might stick to the occupants of the Opposition Benches, repeated day after day the most ridiculous charges against the Irish Members. With regard to the quotation which had been made from his letter, he thought they heard much and saw little of what would have been shown if the whole of the extract had been published without alteration or emendation. The following was the letter which he forwarded to his constituents, in acknowledging the resolution sent to him:—

"With regard to the second resolution which you have forwarded Mr. Forster, it was impossible for me to point out to that gentleman on the occasion in question (as I had already spoken) that the constituency which he invited me to lecture respecting outrages was a good deal freer from crime than his own town of Bradford. The outcry which the English raise about outrages in our country must be considered hypocritical. When a few exasperated peasants, driven by want and oppression, retaliate by the commission of regrettable disorders, a howl is instantly raised in England; but when outrages are committed upon the people themselves there is not a single word of protest, as the eviction of tens of thousands and the ruin and enfeeblement brought upon hundreds of persons imprisoned without trial continually witness. Yet this same nation, within a year or two past, has, unprovoked, slaughtered thousands of Afghans in cold blood, has blown up Basutos and Zulus with dynamite in their caves, have been the curse of every country they have invaded; and now, in admiration of its own virtues, hold up its hands in pious horror at the proceedings of a small section of the oppressed classes in Ireland. Of course, we can only regard such conduct as worse than Pharisaical. For myself, I look upon the English in Ireland simply as a gang of brigands, whose rule has degraded, and whose exactions have impoverished our country. The captain of the gang, the Right Hon. W. E. Forster, invites me, as your Representative, to convey certain English moral lessons to the town of Wexford, a town in whose market place his predecessors slew scores and hundreds of women and babes, and upon whose fields an English soldier plucked out your priest's heart to grease his boots. Such audacity on the part of this impudent foreigner might well excite indignation amongst your justice loving-people; but it would be a mistake, I think, on our part, to allow ourselves to be moved by any expressions of opinion of the English. We should merely ignore them.—Faithfully yours,

“T. M. HEALY.”

The ground on which he described the English in Ireland as a gang of brigands was taken entirely from a speech delivered some time ago by the President of the Board of Trade. On the 25th of October last the right hon. Gentleman, in his celebrated speech at Liverpool, used this expression—

“We know that for the whole time to which I have referred [that was, the 700 years during which the English had been in Ireland, unfortunately] the Irish people have been constantly dissatisfied. There has not been one single year during which the removal of the English garrison would not have been a signal for the instant uprising of the people, and for a declaration of their independence. Is it not humiliating to Englishmen that now, after 700 years' rule, it takes 50,000 soldiers and police to keep Ireland?”

The House would see from this extract that the description of brigands given by him was only putting in a condensed form what the President of the Board of Trade stated on a larger scale. If it took 50,000 soldiers to maintain British rule in Ireland, and if their withdrawal would, as the President of the Board of Trade believed, be a signal for the instant uprising of the people, what moral sanction or claim had the English to remain in Ireland except the claim of brigands? That was a proposition which he was willing to argue with any hon. Member. If, according to one of their own Cabinet Ministers, it took 50,000 paid mercenaries to maintain their rule in Ireland, and if the people of that country abhorred and despised them, he would like to know what better were they than a gang of brigands; and if he and other Irishmen were invited by Gentlemen like the Chief Secretary for Ireland to denounce crime in their country, they would tell those Gentlemen that they regarded them simply as foreigners, and they treated their counsels as so much impudence, which they declined to notice in the least degree. The English people themselves were far more brutal than the Irish. The most disgraceful outrages occurred week after week in that country. He ventured to say that more outrages occurred in one month in England than occurred in Ireland for a year. He could easily prove that statement by a reference to the latest Report of the London Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Animals, which related by the hundred such outrages as tarring and burning dogs, pulling the tongues out of horses, starving donkeys to death, and mangling cats with turning machines—a resource of civilization quite unknown in Ireland. The statistics published in this Report, although they numbered thousands of cases every quarter, represented but the work of a small Society in London. He ventured to say if a similar record was kept all over England, the total would reach 20,000 or 30,000 cases every year, a figure which should make the mock Pharisaical English turn their attention to their own country, and cease to declaim about Ireland. It would be far better for them to take the mote out of their own eyes than operate upon the beams of the Irish people. The Irish Members sitting on that side of the House repudiated in the strongest manner not merely outrages themselves, but they told the House that, so far from these outrages being a service to their cause, they hindered and impeded it in the most material degree by bringing down coercion upon the Irish people. Outrages were a distinct damage and a distinct disadvantage to the cause in which the Irish Party were engaged. He had been frequently asked in letters, and in the newspapers, why he did not say in Ireland what he said in the House of Commons with respect to outrages. The reason was very simple. If he went to Ireland he would be handed a warrant the moment he landed on Carlisle Pier and sent into Kilmainham. Under these circumstances, he might be fairly excused from going to Ireland at the bidding of the London newspapers. The political education of a large portion of the Irish people was not so complete as the political education of the English people, and they were not guided to the same extent by the declarations of their leaders; therefore, there was not that quick connection between speeches delivered in that House and the subsequent acts of the people. By the benevolent operation of English statesmanship, the masses of the Irish people had been kept ignorant. Not very long ago a price was set upon the head of a schoolmaster in Ireland as it would be upon the head of a wolf. Quickness of perception in political matters was retarded, and to-day it was impossible to suppose that if those who committed outrages could see, as the Members of the Irish Party saw, that, so far from benefiting their cause, they were imposing a distinct hindrance to its advancement. It was impossible to suppose that if they read the speeches of their Representatives in Parliament they would not have long since ceased to commit outrages. The Irish Party told the Government that if the Coercion Act was passed it would most surely lead to the commission of outrages. Well, so it had, and the explanation was not taken from the prophecy of the Irish Party, but from the fancied connection between them and those who perpetrated the outrages in Ireland. In the Land League there was a large number of men who viewed Parliamentary action with the greatest jealousy; they were men who believed Parliamentary action to be entirely useless; and, therefore, when the Government attempted to fix upon the Irish Parliamentary Party, who were but very small agents in the matter, any responsibility, they were doing them a great injustice, and exhibiting the ignorance and misconception of Irish affairs which so charmingly distinguished Englishmen in general. The Prime Minister triumphantly repeated some statement as to £100 having been subscribed by the Land League for a certain purpose, and said it had never been denied. Were they to deny everything that came from the Treasury Bench? The occupants of the Treasury Bench did not deny many of their allegations; and if the Irish Party laid themselves out for contradicting every slander heaped upon them and their country they would have constant occupation. For his part, he had never any connection with the Executive of the Land League, or with the apportionment of its funds. If he had an offer of the kind, he should decline with thanks, for the gentlemen of the Land League were well able to conduct their own affairs. The connection between the Land League and the Irish Party simply amounted to this. The latter were engaged as the champions of a particular scheme of agrarian reform which was similar to that advocated by the Land League; but there the connection ended. He himself could say faithfully that he had as little to do with the political working of the Land League as any Gentleman on the Treasury Bench ["Oh!"] That was absolutely a fact. He challenged anyone to deny it. Of course, when a great crisis came in Ireland, and when the people of Ireland needed, as he believed, to be instructed, he went from town to town expressing his views; and he hoped, when the present Government went out of Office, to go again and give his views to the people of Ireland. Selections were made from their speeches as specimens of incitement to outrage by the Prime Minister; but if this sort of constructive interpretation was placed upon words there was no man worse in this respect than the Prime Minister himself. The Clerkenwell outrage, said the Prime Minister on one occasion, had no more to do with pulling down the Irish Church than the tolling of the bell had in bringing people to worship. What was that but an incitement to outrage—an invitation to the Irish Members to toll the bell if they wished to have their grievances redressed? But he would not pursue the subject. The Prime Minister sought to throw on them responsibility for the outrages. But he, for one, begged to repudiate any responsibility in that matter whatever.

MR. CHAPLIN said, that he had listened to the debate in the hope that some hon. Gentleman on the Treasury Bench would supplement the speech of the Prime Minister, and tell the House something more definite than that which had fallen from him. The Prime Minister had assumed that the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) had endeavoured to fix the date on which the Government should announce some further measures for dealing with Ireland. That was a misapprehension. The hon. and learned Member had made a statement to the House with regard to the condition of Ireland, which was of the gravest and most alarming character. That was either a true statement or it was not. If it was not true it ought to be contradicted at once by the Government. If on the other hand, it was a true account of the state of things in Ireland, there could be no doubt that the question was one which did not admit of delay. They could not wait to suit the convenience of the Government until further shocking murders were committed. At the commencement of the Session the Chief Secretary for Ireland told them that matters were so far improved that a few weeks previous he had thought he should be unable to meet Parliament without having to ask for further powers. It was clear, therefore, that the Government had it in contemplation to appeal to Parliament for additional powers. The Government ought now to give the country some definite assurance that they would deal without delay with the very grave state of affairs existing in Ireland; and he trusted that the noble Marquess the Secretary of State for India would rise and give the House that assurance, and then the House would separate for the holidays with less alarm. The most despairing speech which had been made that day by the Prime Minister would be read with deep concern by the country.

MR. CALLAN said, he believed there was no Member of the House who did not view with regret the brutal murder perpetrated in Westmeath on Sunday last; but while viewing the murder with abhorrence they should draw some lesson from it. Where was that murder perpetrated? Not in a distressed district in Ireland, but in one of the most prosperous and richest portions of the country. It was well known that for the last 30 years in Ireland the condition of affairs in that district had not been healthy. Ever since a packed jury convicted an innocent man who was charged with an attempt on the life of Sir Francis Hopkins, a feeling of dissatisfaction, of mistrust of the law had prevailed in that district, and they should learn from that lesson not hastily to abrogate the rights of citizens, and to enact what was tantamount to martial law—namely, trial by some resident magistrates and justices. He represented a county which the blundering incapables who regulated the Executive in Dublin Castle had recommended the Chief Secretary for Ireland to have proclaimed. In this county six “suspects” had been arrested; two of them had been lately liberated. He felt a peculiar interest in these “suspects.” If they were all supporters of his at the late Election, they were not all Land Leaguers, but they were the victims of the police. Captain Keogh, presiding in Dundalk, on the 4th of February, said it was all nonsense to speak of keeping arms for protection in that country. There was not a quieter spot in the whole world than the county Louth. He must express his regret that the Chief Secretary for Ireland was not in his place to hear the observations which might have been made upon his political conduct. The right hon. Gentleman ought to be removed from his present position and replaced by someone who was more capable of governing Ireland, and who, from his antecedents, was more likely to promote satisfactory results in that country. The Government ought to state whether, if Irish Members visited their constituents to consult them about the Land Act or other matters, they would be placed under arrest on what the Chief Secretary for Ireland called “reasonable suspicion.” If he himself went to Ireland and addressed his constituents, even although he was not a Land Leaguer, and never would be one, and even although he might denounce outrages, he might become a victim of the suspicions of the police, and, no doubt, his Radical Friends on the other side of the House would say that it served him right. It would be unwise for Irish Members to rush within the toils of the hunter. They should remain where they could be of most service to their country, and where they could strike the heaviest blows at the common enemy.

QUESTIONS.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—COLONELS OF THE ORDNANCE CORPS.

MR. GEORGE RUSSELL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether he has considered the case of the Lieutenant Colonels of the Ordnance Corps who will be placed on half-pay on the 1st October next, and whether he proposes to take further steps to retire the pre-warrant Colonels and Lieutenant Colonels of those Corps, so that the half-pay Lieutenant Colonels junior to them may be employed, instead of being compelled to retire from the Army; and, if it is not the case that the actuarial calculations prove such future steps would produce an economy in pensions, and that the efficiency of the Service will be increased by the retirement of the seniors instead of the juniors?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, in reply to my hon. Friend, I have to state that this case has been under my consideration for nearly two years. Lord Morley's Committee on Promotion and Employment in the Royal Artillery and Engineers specially dealt with it, the result being that a large number of colonels and lieutenant colonels promoted before October, 1877, have been retired; but I do not think that I could offer better terms to those who remain (that is to say, three colonels holding ordinary district commands, and 15 lieutenant colonels) than the terms offered in the recent Warrant, of which they did not avail themselves. The last words of my hon. Friend's first Question implied that an officer is compelled to retire from the Army when unemployed. This is not so, those officers having the option of going to half-pay for five years with the chances of re-employment. In reply to the second Question, I can only say that I am not satisfied that economy would be the result of any feasible plan extending the retirement of lieutenant colonels of Engineers. Such an extension would have to be very large if any additional boon were to result to their juniors.

ARMY—THE REVISED ARMY WARRANT—ARTICLE 23.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL asked the Secretary of State for War, Whether his attention has been called to the difference of wording of Article 23, recently inserted in the Revised Warrant of the 25th of June 1881, and Article 22 of the same Warrant, which provides that General and Field Officers, exceptionally promoted for distinguished service in the Field, shall be selected for promotion on the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief, and that their service shall be published in the London Gazette; and, whether he proposes, in any future revision, to alter the said Article in accordance with established and constitutional precedent?

MR. CHILDERS: Sir, my noble Friend's Question appears to me to be based on two misconceptions. In the first place, by Article 27, all promotions are made upon the recommendation of the Commander-in-Chief, approved by the Secretary of State. Secondly, Lord Cranbrook's Warrant of May, 1878, Articles 18f, 21h, and 23f, established promotions for captains, majors, and lieutenant colonels on account of distinguished service of an exceptional nature other than in the field; and the present Warrant only allows such promotions, using precisely the same words, for colonels and officers of higher rank. I presume, however, that the real suggestion of my noble Friend is that the reasons for these promotions should appear in The Gazette. Hitherto service in the field has been the only service mentioned in a Gazette, and with the object solely of doing honour to the officer; and I am disinclined to weaken the effect of these notices by extending them to promotions for other causes.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL gave Notice that he would take an early opportunity of calling attention to the subject.

ARMY ORGANIZATION—UNIFORMS OF SCOTCH REGIMENTS.

COLONEL MILNE HOME asked the Secretary of State for War, What compensation will be given to officers in the Royal Scots and other regiments where the present uniform is to be changed into doublet and trews?

MR. CHILDERS: Yes, Sir; the regulated compensation will be granted on the officers' application.

PROTECTION OF PERSON AND PROPERTY (IRELAND) ACT, 1881—MR. PARNELL.

MR. LEWIS said, that, seeing the Attorney General in his place, he would now ask him the following Question, of which he had only given the hon. and learned Gentleman private Notice—namely, Whether Mr. Parnell, M.P., having been arrested on the 13th of October, under the provisions of the 44th of Victoria, cap. 4, sec. 1, and having been released from custody on the 11th of April, can be lawfully re-arrested and detained in custody under the original warrant; and whether, if a new warrant is necessary, it must not be issued in virtue of a new offence?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): The hon. Member said he gave me private Notice of this Question; but I received no Notice whatever until I entered the House. I must, therefore, ask him to put his Question on the Paper, to be answered by myself or the Irish Law Officers to-morrow.

MR. LEWIS gave Notice that he would ask the Question to-morrow. As it related to the liberty of the subject, he thought that no great Notice ought to have been required under the circumstances. He had left the Notice in the room of the Attorney General nearly an hour ago.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir HENRY JAMES): What is that?

ORDERS OF THE DAY.

ARMY (ANNUAL) BILL.—[BILL 105.]

(Mr. Secretary Childers, The Judge Advocate General, Mr. Trevelyan, Mr. Campbell-Bannerman.)

COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Clauses 1 to 3, inclusive, agreed to.

MR. SEXTON said, he wished to put a question to the Chairman on a point of Order. He had given Notice of his intention to move the insertion of two or three new clauses at the end of Clause 3, and he wished to know at what stage of the Bill he was to move them?

THE CHAIRMAN said, they must be moved at the end of the Bill.

Clause 4 (Correction of misprints in 44 and 45 Vict. c. 58).

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) moved, in page 3, after line 31, to insert—

“(5.) In section one hundred and forty-five of ‘The Army Act, 1881,’ the words ‘when any order or decree’ shall be substituted for the words ‘when any order, decree’ in the second sub-section.”

He explained that the Amendment had been rendered necessary by the addition of the word “or” after “order.”

Question, “That those words be there inserted,” put, and agreed to.

MR. SEXTON rose to move the insertion of a new clause to provide that there should be paid to every soldier engaged in special service relating to the recovery of rents, ejectments, and evictions in Ireland, a daily sum, by way of extra allowance, over and above his regular daily pay, equal to the daily extra sum allowed for similar service to each member of the Royal Irish Constabulary.

THE CHAIRMAN: I must point out to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that this clause and the clause which follows, relating to the rates to be paid to carmen, are not in Order, because they propose to increase the sums considered to be necessary by the Crown in the Estimates for the Army, and, therefore, they cannot be put. The third clause of the hon. Member is in Order.

MR. HEALY, on the point of Order, wished to ask if the Chairman was aware that the late Chairman of Committees (Mr. Cecil Raikes) allowed the hon. Member for Galway to move an Amendment of a similar character? Was the ruling which the right hon. Gentleman in the Chair had just given, given with a knowledge of the course taken by his Predecessor?

THE CHAIRMAN: I have not, at the moment, been able to read the ruling to which the hon. Member refers; but I have a distinct recollection of it. The Rule then laid down, as I recollect, rendered it possible to move such an Amendment in a Bill which had not any force in law, but which required an annual Act of Parliament to bring it into force. But the present Bill is of a different character, because it becomes an Act which is in itself law; and, therefore, the ruling to which the hon. Member (Mr. Healy) has referred does not apply.

MR. SEXTON remarked, that the gross sum involved was not a very large one, and the expense was one which was under the control of the War Office.

THE CHAIRMAN: Whether the sum be large or small, as it is larger than is considered by the responsible Minister of the Crown to be necessary for the Public Service, it would be an increase; and, being an increase, it would be quite out of Order for a private Member to move it.

MR. BIGGAR said, the second of the proposed clauses raised a question of very considerable importance—namely, whether very gross cruelty was not practised in the way in which the cars were used by the police and the military? It might be that there were outrages and cases of cruelty to animals in certain parts of Ireland; but he was prepared to contend that much greater cruelty was practised by persons in the pay of the Government in putting the law into force.

MR. SEXTON observed that, if it would be in Order, he should be glad to move the latter part of the second of the proposed new clauses, which merely related to the manner in which the cars were to be used. He was personally acquainted with the fact that a great deal of cruelty was practised towards horses in Ireland, and that the property of the car owners was very much damaged. The only object of the latter part of the clause was to impose regulations upon the police and military in regard to the use of private property in Ireland, so as to prevent, in future, not only cruelty to horses, but damage to property. He should be glad to know whether it was competent for him to move the latter part of the clause?

THE CHAIRMAN: That portion of the clause, I think, would be in Order.

MR. SEXTON said he would move, then, after Clause 3, to insert the following Clause:—

“No car shall be used for the conveyance of more than four soldiers, and shall not be driven upon any one day, unless a change of horses be provided, more than eight miles out and eight miles back, and shall not be driven at a pace exceeding six miles per hour.”

At present, in some parts of Ireland, it was no uncommon circumstance to find a car crowded with six or seven soldiers who were driven great distances, often by inexperienced persons and sometimes by the soldiers themselves. The consequence was that the horses were frequently rendered useless to their owners for any further work for a considerable time. The horses were driven at a headlong speed and were often covered with foam. In the present excited state of Ireland, when the direction of affairs was presided over by persons at a distance, he considered that it was desirable for Parliament to interfere, in order that there might not be added to all the other elements of confusion, excitement, and ill-feeling, cruelty to animals, and the wanton injury and destruction of private property by persons in a subordinate position. He simply asked that when a magistrate or other officer took a car for the purpose of serving evictions, he should see that the horse and car were used in a fair and proper way. Of course, the regulations which were submitted in the clause would be subject to modification at the discretion of the Committee. He simply threw them out as the basis of a rational settlement; and if the proposal were accepted, he felt sure that it would be received with thankfulness by the Irish people. He was also satisfied, from the courtesy which was always displayed by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, that the proposition would receive fair consideration.

New Clause—

“No car shall be used for the conveyance of more than four soldiers, and shall not be driven upon any one day, unless a change of horses be provided, more than eight miles out and eight miles back, and shall not be driven at a pace exceeding six miles per hour.”—(Mr. Sexton,)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Clause be read a second time.”

MR. CHILDERS: I do not think that it is either expedient or necessary that I should enter at length into a discussion of the question; but I think I can give the hon. Gentleman very good reasons why I object to the clause, when

I say that, as a matter of fact, the cars which have been employed in Ireland have practically been obtained by the ordinary process, and not under the compulsory clauses of the Act. In one case, where complaint arose, the circumstances were considered by myself on an appeal at the War Office, and that which was deemed to be just was done. I think, therefore, that the clause, as proposed to be altered, would really only apply to the employment of cars in Ireland in a manner in which they have never yet been employed, and would, therefore, be entirely nugatory. I would suggest that it would be much better to leave the matter as it is now, so that any complaint as to the unfair use of cars may be dealt with by the authorities at the War Office. They have only hitherto been employed when necessary. What I promised the other day, on the second reading, was that I would look into the matter carefully before next year, and I added that if any complaints were made in the meanwhile I would consider them, and they would be dealt with on principles of justice. I cannot, therefore, give my consent to the introduction into the present Bill of a clause which would not affect the general practise, but would only deal with cases which have not hitherto occurred, and which are not likely to occur. For these reasons I hope the hon. Member will not press the clause.

MR. HEALY thought that his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) was placed in a position of considerable disadvantage in having had his clause curtailed. The right hon. Gentleman appeared to be unaware of the fact that a considerable number of seizures of cars had been made by the military authorities under the compulsory clauses of the Act. The right hon. Gentleman said there had been no seizure by soldiers.

MR. CHILDERS: What I said was that no complaints had arisen except in one case. In the particular districts in which it has been necessary to employ cars the Government have not taken advantage of the powers of the Act, and we have been very careful to see that no injustice was done.

MR. HEALY said, that that being so did not do away with the opposition of the Irish Members, nor in the slightest degree alter their position. Their contention was that when cars were seized under the compulsory clauses of the Act there should be due compensation awarded; that care should be taken that no unfair use was made of the cars; that the horses should not be overdriven, and that the cars should not be crowded. He had read in the papers the other day an account of a case in which the use of cars having been refused, the soldiers and police seized them, and drove them at such a rate that the knees of the horses were cut and broken. In every instance the car used was improperly crowded. He was not in a position to state that the facts reported in the papers were absolutely true; but he thought some inquiry ought to be made into them. What he desired now to obtain from the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was an assurance, in the event of injury being done to the horses, or where there was a complaint of overloading and damage to the cars, he would at once cause an investigation to be made, and see that the person who made the complaint was properly compensated. He presumed that, as far as the clause moved by his hon. Friend was concerned, he could scarcely expect the last part of it would be inserted, seeing that the first portion had been ruled by the Chairman to be informal. All he desired was that an assurance should be given by the right hon. Gentleman that whenever a compulsory seizure of cars was made, and it could be proved that the horses had been driven unfairly and the property damaged, the owners of the cars should have a claim for compensation.

MR. CHILDERS: I have no hesitation in giving an assurance to that effect, inasmuch as that is the principle upon which the War Office has already acted.

MR. BIGGAR said, it seemed to him that the assurance of the right hon. Gentleman was not altogether satisfactory, as it only went to a certain length. The right hon. Gentleman promised that compensation would be made in all cases in which it could be shown that the horses or cars had been unfairly treated. In such cases, of course, the owners would be entitled to be paid for the damage done; but the right hon. Gentleman made no provision whatever for the unfortunate horses. It was, unfortunately, the custom in Ireland, when evictions were to be carried out, to drive the horses over heavy roads, at an unreasonable pace and for an unreasonable distance. In fact, the amount of cruelty perpetrated in this way was very much in excess of anything that had taken place in the cases which had been cited in the House as instances of cruelty to animals.

Mr. CHILDERS: Of course, I cannot undertake to compensate horses; but I will see that justice is done to owners, where exceptional arrangements have to be made.

Mr. SEXTON said, his object in moving the clause was to obtain an assurance that the owners would be compensated for any injury inflicted upon them. He had every confidence, after the statement which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman, that when a well-founded complaint was made to him the owners would receive due compensation; and he would therefore, with the leave of the Committee, withdraw the clause.

Clause withdrawn.

Mr. SEXTON said, he had now to move a clause relating to the liability of a soldier to maintain his wife and children. He proposed in page 3, after Clause 5, to insert the following Clause:—

"Whereas it is desirable that the liability of a soldier or Marine to maintain his wife and children should be real and better defined, and it is expedient to provide for the same: Be it therefore enacted, as follows:—

"That section 145 of 'The Army Act, 1881,' shall be construed—

"(1.) As though the word 'shall' stood in the place of 'may' in sub-section 2, Clause 6.

"(2.) As though all the words after 'commanding officer of such soldier,' in sub-section 3, were omitted."

The object of the clause was to interpret the 145th section of the Act of 1881 in such a manner as to compel a soldier to maintain his wife and children, whether such children were born in wedlock or otherwise. The existing law was, in his (Mr. Sexton's) opinion, seriously defective. Several years had passed since a clause was inserted in the Mutiny Act, declaring that every soldier belonging to the Regular Forces was liable to contribute to the maintenance of his wife and children to the same extent as a civilian. But although several years had passed since that provision, declaring that the soldier should be made liable for the first of his natural obligations, was inserted, it was nevertheless the fact that the provision had been rendered altogether nugatory by the stipulations with which it was surrounded. It had been stated, that in the first parochial year following the insertion of this provision in the Mutiny Act, the total amount paid by the Secretary of State for War to the wives and children of soldiers, and towards the maintenance of children whose mothers were not married, amounted to £1,500. He had since learned, however, that this statement was altogether inaccurate; and he was informed by a leading member of an association which took an interest in the question that the total amount paid by the Secretary of State in the first parochial year, instead of being £1,500, was only £58. He thought that fact was amply sufficient in itself to show that the provision which had been inserted in the Act, which professed to place a soldier on the same level as a civilian, had totally failed. He would explain in a few words what the present position of a soldier was. If a man deserted his wife and children and enlisted into Her Majesty's Army, what steps had the wife to take in order to obtain proper support for herself and family. In the first place, she was obliged to go to the Union and obtain relief; and then she was required to procure a summons to be served on her husband's commanding officer, wherever he might happen to be. It was a shameful fact that the organization of the British Army was conducted in such a way that before a man became liable to these obligations care was taken to remove him from the town in which he was likely to become liable, before the woman could take any steps to assert her rights. But that was not all. The wife had, in the first instance, to go to the workhouse; in the second place, to apply to the Board of Guardians for a summons against the commanding officer; in the third, she was required to serve the summons at the place where the soldier was quartered; and, fourthly, she was required to deposit with the summons a sum of money sufficient to take the soldier from the place where he was quartered to the place where the case was to be heard, and then to take him back again. In the case of a mother who was not the wife, the same regulations were enforced. She had to apply for a summons to be served on the commanding officer of the soldier wherever he happened to be quartered, and to deposit a sum of money sufficient to bring him to the place of hearing and take him back again. The Committee would see that such a requirement amounted, in many cases, to a total abnegation of justice. He was informed that the effect of the regulation was to make it necessary for a poor woman who had any claim upon a soldier to deposit a sum of money that was never less than £2, and which often exceeded that sum. A poor woman was often unable to procure such a sum; and the enforcement of the regulation, therefore, amounted to a total denial of justice. The right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War dropped an observation on the second reading of the Bill which seemed to have some force—namely, that if the mere issue of a summons was all that was required to bring a soldier from his quarters, there would be cases of collusion with a view to enabling the soldier to desert. Of course, that danger would exist; but he (Mr. Sexton) thought the resources of the law would be sufficient to guard against it. But even if it did occur, was it to be said that because in one case out of 100 there might be collusion between a soldier and a woman in order to enable the soldier to desert from Her Majesty's Service, that in the 99 other cases defenceless women having a legal claim upon the soldier should be deprived of the means of asserting their claims to the maintenance of their children and themselves? He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would not attempt to maintain that contention. It had also been pointed out that the soldier, at the time the summons was served, might be with his regiment ordered for foreign service. He (Mr. Sexton) did not think the mere fact that the man was ordered for foreign service should amount to a plenary indulgence. Surely the Service of the Queen had not come to such a pass that every individual soldier under orders for foreign service must be protected against his civil liabilities. If any class of Her Majesty's subjects deserved commiseration at the hands of the Committee it was these unfortunate women, whether they were wives or otherwise, who were abandoned by the men who were morally bound to protect and maintain them. He should be surprised if the Government, desiring and affecting as they did to be considered a moral Government, should take upon themselves to say that Her Majesty's Army was to be a refuge for every abandoned man who desired to desert those who had a natural claim upon him. He did not address this complaint in particular to right hon. Gentlemen now in Office. The matter was not new to the House of Commons, and there were more than one hon. and right hon. Gentleman sitting on the Treasury Bench who had, on a previous occasion, voted for an Amendment identical with that which he was about to submit to the Committee. It was, therefore, no new affair. Among those who had already supported a similar Amendment were the hon. Baronet the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs (Sir Charles W. Dilke), the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board (Mr. Dodson), the right hon. Gentleman the Postmaster General (Mr. Fawcett), the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland (Mr. W. E. Forster), the hon. and learned Solicitor General for England (Sir Farrer Herschell), the noble Lord the Member for Haverfordwest (Lord Kensington), and the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Council (Mr. Mundella). All of those hon. and right hon. Gentlemen had already voted for the Amendment, and he trusted that he should have their support on the present occasion. When, however, a woman had gone through all the various preliminary stages which he had described—after she had gone into the workhouse, obtained a summons, and deposited a sum of money necessary to bring the soldier to the place where the case was to be heard, and take him back again, she could then obtain in her favour a reduction of the soldier's pay. But even then the discretion of the Secretary of State for War was interposed, and she was likely to be deprived of the small sum awarded to her. The Act of Parliament said that the Secretary of State "may," at his discretion and good pleasure, order a portion of the pay not exceeding 6*d.* per day in the case of a sergeant or non-commissioned officer above the rank of an ordinary soldier, and of 3*d.* a day in the case of a private, to be appropriated in liquidation of the woman's claim, "in such manner as the Secretary of State may think fit." It was unnecessary to point out to the Committee that the sum authorized to be deducted from the pay of the soldier was in all conscience small enough without the interposition of any discretionary power on the part of the Secretary of State. In the case of non-commissioned officers and sergeants it was only 6*d.*, and of a private 3*d.* He (Mr. Sexton) presumed that these sums were fixed upon, in the first instance, because they were sums which could be deducted from the pay of these persons without disorganizing the internal economy of the regiment to which they belonged or interfering with the efficiency of the Army. Nobody would be prepared to say that when a soldier had left his wife and children destitute, or a mother and child, although the mother might not happen to be his wife—nobody would say that in such a case the payment of 6*d.* a-day by a non-commissioned officer and 3*d.* by a private was too much for the purpose of maintaining them. What he (Mr. Sexton) claimed was this—that when the woman had laboriously put the law into operation, and obtained a decree from a regularly constituted tribunal for this miserable sum, she should not be further embarrassed and handicapped by the exercise of the discretionary power of the Secretary of State. His first Amendment—for there were really two contained in the clause he was about to submit—was to abolish the discretionary powers of the Secretary of State; to render the provisions of the Act honest instead of illusory, and to do away with a discretion which, if really exercised at all, could only be interposed between a soldier and his natural obligations and liabilities. The second provision contained in the clause was to abolish the regulations which obliged a mother, on obtaining a summons, to deposit a sum of money necessary to defray the cost of bringing the soldier to the place where the case was to be heard and taking him back again. He based the clause upon the broad ground that a soldier, as well as a civilian, if he rendered himself liable to the law for the maintenance of a woman and child, who were among the most helpless classes known to the law, the public funds, if necessary, should be used in conveying the soldier to the place where he was called upon to answer for his default. It was intolerable, discreditable, and disgraceful to a country like this that military discipline should be used to shelter a man from claims against him which the law would sternly require him to answer if he were a civilian. He took his ground upon the language of the Statute, which said that a soldier should be equally liable with a civilian; but he contended that, as the Act now stood, he was not equally liable. He asked that this de-lusive discretionary power should be removed. A regiment could not lose much by the temporary loss of the services of such a man. If it were necessary to alter the Regulations of the War Office, and to make a rule that when a soldier upon whom such a claim was made was ordered upon foreign service, he should not, as at present, obtain practical immunity by going abroad, but should be detained to answer the charge, and should follow his regiment by another steamer, or be drafted, if necessary, into another regiment. At any rate, let justice be done to the woman and her children wherever they might be scattered. This was not an Irish question; Irishmen formed only a comparatively small portion of the British Army, and he did not believe that of that infinitesimally small proportion any large number ever deserted their wives and children. It was essentially an English question, and he now moved the insertion of the new clause, leaving it for the English Members and the Government to say how it was to be dealt with.

New Clause (Mr. Sexton) brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time."

THE JUDGE ADVOCATE GENERAL (Mr. OSBORNE MORGAN) said, the clause proposed, as the hon. Member (Mr. Sexton) had pointed out, really involved two different Amendments. The first related to the exercise of a discretion by the Secretary of State. The hon. Member had complained of the very small amount of money paid over by the Secretary of State under this section of the Act of Parliament; but he seemed to forget that that was owing to the peculiar conditions under which alone the liability could arise. The cases of unrecognized marriages were very rare indeed, and for this reason. When a man desired to enlist in the Army and was attested, he was asked, in his attestation paper, if he was a married or a single man; and if he replied that he was married he was not accepted. If he stated that he was single, when in reality he was married, he rendered himself liable to be proceeded against under the 33rd section of the Army Act; and he might be sentenced to two years' imprisonment with hard labour. The result was that exceedingly few married men entered the Service; and as the bulk of the men who entered the Army were unmarried men, no large claim in respect of legitimate children could arise. The provision in relation to the wives and children of soldiers was introduced into the Act by Lord Cardwell in 1871, after the most careful consideration; and Lord Cardwell addressed himself to the subject with the express desire of arranging matters in such a way as to meet the exigencies of the Service, and, at the same time, to do justice to the soldiers' families, and those who might have a claim upon them. The first section of the Army Act which the hon. Member sought to amend was the 145th, which gave a discretionary power to the Secretary of State. He (Mr. Osborne Morgan) did not see how they were to do away with the exercise of this discretionary power altogether. He had never yet heard of any complaint having been made against the exercise of the power; and that being so, to do away with all discretion whatever, and to tie up the hands of the Secretary of State and make it imperative on him to make an order in every case, would be most objectionable. There could not be the slightest doubt that wherever an order ought to be made it would be made. So much with regard to the first part of the hon. Member's Amendment. In regard to the second question raised by the clause, the hon. Member must surely be aware that, for a purpose like this, there existed a vast difference between a soldier and a civilian. In the case of a civilian, the father and mother of the child probably resided in the same parish, and there would be nothing to take the father away. But in the case of a soldier, he might be ordered with his regiment to the furthest part of the Kingdom, or perhaps out of the country altogether. If, therefore, some woman took out a summons for the making of an affiliation order upon him, he would be obliged to go all the way at his own expense, or at the expense of the public, when it might not be certain that the charge was well founded. Anyone who had any experience of magisterial inquiries knew that these cases were constantly trumped up; and it was necessary to require the woman to deposit what might be looked upon as caution money as a proof of the bona fides of her claim. In common justice to the soldier and for the requirements of the Service, it was absolutely necessary that some such provision as this should be maintained with the view of preventing unfounded charges from being recklessly made. For these reasons he should certainly oppose the Amendment.

MR. BIGGAR said, it seemed to him that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General altogether failed to meet the case established by his hon. Friend the Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). The case of his hon. Friend was a most rational one. The law, as it stood at present, amounted to this—all that a woman could get from a private soldier was 3*d.* a-day, which amounted to a little over £4 10*s.* a-year, or 6*d.* a-day from a sergeant or non-commissioned officer, which amounted to a little more than £9 a-year. The amount was so exceedingly small that a person must be in a very poor position in life to make it worth while to obtain it; and it was absurd to suppose that she would have sufficient means at her command to enable her to deposit the sum of money which the law now required her to deposit. Therefore, unless the Government were prepared to contend that the woman should have no redress at all, it was most desirable that the law should be altered. He would suggest that, instead of a sum of money being required to be lodged by the woman upon instituting proceedings, it should be competent for the preliminary Court—namely, the magistrate—to receive evidence from the soldier in the shape of an affidavit, which the Court might consider for what it was worth.

If the Court were of opinion that an order should be made, and the soldier still disputed the claim and thought he could establish a stronger case, then let him attend the place of hearing at his own expense. It certainly appeared to him that if a wife made a claim for the maintenance and support of herself and her children, she should not be required, as a preliminary step, to deposit a large sum of money, especially when it was taken into consideration that, after all, it was competent for the Secretary of State to refuse his assent to the judgment of the magistrate. Certainly, if the money were actually deposited by the woman, it should be in the power of the magistrate who heard the case to deliver a final judgment without the Secretary of State having any discretionary voice in the matter. At present the woman was placed in a most unfortunate position. She had not only to make out her case and establish her claim under circumstances of extreme hardship and difficulty, but she was liable to have any judgment in her favour revised by a tribunal before which she could not be heard. It appeared to him, as the matter now stood, that the provision made on behalf of the woman was entirely illusory, and that she was altogether without the power of obtaining redress. There was nothing whatever, as far as he was able to see, to justify the opposition which was given to the clause by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General.

MR. RYLANDS said, he was quite aware that on former occasions, when this question had been brought before the House, there was a feeling on that side in the direction of the Amendment proposed by the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton). But it did seem to him, upon the present occasion, that the form in which the proposal was now made was such that it was quite impossible for them to accept it. There were two distinct propositions contained in the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman. The first appeared to him to be a reasonable one. He thought the substitution of the word "shall" for "may," in the 145th section of the Army Act, would be altogether an improvement. He differed from his right hon. and learned Friend the Judge Advocate General (Mr. Osborne Morgan) that the effect of the alteration of this word would be to leave the Secretary of State without discretion in the matter. The Secretary of State would still have a wide discretion, and the Committee must bear in mind that the action of the Secretary of State did not take place until after the matter had been before a judicial tribunal. Before the matter could come under the notice of the Secretary of State at all there must be some order or decree under the provisions of the Common Law for the payment by a soldier or a non-commissioned officer belonging to the Regular Forces for the maintenance of his wife or child, or of any bastard child, of which he was the father. When the case was decided according to the legal requirements the order was sent to the Secretary of State, who had power to direct it to be enforced, and to make a reduction from the pay of the soldier for the support of his wife and legitimate or illegitimate children. Then the Act went on to say that the Secretary of State may—

"Order a portion of the soldier's pay, not exceeding a certain amount, to be appropriated for this purpose."

It therefore seemed to him that a discretionary power would still remain with the Secretary of State in this way. The word "shall" in the place of "may" would only require the Secretary of State to make such an order as, in his judgment, would be necessary to meet the necessities of the case; and, therefore, there was clearly a discretionary power to settle the amount within the very small sum fixed by the Act. Supposing, in the very improbable case that the circumstances were such as to induce the Secretary of State to make a small order, it was clearly within his power, under the clause, to make a very small order indeed. But, while that appeared to be perfectly reasonable, he understood that the Secretary of State undertook that this particular point should be reconsidered before the introduction of the next Continuation Bill. He had no doubt, in his own mind, that practically the Secretary of State did, under such circumstances, make an order, and that, therefore, the matter might safely be left to the Secretary of State for the present year after the discussion which had taken place, with the understanding that he would consider the propriety of making a change next Session. With regard to the other part of the Amendment, he must say that, in its present form, it was quite impossible for the Committee to assent to it. If they were to allow a soldier stationed at a considerable distance, on an ex parte statement, to be brought up at his own cost to defend himself against such a claim, everyone would see that, under such circumstances, it would be altogether unfair to place the soldier altogether at the mercy of any woman who chose to prefer a charge against him. He believed there would be very great difficulty in altering the law in that respect; and, although he had every desire to meet the wishes of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton), if the hon. Member pressed that part of the Amendment to a division he should feel bound to vote against him. At the same time he hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would carry out the intention which had been announced, and that he would deal with the matter on a future occasion.

MR. CAVENDISH BENTINCK said, it had been his duty in former times, on several occasions, when this question was raised by the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), whom he saw opposite, to consider it; and he hoped, therefore, that he might be allowed to say a few words. In regard to what had fallen from the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), he hardly agreed with the hon. Member that there was any material difference between the proposition of the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) and that which was formerly made by the hon. Member for Leicester. Before the new Army Act was passed, the law was administered under the Mutiny Act and under the Articles of War; and if hon. Members would read the provisions contained in those Acts together, they would find that they did not differ very materially from the present proposal. It was quite clear, therefore, that his hon. Friend the Member for Burnley was only anxious to find some salve to apply to his conscience for the vote he was about to give; and as it was not the first time that such a thing had been done, he presumed that his hon. Friend would follow his ordinary practice. He wished, however, to point out to the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General (Mr.

Osborne Morgan) had omitted to state one of the most material objections to the present proposal, and one which he (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had always brought forward in times past. In his opinion it was the most material objection of all—namely, that if any provision of this kind became law, it would interfere with the well-recognized principle that the Crown had absolute power and command over the Army and over the soldiers' pay. No doubt, when the money was voted, the Crown could not apply it to its own use, or to any other purpose than paying the soldier; and as the soldier, who had the primary and original claim to that pay, could not proceed against the Crown or against the Secretary of State in regard to it, so it would be utterly impossible, and contrary to all reason, that secondary claims, such as that of a wife or child, whether legitimate or illegitimate, should be allowed to prevail. Moreover, he could himself assure the hon. Member that when he held the position now occupied by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he took a great deal of trouble, by personal inquiry at the War Office, to ascertain whether any injustice whatever was committed towards these women; and the opinion of his right hon. and gallant Friend then at the head of the War Office (Colonel Stanley) was that, whenever there was the case of a wife not of a bad character, the War Office almost invariably made an order in her favour, without there being any necessity at all that she should take out a summons, or attempt by legal means to enforce her claim. That was certainly the case during the period he held the Office, and he had never heard any complaint of a substantial kind. Indeed, he had never heard of any complaint whatever. Therefore it seemed to him that when the system was working so well it was undesirable to interfere with it. He remembered that on a former occasion he was ruled out of Order for referring to a second Amendment before it had been proposed; and, therefore, he should be only right in adhering strictly to the Rules of Debate, especially at a time like the present, by reserving any observations on the second point raised by the hon. Member for Sligo. But he was bound to say that, if the existing power was enlarged in the manner proposed by the hon. Member, it would, in his opinion, lead to a great deal of fraud on the part, not only of women, but of soldiers. The question raised by the hon. Member for Sligo was of considerable interest and importance, and one which it was highly desirable to have settled once for all; and, that being so, he thought the hon. Member was entitled to the thanks of the Committee for bringing the matter to an issue, and affording them the satisfaction of knowing what was the real opinion of the Members of Her Majesty's Government with regard to it. The reference which had been made by the hon. Member to a number of hon. Gentlemen who voted on a former occasion when the Bill was before the Committee he regarded as very interesting; and the point which it illustrated was, he thought, most important, as showing the opinions held by hon. Gentlemen on the opposite Benches on the occasion referred to. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) had himself looked into the list, and found that there were 13 Members of the present Government who voted with the hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor) when he last proposed to amend this clause of the Act, and amongst them the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General, and the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General, who voted on both divisions, and by his vote seemed to have dissented from the great Constitutional doctrine that the Crown had absolute command of the soldiers' pay. It was to be regretted that the hon. and learned Attorney General was not then in his place, because, otherwise, the Committee might have listened to a recantation of the opinion which he formerly held, and the reasons which induced him to alter his views. He (Mr. Cavendish Bentinck) would not take up the time of the Committee by referring in detail to the other Members of the Government who voted for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicester, beyond mentioning that amongst them was one noble Lord who acted as Political Secretary to the Treasury, and another who otherwise assisted in that Department. With the exception of his noble Friend the Financial Secretary to the Treasury, who was always sound in his doctrines and logical in his arguments, there was no other Member of the present Government who voted against the Amendment. He trusted that the hon. Member for Sligo would proceed to a division, and that the result would show that Members of the Cabinet were united upon this question.

MR. P. A. TAYLOR said, he thanked the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) for having brought forward his Amendments on the present occasion. He (Mr. P. A. Taylor) had himself taken great pains with the subject, and had brought forward a similar Amendment in previous years. He had not done so that year, because so many promises had been made on the subject by Ministers that he really believed the obnoxious clauses would be removed. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General contended that it was always usual to place discretion in the hands of magistrates and other officers. But in this case discretion should only have relation to the fact. If the money was proved to be due from the soldier, it could not be within the discretion of the officer to say he should be exempted from its payment. From a Return which he had obtained, it appeared that in 1874 only £58 0s. 11d. was paid under Clause 107 of the Mutiny Act. The right hon. and learned Gentleman was hardly correct in accounting for this by the small number of cases that arose, for it appeared by the same Return that 629 women, the wives of soldiers, and 1,241 young persons who were their children were in receipt of parochial relief, a fact which in itself was sufficient to show how difficult it was for women to get any effectual remedy. In the year 1837, a clause was inserted in the Mutiny Act, declaring absolutely the non-obligation of the soldier for the maintenance of his wife and children. But public attention became aroused, and was directed to the matter; and about the year 1872 the then Minister of War (Mr. Cardwell) promised that the clause should be expunged. That was actually done; but the alteration was made in such a manner as to render utterly nugatory the nominal advantage which had been gained. He feared that hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on those Benches were becoming very moderate in their liberality; and not only did things appear to move very slowly, but, from the arguments which had been advanced on that side of the House, it would seem that they were likely to become retrogressive. His hon. Friend the Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands), for instance, now expressed the opinion that the second Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo went too far, and was unreasonable; yet that Amendment was identically the same that he had supported when he (Mr. P. A. Taylor) brought it forward some years ago, and its object was to repeal a qualification which Earl Cairns declared in the House of Lords rendered the provision absolutely nugatory. He (Mr. P. A. Taylor) should support the Motion of his hon. Friend opposite (Mr. Sexton), who, he trusted, would proceed to a division.

Mr. CHILDERS said, he had already expressed the opinion, on a former occasion, that this subject was well worthy of careful consideration by the Secretary of State for War. In his opinion, as at present advised, there ought to be some discretion given to the Secretary of State, who was responsible for the Army; but, notwithstanding that opinion, as he had before said, the subject was a very fair one for inquiry, and he could promise that it should be carefully looked into at the War Office, and the result stated to the House in the course of the year.

Mr. SEXTON said, he would admit that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War had met this matter in a spirit of courtesy and conciliation. Nevertheless, having regard to the many futile efforts that had been made to restore considerations of humanity to the Act, and the many pledges which had been given by right hon. Gentlemen formerly occupying the position of Secretary of State for War, he was obliged to confess that he regarded all promises made in connection with the Act with a considerable amount of apprehension. He certainly could not congratulate the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands) upon the speech he had just delivered, in which he became the advocate of the Government in resisting the claims of women and children. The hon. Member for Leicester (Mr. P. A. Taylor), on the other hand, had dealt with this matter as might have been expected; for they all knew that no Party considerations, or the mere fact that he now sat on the Ministerial side of the House, could change the aspect of the case in his mind. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Judge Advocate General had defended the discretion given to the Secretary of State for War on the ground that some discretion must be given; but he (Mr. Sexton) would point out that some discretion would still rest with the Secretary of State, even if his (Mr. Sexton's) Amendment were adopted. Was it just to say that because the magistrate had discretionary power, and because it had been exercised in favour of the applicant upon public grounds, another discretion having reference to military discipline must be likewise piled up upon the appeal of the woman? The discretion of the magistrate was relevant to the case; but that of the Secretary of State was not so. He proposed that the word "may" should be struck out and the word "shall" substituted. That proposal still left it to the discretion of the Secretary of State to fix the amount to be paid by the soldier. It did not say that he should order the payment of 6*d.* or of 3*d.* per day; it meant simply that the Secretary of State should do something; and he (Mr. Sexton) claimed that his discretion remained complete, inasmuch as he could, if necessary, cut down the amount to 1*d.* For those reasons he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War not to allow the present opportunity to pass without taking some practical action in the matter. He was obliged to express his surprise that the hon. Member for Burnley should discover such a difference between the present Amendment and that which he supported two years ago. As a matter of fact, the Amendments were identical; and the speech of the hon. Member for Burnley was a proof of the inutility of opposing the principles of justice and humanity to the interests of Party in the House of Commons. Had the hon. Member still sat on that (the Opposition) side of the House, he would, no doubt, have been the foremost champion of the cause, and would have described the wrongs of these unfortunate women and children in language sufficient to stir the hearts of the most fossil Tories. Although 13 Members of the present Government, when they were in Opposition, had voted for the amendment of the Act, they could now only oppose the charge of vagueness to this demand for justice. The right hon. and learned Judge Advocate General defended the deposit of the soldiers' expenses on the ground that many cases were trumped up, and that the result of the summons was uncertain. But that applied to all charges, and it was impossible to say whether anybody was guilty or not until the case was finished. Were they to be told that because one dishonest woman in 100 might make a claim against a soldier, as wife or otherwise, for some contribution, 99 honest women were to be shut out from redress? With regard to the removal of soldiers before they became liable, he maintained that this shameful practice ought to be put an end to; that the Queen's Service could very well afford to do without the assistance of such men for a month or two; and that where a man had deserted a woman he should be kept in the country until his case was disposed of. In conclusion, he could not but express regret that the change from one side of the House to the other had wrought such an alteration in the opinions of right hon. Gentlemen opposite.

MR. HOPWOOD said, he was disposed to support the hon. Member for Sligo (Mr. Sexton) in his endeavour to amend the Act. According to his reading of the section, it must appear, in the first place, to the satisfaction of the Secretary of State for War that the soldier had deserted, or left without reasonable cause, his wife, or children under 14 years of age. It might seem a very small matter to retain the word "may" in the clause; but the word "shall" in this case would make all the difference, and its adoption would convey to a great many people who took an interest in the matter certain evidence that the House of Commons would act upon the view that justice should be an imperative demand upon the Secretary of State, to the full extent which the Act of Parliament allowed. For these reasons he should support the Amendment of the hon. Member for Sligo.

SUPPLY.—COMMITTEE.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair."

SOUTH AFRICA (ZULULAND)—CETEWAYO (RELEASE FROM CAPTIVITY).

MOTION FOR AN ADDRESS.

MR. GORST, in rising to move—

"That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to release Cetewayo, the Zulu King, from the unjust captivity in which he is now held,"

said, he felt quite sure that the Government would understand him when he stated that he did not bring forward this Motion with the intention of inaugurating any Party attack on the policy of the Government in South Africa, for on the question of the Zulu War he had always been a supporter of the present Government. He might even say that he believed there was no difference between the two great Parties in the State in reference to this policy, because neither the Conservative nor the Liberal Party would maintain the justice of the War which was waged against the Zulus. The late Government did everything to stop it, and refused the reinforcements which were asked for by Sir Bartle Frere for the purpose of commencing the War, and sent him direct Instructions on the subject; but he was, unfortunately, so anxious to carry out his policy that he commenced the war before he had received the Instructions of Her Majesty's Government. There was no one in that House who would defend the celebrated Ultimatum which he sent to the Zulu King—an Ultimatum which, in the first place, he had no right to send; and, in the second place, one of which it was quite impossible to fulfil the conditions. Moreover, the Ultimatum did not reach the Zulu King before the War commenced, so as to allow him to fulfil the conditions of it, or even to consider it, though it had reached John Dunn; and there was no doubt that it was merely devised for the purpose of throwing dust in the eyes of the philanthropic public at home. In the debate which took place in 1879 no one attempted to defend the justice of the war; and he did not think the position of the late Government could be better summed up than in the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Gloucestershire (Sir Michael Hicks-Beach). On the 23rd of January, 1879, that right hon. Gentleman, who was then Secretary of State for the Colonies, wrote to Sir Bartle Frere, saying—

“The terms which we have dictated to the Zulu King are evidently such as he cannot refuse even at the risk of war.”

After such a statement as that no Minister could say that the War waged was just. He did not propose to trouble them with an argument to show that that War was unjust; but he thought he should be assisting the House to understand the present aspect of the question if he were to point out two fallacies which were asserted and generally received in 1879. The first was that the Zulu King, at the time of the War, had framed an intention to invade the Colony of Natal. The report of that intention created quite a panic in Natal, and he believed that almost every Native war had its origin in a senseless panic of that kind. It was a curious fact that the alarm was most intense at the greatest distance from the boundary. Sir Bartle Frere had stated that farms of the Dutch and English settlers on the boundary were deserted in consequence of fear of the Zulus. But there could be no doubt that the real cause of that desertion was want of water. That had been proved by a gentleman who was travelling in the country at the time, who had also shown conclusively that it was not the intention of the Zulu King to invade the Colony. Even after the disastrous battle of Isandlana Cetewayo had no intention of invading Natal, though, if he had done so, a most dreadful disaster would have befallen that Colony. The Zulu operations after that battle were limited to an attack upon Rorke's Drift; and even that attack was undertaken against the will and against the direct order of the King, who would have killed the leader of the force which made it had he not been a Prince. Everybody recollected the story of the waggoners, fugitives from Isandlana, who, having crossed the Buffalo River, fell exhausted on the Natal shore. The Zulus who pursued them followed them across the river, and were about to kill them, when their officers compelled them to retire, as the King had given no orders that Natal should be invaded. The fact was that there never had been any invasion of the Colony of Natal until the 25th of June, when an attack was made on the Colony in retaliation for a great number of raids which had been made upon Zululand by the orders of Lord Chelmsford, and against the orders of Sir Henry Bulwer and of the Executive Council of Natal. All these facts were convincing proofs that it never had been the intention of the Zulu King to invade Natal. The second fallacy which the events of the Zulu War had entirely exploded was that the Zulu King was a cruel tyrant, who had so misgoverned his country that he was hated by his people, who wished to get rid of him. To show how utterly this idea was at variance with the truth he would refer to The Cape Times of September 11, 1879, in which it was stated that when the Zulu force was utterly broken and the King was a fugitive from the British force, which was hunting for him, not one of his people could be induced, either by fear of death, or the destruction of their homes, or the loss of their cattle, or by the offer of a large bribe, to disclose his hiding place. One Zulu, who appeared to have yielded to the inducements and the threats which had been held out to him, had led our forces into the bush, and had then given them the slip. These facts showed that, so far from hating their King and from regarding him as a cruel tyrant, the Zulus were devoted to him. What, then, was the position in which we now found ourselves? Here was a man who, according to the admissions of the Secretary of State for the Colonies, had done no wrong in resisting our invasion of his country in the course of a war which had been denounced by the great Liberal Party as wholly unjust, and who was yet detained in a sad and melancholy—he would not say a cruel—captivity. Could hon. Members realize to themselves what this captivity meant to this man? He would take the liberty of giving some account of that captivity from the small book published by Lady Florence Dixie, and which was published in September last. The statement first appeared in the columns of The Morning Post anonymously; but everyone knew by whom it was written. When visited by Lady Florence Dixie, she remarked how changed he was; his features had assumed in repose a sad and constrained expression, while his face had become wrinkled. It was said by those who were about him that he was fretting a good deal, and was subject to long fits of depression. "A little longer of this," he said, "and I shall die." He also said that his people wished to have him back in his land, where his heart was, that he was heart-sick and weary of waiting, and he asked—

"When will England be just and let me return? Do they think that because I am a Black man I cannot feel, or that I suffer the less by this long and weary captivity? England has given the Transvaal back to the Boers, and Basutoland back to the Basutos, and all are free but me. . . . I am weary and sick at heart. I have applied to England, who, they tell me, is great and just, and I have applied to her Queen, who they tell me is merciful; but my prayer is unheeded."

That was the position in which we kept a man, who, the Secretary of State for the Colonies said, was perfectly justified in what he had done. He had been asked what arguments he relied on in demanding the release of Cetewayo; but the presumption was all in favour of such a demand. He, however, contended that it was not his duty to show reasons why the King should be liberated; but that he ought to ask the Government what arguments they were going to put forward to show that he should be still kept in prison. He wished particularly to call attention to this point; and he would assert that it was for the Government to prove that it was necessary that the King should be kept in confinement. It was said that the release of Cetewayo would spoil the settlement which was come to of Zululand; but was that a good reason for his continued captivity? He did not quite recognize the morality of keeping a man in unjust captivity because he might interfere with a policy which was being pursued elsewhere. He had fancied, until the Papers on Zululand were placed in the hands of hon. Members, that some argument would be used, to the effect that in the present position of Zululand people should hesitate before letting loose a source of disturbance like Cetewayo. He had, therefore, read with interest and curiosity the Correspondence relating to the affairs of Zululand lately laid upon the Table of the House. At the same time, he would warn the House that those Blue Books were, in a great measure, untrustworthy, because they never contained the whole truth. He did not attribute to the officers of the Government any intention of wilfully falsifying any statements which had been made; but in forwarding documents to the Colonial Office there was necessarily a selection made. In the selection nothing favourable to the Government was omitted; but sometimes those things which were unfavourable were left out, and the most favourable view was put before Parliament. Taking the Blue Book as an absolutely true statement of affairs as they were at present in Zululand, he would venture to say that if any man would read it through, separating the really important documents it contained from the mass of rubbish in which they were concealed, he would come to the conclusion that there existed in Zululand a most disgraceful and most alarming condition of barbarity and bloodshed, and that in the midst of that bloodshed the British Resident was absolutely incapable. Two or three particulars of facts, which would be found in the Blue Book, would show the condition in which Zululand was. He found that in two districts out of the 13 in which Zululand had been divided, there had been, from an early period, quarrels between the Chiefs appointed to rule over those districts and the inhabitants. It was singular that the malcontents and the disaffected against the Government were in the one case the man who had been Cetewayo's Chief Induna, or Prime Minister, and in the other case his brother, or half-brother. Those men appeared to have acted with such severity that even Sir Evelyn Wood appeared to have thought it was far beyond what ought to have been inflicted. In the despatch dated May 30th, 1881 (page 30), Mr. Osborne, the British Resident in Zululand, said, with reference to the punishment inflicted upon some of the malcontents, that he was certain the seizures, to the extent to which they had been made, were out of proportion to the gravity or nature of the offences for which the punishment had been inflicted. That was the sort of treatment to which the Chiefs whom we had established had been subjecting their fellow-creatures. In those two cases the High Commissioner, Sir Evelyn Wood, himself, had inquired into the history of the events, and had decreed that the two Chiefs should restore one-third of the cattle which they had taken from the people.

Mr. Gorst

Up to the present day that distinct judgment and order of Sir Evelyn Wood had never been fulfilled by either of the two Chiefs in question; and one of the Chiefs, according to the Report of the British Resident, evidently did not intend to fulfil them. So much for the respect felt by the Chiefs towards the Government which had appointed them. Again, a stranger recently made his appearance in one of the districts in the character of a usurper. The Chief in possession abandoned his territory to the new comer, and took refuge with John Dunn, who proposed to interfere in order to reinstate him. Both the Secretary of State in Downing Street and the High Commissioner peremptorily forbade John Dunn to interfere. Nevertheless, John Dunn collected an army and marched into the disputed territory, completely destroying the forces of the usurper, who had agreed to submit his claim to the decision of the Resident, and capturing a large number of women and cattle. Some women also, it appeared, were killed. All this, apparently, was done in defiance of official instructions to the contrary. A few days previously—that was to say, on July 25 of last year—John Dunn, it was true, had a conversation with the Resident, as the result of which the latter agreed to “advise” the other Chiefs to “assist” in ejecting the usurper. It would be interesting to know whether any record of that conversation had been sent to the Colonial Office. The presumption was that John Dunn flatly told the Resident he would not obey orders. At all events, two days afterwards, the Resident did advise the other Chiefs to act; and as no one had a force ready but John Dunn the work fell entirely to him, with what result they heard from the Natives sent by the Resident to watch the proceedings. Such of the captured women as had relatives to ransom them were allowed to be ransomed; the others remained the property of their captors. That was the sort of thing done under the protection of the British Government in Zululand! The cattle taken were mostly divided among the victors, a large number being appropriated by John Dunn himself. That was the story told by the messenger whom the Resident had sent, and who would naturally not make the situation worse than it was. Then he said that in the course of conversation afterwards Dunn remarked that the people of Zululand would in future pay no regard to the Resident, because he only talked, and never did anything. Here, then, was the Chief Dunn, whom we had set up, deliberately despising the orders of the Government, marching into the disturbed territory, attacking the Chief, capturing women and cattle, distributing them as he liked among the people, and saying that the Resident was nobody. Was it surprising, then, that this man Dunn should announce his intention of annexing the territory and saying that the British Resident had ordered him to take charge of it? But that was not all. A traitor—one of Cetewayo’s brothers—who had come over to us in the course of the War, and who was chosen as the Chief over one of the territories, attacked a neighbouring tribe against the distinct orders of the British Resident, and destroyed every male that could be laid hold of, and some women. A woman described what had been done. She said that the Chief arrived at the kraal at sunset, and seized the cattle. The women fled. When they had gone a certain distance they met three armed men, who at once charged towards them. The women ran, but were soon overtaken, and three of them were stabbed to death. Here was a Chief, under our protection, and who, but for our protection, would not have been able to do it, stabbing women to death. And now it appeared that the Boers were making a settlement in Zululand, and refusing to go away when directed to do so by the Resident of the British Government. On the 19th of September, 1881, two messengers came to the British Residency and said that they were sent by their Chief to inform the Resident that the Boers were located in his territory, and positively refused to go away in obedience to his orders. The Boers said if the Chief sent any more messengers ordering them away they would shoot them. The Boers had built three houses, and it was expected that more Boers would follow. Nor were the Boers without excuse. In a despatch written on the 16th of last January to the British Resident at Pretoria, the Boer Government said that in order to prevent further bloodshed and disorder in Zululand they begged Her Majesty’s Government to release Cetewayo. They added that a number of Zulus had been driven within their borders, and they could not force them back without exposing them to a bloody death. Here, then, we had the Government of the Transvaal, which we had reproached for its inhumanity, retorting the charge upon us, and pointing to the murders committed by a Chief whom Her Majesty's Government had placed in power. He had not half exhausted the description of disorder and bloodshed contained in the Blue Book; but he thought he had said enough to lead the House to question whether the present condition of Zululand was satisfactory. What he wanted to point out was that the present condition of that country afforded no excuse for the detention of Cetewayo. If we left the people of Zululand to themselves, and washed our hands of any connection with the country, we might say that we were not in fault; but by keeping Cetewayo a captive we were interfering in the most positive manner with the affairs of Zululand. He did not enter into the question whether, if Cetewayo came back, he would be at once accepted by the people. If he had no following in the country, clearly no harm would be done by setting him free. But if his freedom would lead to his immediate restoration, then our keeping him in captivity was a manifest interference with the affairs of Zululand. There were two grounds upon which we might go. We might either wash our hands of the whole business, and then we should incur no responsibility; or, if we took responsibility upon ourselves, then we should put a stop to the effusion of blood that was going on. Let us either cease to interfere at all, or let our interference be such as would put an end to bloodshed and disorder. All our authorities were in favour either of restoring Cetewayo or of annexing Zululand to the British Crown. Lord Chelmsford said that the settlement we had made would be vain. Our Resident said it was necessary that Zululand should have one head. He pointed, probably, to annexation. Bishop Douglas and Mr. Robertson, while opposed to the restoration of Cetewayo, were in favour of annexation. He hoped Her Majesty's Government, if resolved to keep Cetewayo in captivity, would say why they did so. He begged to move the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

Mr. Gorst

MR. W. FOWLER, in seconding the Motion, said he wished to show by his action with regard to it that this was in no sense a Party question, but simply an act of justice. The real question they had to consider in connection with that matter was the one which the Zulu King himself had set forth in the remarkable letter that he wrote to the Queen, which no one could read without emotion, and in which he wished to know what he had done to justify his being imprisoned for so long a period. Now, he (Mr. W. Fowler) owned that he had never yet been able to answer that question satisfactorily. In the Blue Books he found a great many statements, but no evidence that Cetewayo had done anything to justify his imprisonment. Much depended on the way in which they viewed the character of that man, and on whether they thought he could be trusted or not. In a clear and admirable letter, written by the Dean of Maritzburg immediately after the War, speaking of the Zulus, the Dean said that they never went to war with us; that they had always been excellent neighbours; that Cetewayo had defended his country bravely and had committed no excesses; that the War had been ours, not his; that he had never overrun Natal, and had never shown any disposition to do so, and that we were stronger than we had been willing to allow. A great deal had been said about the military ambition of Cetewayo, and the only argument which Lord Chelmsford used in his recent letter to the papers against the restoration of Cetewayo was that we should have a restoration of the Army of Cetewayo, and that Army would be a standing menace to Natal and that part of South Africa. But what was it that had led largely to the military ambition of Cetewayo? It was our vacillation, and the vicinity and the action of the Boers. That was no fault of Cetewayo; he was very anxious in regard to the Boers; but he had never shown a disposition to attack us, nor did he attack the Boers, because we persuaded him not to do so. Therefore, with regard to military ambition, it was a strange argument to be used by European Powers. Why, they were in far more danger from the vicinity of France and Germany than from anything Cetewayo could do. It was said that Cetewayo was cruel and violent.

He had seen a great many anonymous statements to that effect, but no evidence. He was regarded as a firm Ruler, but not as a cruel one; and, in his letter, he said that the great complaint against him was that he was not half as firm as his father. All the evidence went to show that the people loved him as a Ruler, and looked upon him with the greatest possible affection, as was strikingly shown by the way in which they concealed him when he was attacked and pursued by our troops. Anything more miserable than the story of the way he was caught could not be conceived. An hon. Member sitting beside him (Mr. W. Fowler) had visited the country six years ago, and his impression was that it was very quiet and peaceable. Then, again, the man who was described as a savage had evinced remarkable forbearance in the hour of victory. After the battle of Isandlana, he might have swept Natal of every White man in the place; but he did not. And why was that? Because, as he told them, he did not feel himself an enemy of England, or want to quarrel with her, nor did he wish to destroy the White people. All through he had shown good faith to us, and even when he had the opportunity he did not use his power to punish or injure White people. As to the character of the King, there was one incident which should be mentioned. One of the officers who had the custody of Cetewayo was killed in the Transvaal War, and when the King heard of it he ate no food for a whole week, so much was he affected by the loss. His conduct as a prisoner, moreover, had been extremely dignified, and worthy of a man of far higher origin. The opinions they had heard from the Bishop of Natal, who had had great experience of the Native races, as to the character of Cetewayo, could be placed against those of Sir Bartle Frere, Sir Evelyn Wood, and others, who did not know him half so well. As regarded the settlement of the country, he fully appreciated the argument that it was unwise to unsettle a settlement. There were 13 Kings at present, instead of one, and if that really was a settlement, he should be very much disposed to hesitate before interfering with it. But was it a settlement? The hon. and learned Member opposite had shown that it was not, but only confusion; and the Government might have expected confusion when they set up 13 persons in place of one. Last summer Sir Evelyn Wood had a meeting of the Chiefs, and shortly afterwards there were most serious disturbances, and the terrible massacre to which the hon. and learned Member opposite had referred. Great cruelty had been inflicted on those who desired to have the Zulu King back. In Zululand, under Cetewayo, there was, no doubt, a great Army; but the state of the country was one of comparative quiet. The King was not all that we might desire; but, at any rate, he did not interfere with us; and, although we professed to be very much afraid of him, the best evidence he could find was that the fear was needless. Sir Henry Bulwer said he did not consider there was the slightest ground for it. On the other hand, Lord Kimberley, in his Instructions to Sir Henry Bulwer on his new appointment, spoke in terms of entire dissatisfaction with the present state of things in Zululand. On that point he might read the following passage from a letter, dated October 27, 1881, from the Rev. R. Robertson, of Zululand:—

“You have heard, no doubt, of the recent slaughter of the Abaqulusi. I am told that it was greater than that of Isandlana. I fear there will be more yet. In fact, I am expecting every day to hear that the Usutu (Cetewayo's own tribe) have broken out. Their patience has been sorely tried, and it needs just a little more provocation to bring about another crash. Maduna is strong enough to make mincemeat of Hamu and Zibebu any day. What he will end in doing I know not.”

If we relied on the different Kinglets we had set over the country we should rely on a broken reed. On the other hand, if we depended on Cetewayo, we should, at all events, depend on a King who had had universal authority over Zululand, and not on the half-breed Chief who had been placed over a large part of that territory, and who had applied to the Government to be made supreme Chief, an application which had been, happily, refused. It seemed that these Chiefs had broken all the conditions on which they entered into power. Two of those conditions were that they were not to go to war with each other, and that they were not to have guns. It was quite evident that John Dunn had guns. The Correspondent of The Daily News, writing from Maritzburg, stated that to leave things as they were in Zululand was impossible; that the ultimate outcome of the present situation, unless something was done to cure it, was a combination between two or more of the most powerful Chiefs to exterminate the others; and there were only two ways out of the difficulty—either the country must be placed under British rule, according to Lord Kimberley's original intention, or Cetewayo must be sent back. He (Mr. W. Fowler) believed that if Cetewayo were permitted to return to Zululand the power of the other Chieftains would disappear like dew, and that he would be restored rapidly to full control over the country, for his character was such that if we placed him in power he would do right to his people. One great argument used by Lord Chelmsford was that if we restored Cetewayo there would be a danger of a renewal of the Zulu War. But if we restored him we could restore him on such conditions as would make it safe that nothing of the kind should occur. At present we had a Resident in Zululand, and we could have a Resident there then after restoring Cetewayo; and, at any rate, we might try to restore order through him. He saw an argument the other day that we must not put Zululand back again into the unmitigated barbarism in which it was under Cetewayo. He denied that there was unmitigated barbarism under Cetewayo. He believed that Cetewayo's rule was a remarkably mitigated barbarism, because it was a barbarism under the control of an eminently intelligent Ruler of remarkable powers, used, as far as he (Mr. W. Fowler) could discover, with judgment and discretion. They were told there was great danger of further unsettlement. He could not see how any unsettlement could be greater than the present one. Lord Kimberley fully admitted that in his despatch. He, further, did not believe there was anything in the argument that, as we had made an enemy of Cetewayo, it would be dangerous to release him, for Cetewayo not only was not vindictive, but had expressed his strong wish to be on friendly terms with England. Only a few months ago a gentleman in Cape Town went to see Cetewayo, who said that he had always been English, that his father had been English, that he (Cetewayo) was now more English than ever, for the English had spared his life, and if the English restored him to power he would never fight against England. Cetewayo had felt the power of England, and he would not be the man to fight with her again. Another argument against Cetewayo's restoration to power was that we should have to make compensation to the existing Kings. He did not think that because the Government had that difficulty to get out of was a reason for keeping the King in captivity. It was our fault if the power had been given to men unfit to use it, and we must settle the matter in the best way possible. It was said that the public opinion of Natal would be very much against a restoration of Cetewayo. He had seen all sorts of statements on that question. Sir Garnet Wolseley, speaking of the public opinion of Natal, said, on the 13th of February, 1880—

“Their desire is to annex Zululand to Her Majesty's South African Dominions, if not by a straightforward declaration to that effect, at least by imposing taxation on the Zulu people, by placing British magistrates in every district of the country, and by making Her Majesty's authority paramount.”

If that was the opinion of Natal, he did not think we should much regard it. There was another argument used against a restoration of Cetewayo to power, and that was that he was a nigger; but surely we ought to do justice to this man, whether he was black or white. There were, however, some English people who thought it was not of much consequence what happened to a nigger. He did not think that in modern history there were to be found more than two cases like this—one was the case of Napoleon, and the other that of Toussaint L'Ouverture. If Cetewayo could be trusted—as those who knew him well would testify—he ought no longer to be detained; and the Government should at once accede to all that was asked for on his account—namely, to liberate him, and to give to him the common rights of the commonest man. The more he had investigated this matter the more he was convinced there was no proof that this man deserved the great and cruel punishment that had been inflicted on him—a punishment that was more severe to him than it would be to an ordinary Englishman. The punishment was also severe because the Government had degraded him by turning him out of his Monarchy and putting him into a prison. He had done nothing against this country, and he had asked what was the right of every man—namely, a trial; and if we did not release him within a reasonable time we should not only be doing him great injustice, but continuing a state of things which was a disgrace.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, praying that Her Majesty will be graciously pleased to release Cetewayo, the Zulu King, from the unjust captivity in which he is now held,"—(Mr. Gorst),

—instead thereof.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, this question having been brought forward as an Amendment to the Motion that you do leave the Chair, we are not asked to meet the Motion of the hon. and learned Member by a direct negative. I am so far glad of that, because there is no reason why Her Majesty's Government should represent themselves as being at issue with him upon the question of principle relating to the matter which he has brought before the House. The contention I shall make is that the interference of the House in this matter would be entirely premature, and would lead to serious mischief; that the facts are not ripe for decision, even by the Government, much less are they ripe for decision by the interference of this House. One word as to the language used by my hon. Friend who has just sat down, which is to a certain extent sustained by the terms of this Motion. The hon. and learned Gentleman has moved that Cetewayo ought to be released from the unjust captivity in which he is held; and my hon. Friend who followed him has entreated us to release him from prison, and no longer to permit him to be locked up. I will not deny that Cetewayo is under restraint; it is, perhaps, questionable whether he is detained in captivity, but it is a complete inaccuracy to say that he is in prison, or that he is locked up. He has been placed upon parole within certain local limits—that is an exactly true description of his present condition. I do not intend to represent that fact as one of a light character; it is a fact of a grave and serious character, but it is a different one from that which the case would present, if, as my hon. Friend supposes, he were locked up in prison. Let us consider the chief points which have been made in the two speeches we have heard. It has been truly said by the Mover of this Motion that this is no Party question. I frankly own that I am glad that such a strong sympathy with this individual does exist in this House, and that it is not confined to one side of the House. The hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) has founded himself in some degree upon the injustice of the Zulu War, which, he says, is admitted by both sides of the House. I know not whether that is so, though I am afraid the hon. and learned Gentleman is, perhaps, a little precipitate in that assumption. At any rate, I am not here to dispute the justice or the injustice of the Zulu War, though I have seen no cause to alter my opinion upon that subject; but I do not wish to dwell upon it at this moment—first, because it tends to introduce into this discussion topics of difference which we are willing to avoid; and, secondly, because it is not the question. Whether the Zulu War was just or unjust is not and cannot be, in point of right, the governing consideration in our minds with respect to the course we are now taking with regard to Cetewayo. Our business is to be governed by the interests of South Africa, and especially of Zululand; and nothing will justify us in diverting our view from the question of what is best to be done in the present state of the facts, and in the present state of our information with reference to the interests of that country. The hon. and learned Gentleman has stated that the War was unjust, and my answer is that, agreeing with him, I hold that that is not the point we have now before us, and that we must look to considerations of a different order. He has also dwelt very much upon another point, which I am not here to contest. If I were here to contest it, I should be speaking in entire contradiction to the despatches which have been sent out by the Government—namely, that the present condition of Zululand cannot be regarded as satisfactory. Though his description of the situation of the country as being that of anarchy and bloodshed is, perhaps, not perfectly accurate, yet that regular and suitable government has not been established there is undeniable, and that the results of the Zulu War—quite apart from the question of its justice or injustice, in substituting the present state of things for the rule of Cetewayo—have been unfortunate is also, in my opinion, undeniable; but none of these questions are before us. The question before us is—"What is the best to be done for the permanent welfare of that country?" How does the hon. and learned Member meet that vitally essential point? He proposes to us this dilemma—either Cetewayo has no friends at all, and releasing him will thus do no mischief, because if he is released no one will care for him; or, possibly, the Zulus are longing for his restoration, and, in that case, his restoration is the best thing that could happen. I think it is impossible for anyone to contend that Cetewayo has no friends in that country. If it should finally appear that the mass of the people in Zululand are for Cetewayo, so that something like unanimity should prevail, so far from regarding him as an enemy of England and wishing him ill, and so far from being disposed to take anything but the most favourable course that the welfare of the country would permit, I should regard the proof of that fact with great pleasure; and that would be the sentiment of my Colleagues. But, besides those two propositions which have been put by the hon. and learned Gentleman, there is a third, which is much more probable than the proposition that Cetewayo has no friends, for that I hold to be entirely opposed to the evidence we have now before us. It is quite evident that he has friends; and that he is, or would be, a power in the country were he free to take whatever measures he pleased, and to apply his own personal energies to the promotion of those measures. But, supposing, on the other hand, that, instead of an unanimous reception of Cetewayo, there should be a serious division of opinion, is it right for us, until we have taken every step in our power to obtain the best information and the best advice, to send Cetewayo into the country with the moral certainty we possess that he would be a power, and that if he were not the cause of pacification he would be a very serious cause of disturbance and bloodshed? Both the speeches we have heard tend to rest upon an undeniable premiss—a conclusion which has nothing whatever to do with it. Both hon. Gentlemen say, justly enough, "You cannot represent this as a satisfactory settlement." No, Sir, we have not so represented it. They say the authorities are opposed to it. They are opposed to it; but they are not at all agreed upon the alternative to which we should resort. On the contrary, there is a most serious difference among the authorities as to the restoration of Cetewayo. We are not justified in setting aside the opinion of the authorities who are opposed to the restoration, at all events, until we have satisfied ourselves that we have done the best in our power to acquaint ourselves with the actual condition of facts. The hon. and learned Gentleman has most fairly admitted that there was this difference of opinion, and that there are those who hold that the annexation of Zululand to the British Empire is the proper course to be adopted. I, for one, hope that that may not prove to be the case; but I am not prepared to say that we should be warranted in taking a course which assumes a full knowledge of the facts, when the very Papers we have laid upon the Table demonstrate that neither we nor the House are in full possession of the facts. At the same time, it is a patent fact that we have done the best that in us lies to obtain the very best information in our power; we have sent to a neighbouring Colony a gentleman in whose judgment, ability, and impartiality we have entire confidence, and we have called upon him to lose no time in applying his mind to the consideration of the affairs of Zululand. We have just heard of his arrival, and in the course of a few weeks we hope to be in possession of his opinion. We look to him—as he is well entitled, from his great ability and experience, to be regarded—as a mediator between the opposing opinions that have been laid before us. My hon. Friend who has just sat down made very light of the question, whether or not we are under any obligations to the 13 Chiefs who are now in actual or nominal possession of Zululand. But, Sir, these obligations are not to be got rid of—at all events, without something like definite evidence as to the unfaithfulness or the incapacity of those Chiefs. I admit that two cases have been quoted; but it would be absurd to say that those 13 men are to be condemned because two of them have proved unfaithful to their Government. It may be that the others are unfaithful; but we have not such distinct and detailed evidence and responsible judgment upon that point as is absolutely necessary to warrant us in coming to a conclusion. I may point out that the Motion is incomplete as well as premature. It puts one alternative before us; but it may be our duty to do more than release Cetewayo. To release him is simply to renounce all responsibility in the matter, and to leave him to do what he can towards establishing himself or towards disturbing the country, and to wash our hands of the affair. I doubt whether we have the right, in the present state of our information, to take that course; but it is quite possible that we may find the state of facts to be such that we may find it to be our duty to release Cetewayo, and do something more—to give him the moral support of this country in replacing him in his position. My hon. Friend who has just sat down has indicated that there are serious difficulties in this matter. He admits that great objections have been taken to the idea of a restoration of Cetewayo and his army. He says that we ought to release him and put him back; but put him back upon conditions—upon condition that he will not restore his military organization. My hon. Friend asks us to take this step without evidence from our own responsible authorities in the country. I say it would be a very grave resolution, indeed, to arrive at to bind ourselves to the opinion expressed by my hon. Friend—an opinion to which I do not object, but which I say is premature. We are asked to determine to release Cetewayo upon condition that he will not reinstate his military organization, and if that condition is broken we are to tell him that we shall invade his country again. I do think my hon. Friend, upon consideration, will see that we are not asking too much in begging him to refrain from pledging the House on the present occasion in a manner which would be precipitate, and might be dangerous to a definite opinion on the subject. Suppose the House gave a judgment adverse to Cetewayo. I am glad to say that a vote against the Motion would, in its nature, be more a vote for the Previous Question than a vote adverse to Cetewayo; but in the country it would be taken as a vote adverse to Cetewayo. I should, however, be very sorry that any vote adverse to Cetewayo should be placed upon record in this House. I should regret any vote which would hamper us in giving scope, should we find facts to justify it, to the views entertained by my noble Friend the Secretary of State for the Colonies, and which, I believe, would be found almost universal in this House. But, at the same time, if I were to contemplate an arrival at a vote in favour of the Motion which has just been made, I cannot anticipate any advantage from such a result. But suppose the Motion is carried, and the release takes place, I do not see that there would be any relief from the responsibility which we have already incurred. On the contrary, I think there would be a serious addition to that responsibility. But it will be urged that we are asked to decide in favour of non-interference, and are not asked to commit ourselves to a fresh policy. But I answer, we are dealing with facts as they are; we are dealing with a state of facts in which the essential circumstances are that Cetewayo is under restraint, and that an alternative system has been established in Zululand. No doubt, that system is unsatisfactory; but we are endeavouring to get at the best information and the best mode of dealing with the case. Under these circumstances, and before we know the best mode of dealing with it, to release Cetewayo, and allow to pass into Zululand one whose presence there might entirely fail in recalling the people to their allegiance—and if it did so fail, it would be a new cause of political disturbance and an extensive shedding of human blood—that is not a course which the House can wisely or justly be called upon to take. I do not think that it is necessary for me to go further into this matter. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that he declined to inquire whether Cetewayo would be accepted by his people as King or not. If he declines that inquiry, I beg him to go a little further, and not vote for his own Motion; for he certainly ought not to vote for his own Motion unless he has satisfied himself as to that inquiry. If he believes, upon evidence which we do not find sufficient, that Cetewayo will be accepted, he may consistently proceed with his Motion. But he declines to face that question. My hon. Friend the Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) says he will be accepted as King; but then my hon. Friend thinks himself in possession of evidence which Lord Kimberley does not find himself in possession of. My hon. Friend says it is difficult to find out the sentiments of the people, but yet that they would accept Cetewayo. My hon. Friend's convictions are a matter of great importance to himself undoubtedly, and ought to have great weight with this House. But until we are happy enough to arrive at similar convictions the Government will not be justified in taking measures for putting such convictions into effect. I venture to hope that upon information of this kind we shall not be called upon to exhibit a variety of opinion which can do no good, and may do very serious evil, and which, at any rate, would lead to the opinion that we are substantially divided upon matters as to which I was sanguine enough to hope there was a general agreement. I do not question—although I think my hon. Friend has a little exaggerated in his statements about the condition of Zululand—that the new settlement has done nothing as yet towards making good its title to our approval. I may refer to the despatch of my noble Friend to Sir Henry Bulwer of the 2nd of February, in which my noble Friend carefully and elaborately set out the various alternatives which were open to us, and suggested inquiries conceived in the largest sense into the entire subject. That course of inquiry is one that has, I have no doubt, by this time been put in force, and I hope that no long time will elapse before we shall probe the matter to the bottom, so far as it admits of being so probed. Then will be the time when we shall be in a condition to arrive at a judgment, and to act upon that judgment; and I assure the hon. Member and the House that they have not the slightest reason to fear that when that time arrives we shall approach the subject under the influence of any adverse prejudice towards the person on whose behalf he is so full of benevolent and patriotic intentions. It is impossible to think of the situation of Cetewayo without commiseration. Without any desire to resuscitate the debates of three years ago, I may say that the public opinion of the country is that Cetewayo has claims upon our consideration. But, on the other hand, it must be remembered that the peace and welfare of the country ought to be the dominant consideration. We hope that the interests of Zululand itself will lead in the same direction as the sympathy which we must all feel for one who has suffered so much. At all events, the spirit in which we shall approach the decision of the question will be one of which we are sure that the House will have no disposition and no cause to complain, and the time at which we shall be able to approach it is, we trust, very near at hand.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND said, that there was a great deal in what had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) with which he agreed. This was no Party question. It would be in the recollection of many hon. Members that in 1879, in the debate on the Zulu War, he (Sir Henry Holland) had felt himself compelled to differ from the opinion of, perhaps, the majority of those with whom he ordinarily acted, and that he had denounced the war as unjust and unnecessary. He would not now take up the time of the House by a re-statement of all the reasons upon which he arrived at that conclusion, because, as was stated by the right hon. Gentleman, the question of the justice or injustice of the Zulu War was not directly before the House; but he would briefly refer to one principal reason, as throwing some light upon the conduct and character of Cetewayo, which formed an important element in the consideration of the question now before the House. He showed in that debate, from a careful examination of all the proceedings of Cetewayo from the time he succeeded Panda, that, with the exception of sudden outbursts of temper, Cetewayo had been uniformly friendly to the British nation. He constantly sought the assistance and advice of the Lieutenant Governor of Natal and of Sir Theophilus Shepstone; and he did what many who sought advice did not do—he almost invariably took that advice, though often very unpalatable to him. Thus, he over and over again, in conformity with the advice and wishes of the Lieutenant Governor, restrained his own strong desire, and that of his Chiefs, to attack the Boers and other neighbouring Tribes. He (Sir Henry Holland) urged, as a proof of this view, that Cetewayo did not invade

Natal when it was denuded of troops, and when we were engaged in the troubles of the Transkei War; and this at a time when we were asked to believe that he was bitterly hostile to us. He (Sir Henry Holland) desired to express his entire concurrence in the remarks made by the hon. and learned Member for Chatham (Mr. Gorst) as to the treatment of Cetewayo shortly before war was declared. There was no doubt that for some months before the war Cetewayo was irritated at the apparent unfairness of the English Government in not settling the boundaries between Zululand and the Transvaal. That irritation was not unreasonable, for he (Sir Henry Holland) felt bound to admit that the final settlement was unduly delayed; and it was not unnatural that Cetewayo should believe that, after we had annexed the Transvaal, we did not care to decide the matter. Again, there was no doubt that Cetewayo was alarmed and uneasy at the movement of troops towards the Natal Frontier—a movement which Sir Henry Bulwer had strongly deprecated as likely to cause that very alarm and uneasiness which it did, in fact, create in the minds of Cetewayo and of his Chiefs. But that irritation and uneasiness could have been removed by the exercise of a little tact and judgment. There was a fair opportunity for doing this when the award, by which the boundaries were defined, was sent to Cetewayo. But what was done? Instead of sending that award as a message of peace, untrammelled by any conditions, conditions were attached to it which were unfair and unreasonable. And more than this. With the award was sent an ultimatum, with the terms of which it was impossible for Cetewayo to comply. Acceptance of those terms would have amounted to an extinction of Zulu government and power, and to the practical dethronement of himself. It followed, from what he (Sir Henry Holland) had said, that he regretted the necessity—perhaps unavoidable after war, however unjust, had commenced—of taking Cetewayo prisoner, and of detaining him as a prisoner of war. It was only just to the Cape Government to say that, acting in accordance with the wishes of the Imperial Government, they had done all they could to alleviate his captivity and to make it as little irksome as possible; and he should be glad to learn that any further alleviation could be granted, or any restrictions removed, consistently with Cetewayo's remaining in the Cape Colony. But the Resolution of the hon. and learned Member for Chatham advocated an immediate release without any conditions; and both his speech and that of the hon. Member for Cambridge (Mr. W. Fowler) pointed to the desirability of his being restored to Zululand. Now, he (Sir Henry Holland) was certainly not prepared to take any step towards restoring Cetewayo to Zululand, or even towards settling him upon any location near Zululand. Whether, after the conclusion of the war, Cetewayo might have been left as paramount Chief under certain conditions, and with limitations of his power, he would not now stop to inquire. But the House was now asked to form a judgment upon a totally different state of things. Zululand had been partitioned out among certain Chiefs, and solemn engagements had been entered into with those Chiefs, which would be most flagrantly broken if Her Majesty's Government were of their own free will to allow Cetewayo to return to power in that country. The whole nature of the arrangement was inconsistent with such return; and, if not in express terms, they had impliedly bound themselves not to adopt such a policy. It had been contended that the present state of Zululand was deplorable. Without accepting all the reports—many made by Natives on hearsay—as to the state of things in that country, he would admit it to be probable that the arrangement made at the conclusion of the war had not worked in an altogether satisfactory manner, and that acts of bloodshed and cruelty had been perpetrated; but sufficient time had not yet elapsed to satisfy us that, with modifications, that arrangement might not practically work well. If the state of things described by the hon. and learned Member continued, it would undoubtedly be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to interfere and put an end to it—by deposing those Chiefs who behaved in this outrageous manner; by strengthening the hands of the British Resident; and by appointing, if necessary, more Residents and Magistrates. But how would the state of Zululand be improved by the return of

Cetewayo? He would ask the House to consider in what capacity Cetewayo could be restored. Was he to go back as paramount Chief? This would be a clear and distinct breach of our engagements with the Chiefs, by which we had vested in them certain defined powers. It appeared to him that Cetewayo could only be so restored at the unanimous desire and request of all the Chiefs—a contingency which had not happened, and he thought was not very likely to happen for some years to come, if at all. Was Cetewayo, then, to return as a subordinate Chief, and to have a district allotted to him? In the first place, no district was vacant, and we could not, consistently with our engagements, now insist upon a forced sub-division of a district for the purpose of fixing Cetewayo there. And even if there were a vacancy, he questioned whether we could properly appoint Cetewayo to such vacancy. He was not sure whether, under the arrangement made at the conclusion of the war, a Chief had the right to appoint his successor, or whether such right was vested in the people of the district; but such right, whether vested in the Chief or people, would be infringed by the forced appointment of Cetewayo to fill the vacancy. And, further, he would ask the House to consider whether it would not be highly undesirable to place Cetewayo in a position of equality with Chiefs over whom he so lately ruled? If, then, it would be dangerous to restore him as paramount Chief, or as a subordinate Chief, would it be less dangerous to allow him to go back and settle there as a private individual? It would be very difficult to prevent him from plotting to regain power if he were so inclined. There were now in Zululand many members of his family and household, and many who held high position under him when in power, who were disaffected, and would gladly assist him to regain that power, by which they would profit. Here would be one source of danger. But assuming that he would not be inclined to intrigue for power, would not his mere presence in the country tend to intensify any quarrel that might arise between two Chiefs, and to increase any disaffection or ill-feeling that might arise between any Chief and his followers? He (Sir Henry Holland) would have hesitated to have pressed so strongly this opposition to Cetewayo's return to Zululand had this view been only held by himself. But he must remind the House that the people of Natal had most strongly protested against Cetewayo's restoration; and great attention should be paid to that opinion, as the people of that Colony were most deeply interested in the welfare of Zululand, and would be most directly affected by disturbances there. He had within the last week also had the opportunity of seeing a letter from John Dunn, in which the danger of allowing Cetewayo to return was most strongly pressed. Of course, it would be said that John Dunn was an interested party. That was true, but that very interest made him alive to the danger; and whatever might be alleged of John Dunn, no one could deny that he was a very shrewd observer, and that he knew the Zulu Natives better, probably, than anyone else in South Africa. As he had mentioned the name of John Dunn, he would venture to say a few words on behalf of a man to whom he thought scant justice had been done, and who certainly had been assailed that evening in very strong language. John Dunn rendered most loyal and important services to the British after the war broke out. Without those services our success must have been delayed, the war must have been prolonged, and many valuable lives must have been lost. Upon this point he might, without hesitation, refer to the evidence of Lord Chelmsford, Major General Crealock, and Sir Garnet Wolseley, and others in command. John Dunn had been accused of treachery to Cetewayo; but he was at a loss to see upon what grounds. Before the war John Dunn had used all his great influence with Cetewayo to prevent that war. When the war was imminent, or just after it was declared, Cetewayo informed John Dunn that he was unable to protect him, and, therefore, he crossed the Frontier with the full knowledge of Cetewayo, and quite openly. Since the conclusion of the war John Dunn had governed his district with great ability and judgment. He had passed Liquor Laws to prevent the introduction of spirits into his district; he had facilitated and improved the administration of justice; and had introduced a simple and effective Criminal Code based on the Native Laws. Not only this, but he interfered most usefully when a quarrel broke out between two Chiefs; he localized that quarrel, and prevented a general disturbance. Upon this point they had the high testimony of Sir Evelyn Wood. Returning again to the question before the House, he (Sir Henry Holland) desired to state one more reason which should make the House pause before passing a Resolution in favour of Cetewayo's return to Zululand. They must consider the character of Cetewayo. Now, no doubt, since he had been in captivity, he had given expression to many dignified and humane sentiments, though he (Sir Henry Holland) could not help thinking that the reports of his speeches were somewhat highly coloured, and he had certainly impressed a great many people in his favour. But dignity in captivity was quite consistent with cruelty when in power. There could be no question that Cetewayo was cruel when in power, and that by his acts he had alienated many of his followers. Had those who now so highly praised him forgotten that in 1876 he coolly put to death a very large number of innocent young persons and children, and thus drew down upon himself the indignant and strong remonstrances and rebukes of Sir Henry Bulwer. And this act he committed in distinct contravention of most solemn promises which he openly made with Sir Theophilus Shepstone and the Zulu people, when he was proclaimed King. When remonstrated with, he replied by a letter, in which he said that he would kill—that it was the custom of his nation, and that his people would not listen to him unless he killed.

MR. COURTNEY said, it was not a letter, but a message.

SIR HENRY HOLLAND: At all events, those were the actual words of the Chief who delivered the message, and they were never denied by Cetewayo. Indeed, the only defence raised for them was one raised in this House by the hon. Member for Gateshead (Mr. James), in 1879, that they were attributable to rum, or a sudden outburst of temper. He would ask the House to consider what security we could have against a return of like acts of cruelty if we replaced Cetewayo as paramount Chief. In conclusion, he would ask the House to allow him to refer to one matter, very directly bearing upon the question before the House, but to which no allusion had been made. A few days before the House rose, the Under Secretary of the Colonies, in reply to a question put by him (Sir Henry Holland), announced that Her Majesty's Government had decided to bring Cetewayo over to this country. Now, he, for one, trusted that Her Majesty's Government would reconsider that decision. He could not see what possible good could arise from Cetewayo's coming here; unless, indeed, it was decided that he should be restored to Zululand. In that case, it would be desirable that he should go back fully impressed with a sense of the greatness, of the power, and of the resources of England. It was, doubtless, for this reason that, in 1731, Governor Oglethorpe brought over from the newly-founded Colony of Georgia several Creek Indian Chiefs, whom he took back with him after their visit here. And the address of the head Chief, when presented to the King, George II., showed that he thoroughly understood the position and force of the reason. The Chief was reported to have said—

“This day I see the majesty of your face, the greatness of your house, and the number of your people. I am come in my old days. Though I cannot expect any advantage to myself, I am come for the good of the children of all the Natives of the Lower and Upper Creeks, that they may be instructed in the knowledge of the English and of their power. O great King, whatever word you shall say unto me, I will on my return faithfully tell them to all the Kings of the Creek Natives.”

But what good would be gained by impressing his mind with a sense of the greatness of this country, unless he was to return to Zululand—a step which he trusted he had convinced the House would be highly inexpedient? It had, indeed, been urged that he should be allowed to plead his own cause here in England. But with whom was he to plead it? With Her Majesty's Government, or with the people of England? Surely not with the former. The Government knew all the bearings of the case, and were not likely to alter their views upon it by seeing Cetewayo in person. Was he to plead with the people at public meetings? Those who were already interested in his case had full knowledge of it from the Papers presented to Parliament, and from the very full reports of the many interviews that he had had at the Cape, and they could gain no further information by statements made in public through an interpreter. As to the rest of the public, they would, no doubt, rush to see him, as they would to see Jumbo, or any other unusual sight; but what weight would their opinion, if favourable to Cetewayo, have with the Government, seeing that they had not studied the rights of the case, and merely taken his statements without testing their force or accuracy? If, indeed, Cetewayo had signified any desire to settle down in this country, the case would be different; and, he (Sir Henry Holland), believing as he did, that the war was unjust and that his detention was to be regretted though unavoidable, would be disposed to meet his wishes in every way. But he was not aware that Cetewayo had ever expressed any such desire, and the Government had not put it forward as a ground for their decision. He should, therefore, feel bound to oppose the bringing over of Cetewayo to this country, because no good could come of it, unless Cetewayo were to be restored to Zululand, which he thought would be a course fraught with danger, and inconsistent with the engagements we entered into at the conclusion of the war. He hoped the hon. and learned Member for Chatham would not press the Resolution to a division; but if he did, he (Sir Henry Holland) would be obliged to vote against it.

MR. GORST said, it would, perhaps, be for the convenience of the House if he said at once that, after the very satisfactory statement which had been made by the Prime Minister, he had no desire whatever to do other than follow the advice which the right hon. Gentleman had given on this occasion, regarding him as his Leader in this matter. If the House would allow him to follow the right hon. Gentleman's advice, he would be most happy to do so.

SIR DAVID WEDDERBURN said, that, after the speech of the Prime Minister, there remained very little for a friend of Cetewayo to say in this House, and he would only allude to one particular point. Having very recently returned from South Africa, he would say a few words upon the local public opinion on this matter, and he would deprecate its being misunderstood in any way by Her Majesty's Government, who had yet to form a final opinion on this important question. If they went to Cape Colony, they would find that the Cape Colonists considered themselves to be a good way off from Zululand, and that they did not take a very keen or practical interest in Zulu affairs. In fact, if Cetewayo himself did not happen to be a captive within their limits, he thought they would take very little interest in the question at all; and as far as he could gather public opinion there, it was very much divided. Some said, "Oh, he had better go back to his own country;" and others seemed to think he should be retained in prison. But when they came to those countries which were nearer to Zululand, and which were, therefore, more closely interested, they found opinion among the public at large to be very definitely felt and expressed. To begin with the Transvaal Boers; it was evident that they, so far as they had expressed themselves through their Government and Representatives, were in favour of the return of Cetewayo, not merely of his release, but of his restoration, and the ground they put it upon was, that it would be a pacific and peaceful solution of the difficulty. In Natal opinion was somewhat different. While he was in Natal a large public meeting was held at Durban to discuss the question of the restoration of Cetewayo. No doubt, by a large majority it was decided that it would be dangerous to the prosperity of Natal if Cetewayo were restored; but the meeting was not unanimous, and it had been undoubtedly brought together by the un-friends of Cetewayo, and those whom he might call, perhaps, the friends of John Dunn. Apart from this, he would point out that the public opinion of meetings such as that held at Durban ought not greatly to influence Her Majesty's Government or the decision of this House. Meetings in such a place as Durban upon general political questions would be as worthy of respect and attention, and perhaps more so, than any meetings held in a town of the same size in this country. There was an intelligent and an educated public opinion, no doubt; but if they came to ask how much those gentlemen who attended a meeting of that sort knew about the Zulus, they would find that their knowledge was probably limited to acquaintance with a few who had come to seek service in the town. Not one in 500 of them knew anything of the Zulu language, of the Zulu people, or of their country. If they consulted those few, the select few, who had travelled through Zululand, who were familiar with the language, and had obtained a certain amount of the confidence of the people, they would certainly find that opinions differed even there. No doubt many missionaries, who were well entitled to speak, deprecated the return of the King; but against that he would set the opinions of many others—he should think, on the whole, the majority—though, as to that, he was perhaps not able to speak with confidence—the opinion of many others that the return and the full restoration—because he did not think the mere release of the King would be a satisfactory way of dealing with the matter—that the restoration of Cetewayo would tend to the pacification of the country. It ought to be borne in mind that war, as it had hitherto been conducted in Natal, had no great terrors for the Colonists—indeed, the palmiest days of Natal were during the late Zulu War. Enormous sums of Imperial money were spent there. Everybody who had anything to sell got about double price for it. Spirited and energetic young men found good pay and employment as Volunteers; and he would venture to assert that a war which would result in the annexation of Zululand would be an exceedingly popular war now in Natal. Therefore, he would not infer from the fact that the population of Natal deprecated Cetewayo's restoration that on that ground they greatly dreaded a war. Then, as had been justly said by an hon. Member opposite (Sir Henry Holland), the Chief John Dunn was one of those who thoroughly understood the affairs of Zululand. He could not tell with certainty what John Dunn's opinion was as to his probable position were the rightful Monarch to return. He only knew that he had been taking measures to put a certain amount of his property beyond the reach of danger. While he was in the Colony, it was believed that John Dunn had brought on one occasion £5,000 to place in the bank at Durban. He certainly had brought a large sum of money. He would only infer from that that he did not consider his position there a very secure or permanent one; and, from all that he had been able to learn from those who knew the Zulus best, whatever other matters might be in doubt, there seemed to be no doubt whatever of the steadfast devotion of the great bulk of the Zulu community to their former King; and it was more than probable that a great number of the present Chiefs would at once resign their authority into his hands if he were to return with the moral support of this country. The difficulty with some of them, no doubt, would be that they were not Zulus—one was a Basuto, and another was, as they well knew, a Scotchman. He was inclined to think that in their case it was only just to give a certain amount of compensation. If two or three of them were compensated, he believed the others would willingly accept Cetewayo. He was only making these remarks because he had had some means of ascertaining what the local opinion was; and he trusted that Her Majesty's Government, in making up their minds, would accept these expressions of public meetings with some caution, and that, in finding out what the real truth was, they should only consult those who spoke the Zulu language, and were familiar with the country.

MR. R. N. FOWLER said, he also had been to South Africa, and could confirm the remarks of the hon. Baronet. In the Blue Book issued before the House rose for the Holidays there was a reference to a despatch to the British Resident at Pretoria. He wished to ask whether that despatch could be laid on the Table of the House? He listened with gratification to the remarks which fell from the Prime Minister. He thought the course recommended was the best they could pursue. He was glad to hear the Prime Minister speak with a kindly feeling towards the unfortunate Monarch. He hoped the Government would take his case into their consideration. It seemed to him that there were only three courses to adopt in dealing with Zululand. They could restore Cetewayo. They could adopt the suggestion advocated by John Dunn, and nominate him paramount Chief or King of Zululand. They could adopt the plan advocated by Mr. Osborne, our Resident Minister, and annex the country. He thought they might dismiss the last-named course, although it was advocated by so high an authority. He did not apprehend that the Government were prepared to annex Zululand. That course had been repudiated by the late Government, he believed; and it had been equally repudiated by the present Government. If submitted to that House, he was convinced it would meet with little support. A point had been made with regard to the justice due to the 13 Kinglets established by Sir Garnet Wolseley. It appeared to him, after a perusal of the Papers, that the settlement of Sir Garnet Wolseley had completely broken down. The setting up of these 13 Kinglets had turned out a great mistake. To introduce anarchy into the country was unworthy of England, of its honour and its name. The principle of the present system must come to an end. It was evident that John Dunn thought that the best course would be to appoint him paramount Chief—in other words, King. He (Mr. R. N. Fowler) strongly deprecated making John Dunn paramount Chief. Whatever were Cetewayo's faults, he preferred a native Zulu to a renegade Englishman or Scotchman—for he understood the hon. Gentleman (Sir David Wedderburn) claimed John Dunn as a Scotchman. At all events, he preferred Cetewayo to a renegade Britisher—a man who had renounced the virtues of civilization. He thought the best proof of Cetewayo's friendly disposition towards England, and the absence of any intention on his part to invade our Colony, was the fact of his abstaining from any attempt at attack when Natal lay at his mercy after the battle of Isandula. He had heard many stories in Natal of how Lord Chelmsford frightened the Colonists by leaving his Army after Isandula, and coming down to superintend the fortification of Maritzburg and Durban. But, whatever the faults of Cetewayo were, he acted on the principle of defending his own country. Cetewayo informed him, at an interview he had with him, that he and his family wished to maintain friendly relations with England. Those relations commenced some 50 years ago, when his Predecessor rescued a British ship on the Coast of Natal. His hon. Friend the Member for Midhurst (Sir Henry Holland) deprecated bringing Cetewayo to this country. He could not agree with him. Considering the injustice which had been done to the unfortunate man, it was only right that they should accede to his wishes, and give him an opportunity of laying his Petition before the Queen and Government of this country. By bringing Cetewayo over to this country, the Government would pursue a wise course, and he hoped it would be carried out. The best course, in his opinion, would be the restoration of this unfortunate Prince to his native country, and then they would get rid of the anarchy which at present prevailed there.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

FIRES IN THEATRES (PREVENTION).

RESOLUTION.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND, in rising to move—

"That in view of the great danger to the Theatre-going public from the insufficiency of powers under existing Acts relating to Theatres, and the laxity with which such powers, conferred by various Acts of Parliament, have been exercised, and that any day, unless some steps are taken to insure proper exits and necessary appliances against fire, a calamity may happen which may cause as terrific a loss of life as that which lately occurred at the Ring Theatre at Vienna, a Select Committee be appointed to investigate the state of the exits and what appliances exist for the prevention or extinction of fires in Theatres and Music Halls, and to report the result of their investigations and recommendations thereon," said, that the frightful calamity which occurred at Vienna, by which 700 lives were sacrificed, succeeding the catastrophe at Nice, where 300 lives were lost, naturally led him to consider whether the theatres of England were liable to these calamities from fire. In looking into the subject he found, so far as London alone was concerned, that there were 472 places of amusement. The great difficulty in dealing with the subject consisted in the conflicting jurisdictions in which they were placed. They had first the Crown, under which there were two Patent theatres, holding about 8,000 persons; secondly, they had the Lord Chamberlain, who had under him 45 theatres, holding 80,000 persons; thirdly, they had the Divisional Magistrates, with 10 theatres, holding 31,800; fourthly, the Middlesex Magistrates, with 347 music halls, holding 136,700; fifthly, they had the Surrey Magistrates, with 61 music halls, holding 32,800 persons; sixthly, they had the City of London Magistrates, with two music halls, holding 1,400 persons; and, lastly, they had five unlicensed places of amusement, holding about 5,000—making 472 places of amusement, holding about 300,000 persons. They had no less than six different jurisdictions, and, to make the confusion even worse confounded, there was the authority of the Metropolitan Board of Works overriding some of these authorities, and another authority—that of the Home Secretary—was also brought in. He thought it was perfectly scandalous that the law should be in such a state that even the authorities themselves probably did not know their own powers, and that one authority could be pitted against another, and all put at defiance by anybody whose interest it was to do so. As he said, 300,000 people could be accommodated in these places of amusement, and probably on Saturday and Monday nights this number was nearly reached. The subject was one, therefore, which concerned a large class of Her Majesty's subjects. To bring the matter practically before the House, he might say that it concerned 1,500,000 of the people of London alone each week. He thought it was shameful that people should be allowed to go to our theatres, not only unprotected, but without the slightest knowledge of the risks which they ran. He had asked the Home Secretary, in view of the great danger to which the public were exposed, owing to the inadequacy of protection against fires in theatres and music halls, whether he would introduce a Bill dealing with the matter? The Home Secretary had replied that special legislation had taken place in 1878, and that the Board of Works had power to deal with the old and new theatres. He (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) had been astonished at the answer; because, if he had read the Act of 1878 aright, the powers of the Metropolitan Board of Works were insufficient to deal with the old theatres. He had then, again, turned to the Act, and had found that the only part of it which dealt with the old theatres was in Section 11. There it said that where a theatre was so defective in its construction as to be dangerous to the public, the Board might order the defects to be remedied, provided it could be done at a moderate expense. Therefore, the greater the risk the greater the difficulty of providing against it, for where the risk was great the structure must be very defective, and the cost of improving it consequently large; and the Board only had power to interfere when the expense incurred would be moderate. It seemed to him that this principle set the interests of the owners and managers above the safety of the public; and this at a time when the occupation was most lucrative—when new theatres were being opened every day, and when the public were paying a larger sum for admission to them than had ever been known before. The prices of admission to the stalls had been raised from 5s. to 10s. 6d. To be sure he (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) had made no mistake, he had next questioned the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works as to his powers, and the answer of the hon. Gentleman, however much he might decline to admit it, satisfied every reasonable person that his Board could be put at defiance, and structural defects could only be required to be remedied if they could be done at a moderate expense. On receiving that admission, which, in his (Mr. Dixon-Hartland's) opinion, was an admission that the Board had no powers, he had, on January 16, again questioned the Home Secretary on the subject, and from the answer given he had been satisfied that the Home Secretary was not satisfied with the powers which he possessed. The right hon. Gentleman admitted that neither he nor any other authority had power to close any theatre, however dangerous to the public. He only hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not have the misfortune to be in a London theatre if it should happen to catch fire, else he was afraid that he should never have the honour of receiving an answer from him on the question he was then referring to, or upon any other question. The Board of Works was a body which had shown a great public spirit, and had done a great deal of work of great public merit. But it was also a body very jealous of its authority and whenever it had any power to take steps it took them. Therefore, he (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) wished to know why they had not taken action upon the provisions of the Act of 1878 if they had not been perfectly aware that the powers it had conferred upon them were valueless? Since they had received the Home Secretary's letter last Christmas, they had, however, made the rapid and astounding progress of appointing two Deputy Inspectors at a salary of three guineas per week each, and of also, on the 13th January, instructing their Fire Brigade Committee to make a Report on Drury Lane, Covent Garden, the Gaiety, the Vaudeville, the Strand, the Lyceum, and the Opera Comique. No Report, however, was ordered on a well-known underground theatre—on a theatre which could only be approached, so far as the public were concerned, through a private house—and on another theatre built entirely of wood, and which were, no doubt, three of the most dangerous structures in the Metropolis. The order to Report upon the theatres had been given on January 13; but on the 20th March—two months afterwards—the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works had been obliged to confess that he had not received the Report. That Report had only been received by the Home Secretary two or three days before the House rose for the Easter Recess; and the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs, in the absence of the Home Secretary, had said that it was of such a serious character that he must decline to give its contents before the Home Secretary had had an opportunity of consulting the Lord Chamberlain upon the subject. Having brought the subject before the House and the country, he had considered that it was his duty to become practically and personally acquainted with the state of the theatres in London; and had, therefore, by the kind exertions of a gentleman well known in matters relating to the extinction of fires in London (Captain Shaw), who had formulated the best rules he had seen for the extinction of fires in theatres, been enabled to visit a great number of theatres and music halls. He regretted that the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works had not been with him on the occasion of his inspection, because it would have been probable that that hon. Gentleman would have altered the opinion that he appeared to possess, that the theatres were not unsafe, and would have found that many of our theatres, in cases of fire, would be perfect death-traps. From what he had seen, he had been surprised that accidents had not more frequently occurred, partly from the faults of construction, partly from the materials used, and partly from the necessity of shifting large scenes as dry as tinder in the midst of flaring gaslights. To those dangers should be added the utter carelessness caused by the familiarity with danger, which had been well brought before the public by Madame Marie Roze-Mapleson, in a letter to The Times, in which she had said that many artists went behind the scenes nightly at the risk of their lives. In one theatre that he had inspected he had found a workman reading a newspaper by a flaming gaslight close by the scenes that he was waiting to move. When spoken to upon the subject, the man had merely said that he could not read with a shade on the light, and had taken it off. The fireman of the theatre even had not seemed to think that there was anything unusual in the practice. As it was impossible to do away with carelessness, it was also impossible to do away with accidents, as was proved by the fact that between 1861 and 1877, 187 theatres had been destroyed by fire, the number so destroyed being 13 annually—the average life of a theatre being under 23 years. Even in that day's paper there were reports of the destruction by fire of two theatres. The subject divided itself into two parts. One was the safety of the public, and the other was the safety of the house. The safety of the house could be guarded by properly-qualified firemen, from any well-known brigade, always at their posts, and by the employment of hose and hydrants attached to the main service. The proper order and the proper inspection of the apparatus might be left very much to the owners of the house. The safety of the public was a very different matter indeed, and depended, in his opinion, greatly upon their means of getting away, and not upon appliances which, as a rule, were never in working order when wanted. To secure the safety of the public there should be proper exits, every door should be unlocked continuously during the performance, and every door should open outwards. Every part of the house should, in his opinion, have a separate staircase, and no two parts of the house should be served by the same stairs so as to cause a block. The exits ought to be opened and used every night, so as to habituate the public to them; and the result would be that the public, knowing that they could leave the building with perfect ease in a certain number of minutes, would cease to be liable to those panics, which were the cause of greater danger in theatres than fire itself. Proper authorities should be appointed to see that the necessary exits were made, and theatres which did not possess them should be closed, as in Rome, St. Petersburg, Paris, Vienna, Marseilles, and other cities. All Inspectors appointed should have some knowledge of their work, and should see that the exits and fire appliances were in proper order, continuously reporting direct to the Home Secretary. He was told that he was raising needless alarm in bringing this subject before the House; but when it was known that two of the largest London theatres had been burnt three times, and one four times, he did not believe that the public would think that was the case, or that they would be satisfied unless some legislation took place which would practically make them safe. At present nobody was responsible if a calamity occurred. Though he did not wish to make the Chairman of the Board of Works or the Home Secretary criminally responsible, as the Viennese were trying to make their authorities, still, after the question had been brought before them in a practical way, he thought they would incur a very large amount of moral responsibility if no notice was taken of the question by them. Hon. Members on the Opposition side of the House had been taunted that they gave up too much of their time to the consideration of foreign affairs, and that they did not bring forward any question of benefit to the people. He had now brought forward a question which was of very great importance to large classes of Her Majesty's subjects, and which had no political aspect whatever; and he called on Members on both sides of the House to support him in saying that some legislation should take place before we were some morning horror-stricken at the loss of life caused by a fire in a theatre. The hon. Gentleman concluded by moving the Resolution of which he had given Notice.

MR. WARTON seconded the Resolution.

Amendment proposed,

To leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "in view of the great danger to the Theatre-going public from the insufficiency of powers under existing Acts relating to Theatres, and the laxity with which such powers, conferred by various Acts of Parliament, have been exercised, and that any day, unless some steps are taken to insure proper exits and necessary appliances against fire, a calamity may happen which may cause as terrific a loss of life as that which lately occurred at the Ring Theatre at Vienna, a Select Committee be appointed to investigate the state of the exits, and what appliances exist for the prevention or extinction of fires in Theatres and Music Halls, and to report the result of their investigations and recommendations thereon,"—(Mr. Dixon-Hartland,)

—instead thereof.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT said, he entirely recognized the importance of the subject which the hon. Member had brought under the attention of the House, and thought that the hon. Member had performed a very useful task in devoting consideration to this matter. He was very sorry that his hon. Friend the Chairman of the Metropolitan Board of Works was absent—he was sure from a want of knowledge that this subject was going to be brought on to-night. But, of course, the hon. Member knew very well that the persons primarily responsible in this matter were the Metropolitan Board of Works. He (Sir William Harcourt) had stated more than once in the House that the powers given by the Act of 1878, if they were used, were sufficient—and until the contrary was proved, he should continue to be of that opinion—to enable the Metropolitan Board of Works to insist on such security as they deemed to be necessary; and he had stated it more than once in that House that it was useless, therefore, to pass another Act when an Act already existed which, if properly worked, would be perfectly efficient. What was wanted was not a new Act, but the efficient working of the one at present existing. The 11th section of that Act provided—

"That, when any theatre or other place of public resort was so defective in its structure that special danger might result to the public, in every such case the Metropolitan Board of Works, with the consent of the Lord Chamberlain and of the Secretary of State, if such structural defects could be remedied with moderate expenditure, might require the owner of such places to make such alterations as might be necessary to remedy such defects within a reasonable time."

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND: With "moderate" expenditure?

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Well, he thought that every expenditure would be regarded as moderate which was found to be necessary to make a theatre safe; and, therefore, what the Metropolitan Board of Works had to do, when they received reports with reference to the defects of a theatre, was to call upon the owner of such theatre to make such structural alterations in the edifice as were deemed essential to the security of the public from fire. If the reasonableness of those demands were disputed, the question then went to arbitration. He had written to the Metropolitan Board of Works that, having received a Report with reference to the theatres, it was their duty to make such requisitions upon the owners of the edifices to make such alterations as, upon the advice of Captain Shaw, the Head of the Fire Brigade, they considered necessary; and if the owners demurred, then let them go to arbitration. The arbitrator was to be appointed by the First Commissioner of Works. The arbitrator would decide whether the demand was reasonable or not, and if reasonable the owners would be bound to make the required alterations under a penalty much greater than any under the Act, because he would be bound by the operation of public opinion, which would prevent anybody going into his theatre unless he complied with the conditions of the arbitrator. But what he maintained was, that the existing machinery was perfectly effective if it were only properly put in force. It was not his business either to condemn or defend the Metropolitan Board of Works. As soon as this subject was brought to his attention by the calamity at Vienna, he wrote to the Metropolitan Board of Works, and called their attention to the subject. He did more; he saw Captain Shaw upon it. Captain Shaw said—"Call for a Report from me, and you will see what I think about it." He accordingly called for a Report, and insisted that there should be a Report upon every theatre in London, in order that he might see it and that the Metropolitan Board of Works and the lessees of the theatres should see it. Reports had been made with regard to 18 theatres, and inspections were now in progress with regard to the rest, preparatory to being reported upon. He had written to the Metropolitan Board of Works to say that the Reports should be communicated to the lessees and the Lord Chamberlain, and that the Board might take it for granted that the consent of the Lord Chamberlain and himself would be given to any alterations which, under the advice of Captain Shaw, were deemed to be necessary for the public safety. Therefore, he said that this matter was in course of being dealt with as quickly and as efficiently as possible, because the hon. Member opposite knew there was no man fitter on this subject than Captain Shaw. Whether the Metropolitan Board of Works had been remiss or not was not for him to say; but, at all events, it was not negligent now. It had been called upon publicly to put these Reports in the hands of the owners of theatres, and he advised the House to leave the responsibility in their hands. What would happen if the Motion were agreed to? They would have to wait for some new Act, and the matter would be taken out of the hands of those who were now dealing with it. He did not think that would be for the public advantage. He thought that now the matter was being pressed in the manner he had mentioned by the Metropolitan Board of Works, now that the Reports had been made, now that they had been communicated to the lessees of theatres, and that they knew the Reports would have to be acted upon, we had got as good a security for the safety of theatres as we were likely to obtain. He hoped the hon. Member would be satisfied with this explanation, and would not press his Amendment.

SIR HENRY SELWIN-IBBETSON said, he was inclined to agree with the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department when he recommended that the responsibility ought, if possible, to be left entirely with the Metropolitan Board of Works to carry out the recent Acts, especially as their attention had been called so urgently and distinctly to the powers which they possessed under the Act for the protection of the public; but he must also, at the same time, confess that he thought he should like to see a little pressure put upon them to do their duty with regard to the matter, as to which they knew there was a good deal of public anxiety. In the Act of Parliament to which reference had been made there were so many things referred to, besides that of the construction of public buildings in the Metropolis, that the Metropolitan Board must have been hindered in dealing with that question. He supposed they might separate the responsibility, to a certain extent, between the Metropolitan Board and the Licensing Authority, because there was no doubt that if the Lord Chamberlain refused to grant his licence where there were defective safeguards for the public, that would be the most efficient way of putting pressure on the proprietors of theatres. Thus, whilst the Metropolitan Board were taking their time for the inspection, and in getting the required alterations executed, if the opinion of the Lord Chamberlain or the Home Secretary was that the public were in danger in any particular theatre, then they could bring the authority they possessed into force, whereby the protection to the public would be more effective than by the dilatory action of the Metropolitan Board. He could not but think that the Board had been dilatory in the matter; and now that prominent attention had been called to the subject, additional responsibility would rest upon them. He doubted very much whether the Board had ever considered that the recent Act had vested them with great and novel powers until the Reports referred to by the Secretary of State for the Home Department had been sent to them. There were certain points which struck the Committee which sat on the question, with regard to existing theatres and the changes required in them. One was that there should be more numerous exits. Although it was shown that many theatres possessed sufficient exits to be easily emptied in two or three minutes, yet it was also shown conclusively that the public were absolutely ignorant of them with the exception of the door by which they entered. When the inspection by the Lord Chamberlain was made, which was always made with notice, every entrance was in proper order; but on other occasions bars and other obstructions were placed against them, which prevented their being used on an emergency. That was one of the reasons why there should be a more constant inspection of theatres, without any notice being given, so that the public might be sure that every precaution for their safety was being taken. He quite agreed with the remark of his hon. Friend (Mr.

Dixon-Hartland), that it was important that the public should be made aware that the exits provided were sufficient, and were kept in such a condition as to be available on a moment's notice; and not, as was usually the case, fastened up or used for some other purpose more convenient to the lessee. The existing means of exit should be generally used, instead of, as at present, the public being driven to one or two of the main exits, the other exits being kept only for occasions of danger. The result of that practice was that the public were not accustomed to the various exits, and when danger occurred and panic arose, and when the audience had less coolness and were less capable of thinking of what ought to be done, they naturally all rushed to the main exit, which consequently became blocked. Those were the main points to which the attention of the Metropolitan Board should be directed, with the view of their exercising properly their duties as regarded them. He trusted that while the discussion might go far to rouse managers to a due sense of their duties to the public, his right hon. and learned Friend would not be satisfied with throwing the responsibility on the Metropolitan Board, but that he would continue to urge on them the necessity of using the powers they possessed, and establishing a proper system of inspection, on which the public could rely with certainty. The safety of the public required that no time should be lost in ascertaining what the dangers really were, and putting into force the powers that already existed under the Act, and which had hitherto been so much neglected.

MR. JOSEPH COWEN said, that, in his opinion, the House was under an obligation to the hon. Gentleman the Member for Evesham (Mr. Dixon-Hartland) for bringing the subject so pointedly before its attention. But he (Mr. Cowen) thought the hon. Gentleman had confined himself too much to theatres. It was, no doubt, important; and, whether a Committee was appointed or not, the expressions of opinion that had been elicited from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department could not but have a favourable effect upon the owners and lessees of Metropolitan theatres. He (Mr. Cowen) wished, however, to say that there were other places of public resort the means for entrance to and exit from which were just as deficient and as dangerous as in theatres. The construction of some of their public halls was as faulty as the construction of the theatres; and even their churches and chapels were not free from difficulties and dangers. Doubtless, the accident at Vienna was a serious one; but, if he recollected right, that which occurred in the church at Santiago was as disastrous, and even more painful, and was entirely due to deficient exit accommodation. He had had unpleasant experience himself as to the difficulties of getting into a public hall, as at the last Election he got an uncomfortable squeeze in crushing into a crowded meeting. He would urge, therefore, that, as regarded remedies, attention should not be given to one description of public buildings alone. After the accident at Vienna, the Provincial authorities in the North of England had instituted inquiries as to the condition of the theatres within their jurisdiction, and he believed that generally the reports had not been unfavourable. The provision for letting an audience out of a theatre was usually sufficient. In some places it was excessive—more than was required. The chief danger arose from panic. If the people would simply leave the theatres quietly, there was scarcely any place that would not allow them to get out easily. It was panic that caused the loss of life. The way people acted in a panic was most extraordinary. He remembered Mr. Boucicault, who had probably had as much experience in theatrical management as any man living, say that when he built a theatre in New York he made unusual provisions for the audience leaving along both sides of the building. He had big folding doors placed, and on them painted in conspicuous letters the announcement that if the audience simply pressed these doors they would open, and egress would thus be obtained without difficulty. Notwithstanding the existence of these doors and the announcement, on the very first occasion of a panic the people did not avail themselves of that provision, but crushed out at the ordinary doors, causing some considerable injury and some loss of life. It was not sufficient, therefore, to provide means of exit. These should be regularly used, and the people should become accustomed to their use. People in a panic were always selfish, and it was all but impossible to provide for the unreasonable exhibition of that feeling. All they could do was to make the best provision possible, and trust to the good sense of the public.

MR. MACFARLANE said, he agreed with the reasons given by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department against the appointment of a Committee, because the question was urgent, and the only effect of the appointment of the Committee would be to postpone the matter for a year. Long before the Vienna catastrophe there was a disastrous fire in a theatre at Nice, and it was astonishing to him that the Metropolitan Board of Works let such a question as the one under notice slide, as it had done, until the Vienna accident occurred, when they found that four years ago an Act was passed which conferred on them ample powers if they would only put them into force. The Report of Captain Shaw, which had been referred to, mentioned particularly eight theatres. The right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department was naturally reluctant to lay that Report upon the Table of the House, because he knew that if he did so those eight theatres would be empty in future. He (Mr. Macfarlane) ventured to think that if the public in this City realized the risk they ran when they went out to amuse themselves they would never enter a theatre. To show what little attention was paid to the orders of the Lord Chamberlain, he might refer to the fact that a few years ago it was the custom to fill the various gangways of theatres with chairs for the accommodation of extra people. But he (Mr. Macfarlane) called the attention of the Lord Chamberlain to the dangerous practice, who at once issued an order that it should be discontinued. But what was the effect of the Lord Chamberlain's order? It was simply not obeyed. On going to a theatre within a week after the prohibition was issued, the stalls being full, he (Mr. Macfarlane) was offered a chair in the gangway, and, on his reminding the boxkeeper that the Lord Chamberlain had forbidden chairs to be placed there, the man simply laughed and did no more. The dangers were due, he contended, to the laxity of the authorities, and, first of all, to the Lord Chamberlain. If the latter were to suspend the licence of a single theatre for the space of six months on account of infraction of his regulations, he believed that all structural dangers and such obstacles as he had mentioned would disappear the next day. The fact was that an idea was prevalent that the sole duty of the Lord Chamberlain was to regulate the length of the skirts of the ladies of the corps de ballet, and that he had nothing whatever to do with looking after the safety of the public. The last Act, which transferred a considerable portion of the authority of the Lord Chamberlain to the Metropolitan Board of Works, was passed in 1878, and yet they were only now discussing the question whether that Act should be put in force. He hoped that steps would be immediately taken to insure the safety of the public in this matter. There was no way of allaying panic except by convincing the public mind that there were efficient means of escape. He thought the assurances of the Secretary of State for the Home Department were sufficient, and hoped the Motion would not be pressed to a division. The Metropolitan Board of Works had sufficient powers in the matter; and it was not creditable to them that they had not put them in force. He admitted it was hard on lessees of theatres, who were not proprietors, to spend a lot of money on structural alterations, and thought in such cases the owner should be made the responsible person.

MR. DIXON-HARTLAND said, that, after what had fallen from the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department, he should ask leave to withdraw his Motion. If no steps, however, were taken in the matter by the Metropolitan Board of Works, he should be obliged to bring it forward again.

WOODS AND FORESTS—FIRES IN WOOLMER FOREST.

OBSERVATIONS.

MR. SCLATER-BOOTH, who had given Notice of his intention to call attention to damage recently caused by fires originating on the Government property in Woolmer Forest, and to move a Resolution thereon, said, that he would not then detain the House by going into the subject. The fires were said to be caused by the keepers in charge of the forest setting fire to the heather for the better preservation of the game. He had to complain, however, that the Papers relating to the subject, which had been moved for seven or eight weeks ago, had not yet been placed in the hands of Members.

MR. CHILDERS said, he must apologize for not having hurried on the printing of the Papers in question; but he had no idea that there was any particular hurry for them, and the demands on the printer were very heavy. Instructions, however, should at once be given that they should be taken in hand promptly.

Main Question, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair," put, and agreed to.

SUPPLY—ARMY ESTIMATES.

SUPPLY—considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Motion made, and Question proposed,

"That a sum, not exceeding £2,966,000, be granted to Her Majesty, to defray the Charge for Provisions, Forage, Fuel, Transport, and other Services, which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March 1883."

SIR ROBERT LOYD LINDSAY said, he thought those interested in the Refreshment Department of the Army Estimates would be pleased at the manner in which the charges were presented on this occasion, inasmuch as the absolute expenditure on the Services was shown. The probability was that some economy would result from the new system which had been adopted. As he understood it, the extra receipts which had hitherto been handed back to the Exchequer, and there, so far as the Army was concerned, lost sight of, would now be available, under the direction of the Secretary of State for War (Mr. Childers), for promoting such minor changes as did not, perhaps, form part of the Estimates, and which could not be effected were it not for economies brought about. It had often struck him that the officers of our Army had not those inducements to study economy which it was very desirable they should have; and this was probably due, in a great measure, to the system which had been in vogue. Hitherto, the result of economies effected had been handed back to the Exchequer; therefore, military men had had no particular interest in studying economy; but, under the present system, if general officers commanding districts were enabled to effect certain economies in those districts, he hoped that, under the direction of the Secretary of State for War, they would be able to lay out certain sums which they had never had the opportunity of laying out before, and the non-application of which had been, in the past, a great disadvantage to the Army. He trusted they might now look forward to the period when the Army was passing out of that transition state in which it had been for so long. They might say that for the past 12 years the Army had been in the hands of the reformer. Mr. Cardwell first brought forward many changes which, as was well enough known, were not received with much favour on that (the Opposition) side of the House; but following Mr. Cardwell came Mr. Hardy—the present Lord Cranbrook—who stated, in the first speech he delivered as Secretary of State for War, that at that period he was not able to say that he would reverse the policy of his Predecessor; and, on further consideration, he announced that it was not his intention to do so. Since that three Secretaries of State had had charge of the War Office; and he could say, without fear of contradiction, that in no case had there been anything like what they might call a serious reversal of policy. His right hon. and gallant Friend the Member for North Lancashire (Colonel Stanley) followed after Mr. Hardy; and he, impressed with the belief that continuity of work in carrying out the system was of the utmost importance—although, no doubt, he might have thought that many things might with advantage have been done in a different way—went on in the spirit of his Predecessors with many changes, improving here and there; but still moving in the one direction. Without pretending to go through all the improvements his right hon. Friend introduced, he must allude to one very advantageous reform which the right hon. Gentleman effected in the Pay Department. This had been a matter of great difficulty. They remembered that at one time it was thought that the officers of the Army, capable as they no doubt were to lead our soldiers, were not sufficiently instructed in such matters to be able to deal satisfactorily with accounts; but the right hon. Gentleman took a different view, and persevered in that view, and carried out a considerable change in the Department, which change he (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) hoped to hear from the Secretary of State for War was working well. For his own part, he believed it was working remarkably well. He was assured that competent officers now had charge of the Pay Department, and were performing their duties to the satisfaction of all classes. Another reform which the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire carried out, and which the House must remember hearing a great deal about, for it took considerable interest in it at the time, was connected with the Medical Department. The subject was one of great difficulty, and at that time, when these difficulties were before them, it was almost impossible to find medical men to enter the Army, so unpopular had the Service become. Now, however, in consequence of the useful reforms carried out by the right hon. Gentleman, medical gentlemen readily entered the Army, and were anxious to compete at the very difficult examinations through which Army medical officers had to pass. These were two points on which great improvement had been effected by his right hon. Friend. He would allude to another proposal, or rather scheme, which was formulated at the War Office by the right hon. Gentleman; and he must say that the right hon. Gentleman had considerable cause to regret being obliged to leave the War Office when he did, as he had at the time in hand some improvements which, if they had been carried out, would have redounded to the credit of the Administration. The right hon. Gentleman formulated the scheme which had subsequently been carried out by the present Secretary of State for War; and it must be a consolation to the right hon. and gallant Gentleman the Member for North Lancashire to see the plan which he and those who worked with him so carefully matured carried out so fairly and loyally by his Successor. It seemed to him (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) that perhaps the most important point which was raised by the present Secretary of State for War, in the speech which he delivered just previous to the Easter Recess, was that which related to the formation of a First Army Corps. They were in the habit in that House of referring to the opinion of the intelligent foreigner; but he would not go beyond quoting the opinion of the intelligent Englishman. His opinion was this—not, perhaps, always expressed, for they did not very often find Englishmen taking an active interest in the Army, believing, as they did, that everything was going on smoothly—but when the opinion of the intelligent Englishman was expressed, it was this—that for the large sum which was annually spent on our Army, we ought to have one fit to take the field at a week's notice, without disarranging and dislocating the whole of our Home system. The right hon. Gentleman, in coming to the War Office, had observed how essential it was that we should have an Army of this kind, and had set himself the task of giving it to us. He had, apparently, advanced a considerable distance in the direction of affording us such an Army, surmounting all the difficulties and obstacles which stood in his way. Now, what appeared to him (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) to be one of these difficulties, and perhaps the chief difficulty, in the way of having a complete scheme by which we could send the troops forward without dislocation, was that we had not a sufficient number of men; 10,000 more men were required. He did not, on this occasion, venture to recommend such a large addition as that, or any addition at all; but he wished to point out that if we had for our Home Army 71 battalions and a fixed number of men—without taking the depôts into consideration, 42,000 men—if the men were divided equally amongst the battalions, the result was that when they were ordered on service not one of them was fit to take the field. The result was that immediately a battalion was ordered on service it had to be made up to its full strength, and the method that had naturally suggested itself of doing that was by volunteering. As to the system of volunteering, it had fallen greatly into discredit. He did not altogether disagree with its use; but it was objected to, and the main objection taken to it was this. Supposing volunteers were called for, they were furnished from some other regiment, and that regiment in turn became weakened, and probably, a little later, that regiment itself was ordered on service, then they might have these two regiments serving together, the result being that because men from the first had gone into the second the officers of the first were well acquainted with the men of the second, as they had served with them, but were not acquainted with the men of their own regiment. But, for his own part, he thought there were great advantages in volunteering, and he trusted it would not be altogether dropped, because they could fairly use it as a proper mode of strengthening their companies, and they might take it for granted that it was not unpopular. Twenty shillings was about the sum that represented the objection which a lad had to changing his battalion. For that small sum of 20s. a soldier was generally perfectly ready to go into another battalion. Now, this necessity which he had spoken of in connection with the First Army Corps would not arise in a great emergency. It was only in a small war that it arose, because in a great emergency they had their machinery, which was well understood—calling out the Reserves and embodying the Militia, and so on. But, whether for a large or small war, he hoped we should soon be able to say that we had an Army Corps fit to take the field at a week's notice. The right hon. Gentleman proceeded by means of a sort of system of selection. He selected 12 regiments at the head of the Roster, or rather it could be said that these regiments, in a certain sense, selected themselves. They rose by a gradual process until they became the first regiments on the Roster. They were composed of about 12,000 men, and these, with the eight battalions in the Mediterranean—making about 18,000 men—and the three battalions of Guards formed the First Army Corps. Looking at the Return “The Army (Variation of Numbers),” which the right hon. Gentlemen had placed before them, a very curious similitude occurred to his mind. It really appeared as though the right hon. Gentleman had divided his 71 battalions at home after the manner in which Dante divided the spirits of those who departed into another world. Twelve battalions were raised to a most perfect state—it might be said that they were in a state of beatitude. But then, if they cast an eye down the Return, they found 37 battalions which, if the others were in the Paradiso, were certainly in the Inferno. The condition of the 37 was as unfortunate as that of the 12 was happy. They were in a state of attenuated shadows. Then, as an intermediate state between these two conditions, they came to 24 battalions which were eminently in the Purgatorio. They were rising gradually from the lower condition until they could venture to hope to reach the higher regions. It seemed to him rather unfortunate that whilst there were only 12 battalions in Paradiso there were 37 in Inferno. He would venture to say two or three words about these 37 battalions. First, as to the officers, the commanding officer of each was really in a very unfortunate position. Perhaps he had looked forward all his life to the time when he would have the great distinction of commanding his regiment; but, unluckily for him, he rose just at the time his regiment was in this transition state. The battalion would rise again; but then his five years would probably have elapsed, and by the time his regiment became complete he would have run out his period. What he (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) wished the right hon. Gentleman to consider was, what could be done for these officers, because, undoubtedly, their case was a very hard one? They deserved that some means should be found of mitigating the hardship of their condition. Their duties were very important, and the officer who trained a young regiment up well deserved all the credit that could possibly be given to him. As to the regiments themselves, he wished to lay some stress upon this—that, as he had said, they were nothing more than shadowy regiments made up of recruits. It must be so—it could not be otherwise. They were not merely regiments half made up of recruits; but, as he understood the scheme of the right hon. Gentleman, they would be more than half made up of recruits. By far the greater part of the regiments would be recruits; therefore nothing more should be expected of them than they were able to show, which would be very little. We should make up our minds to consider them nothing more than nurseries for the training of recruits; and, above all things, in his opinion, they ought not to be sent to Aldershot or any of the camps where they constantly came under the notice of their own countrymen and of foreigners. They should be kept as much as possible out of sight. Obviously the proper place for these regiments, the officers of which had nothing to do but drill a parcel of boys, was the county towns to which they were territorially attached. Their drill would be nothing more than recruit drill. They did not need to go through the higher courses of tactics which were taught at Aldershot. Nothing but the simplest matter, the alphabet of warfare, would be taught them; and he should, therefore, be glad to see them sent to their own localities. This led him to a remark he wished to make in regard to an item of expenditure in the Estimates, which, he observed, related not to buildings, but to repairs at Aldershot. He was under the impression that at Aldershot and at Shorncliffe there was already plenty of accommodation for the regiments the right hon. Gentleman proposed to put into the First Army Corps; and, if that were so, obviously what should now be done, if further money was to be expended, should be to improve the barracks distributed throughout the county towns, in order that they might be rendered efficient for the purposes for which they were required. Three millions of money had been spent on these dépôt centres, and still they were not in that condition in which they ought to be. A slight further expenditure on them, however, would make them fit and proper places to receive the territorial regiments that belonged to them. It was not proper to run the two things together—the Aldershot scheme and the territorial scheme, which provided that regiments were to be quartered in the county towns amongst the people from whom they were recruited and amongst the officers, whom, he trusted, would all one day be drawn from the counties to which the regiments they joined belonged. He hoped, if there was further expenditure on buildings, it would be in the direction he had indicated rather than on the improvement of Aldershot, which they knew had swallowed up an enormous sum—much more than anyone in the House had anticipated. An enormous amount had been spent, and, to his mind, mis-spent, on Aldershot. Aldershot seemed to be a place fitted for a camp of instruction,

where troops should go in the summer months and have instruction in the open air—under canvas if necessary. Buildings had been erected at Aldershot, as he said, at enormous expense, and further expenditure was going on there. This was the place the right hon. Gentleman ought to fix his eye on. He ought to take care that no further amounts were spent there. On the contrary, he should rather endeavour to make the territorial scheme more efficient by rendering the barracks fitted for the reception of battalions. Passing to the Report which was made to the Secretary of State for War by the officers in charge of recruiting, he was very glad to see that the pledge that was given last year—namely, that men of 19 years of age, or the equivalent of 19 years of age, should be the only men enlisted for the future in the Army, had been carried out, and was answering as well as could be expected. He observed that the right hon. Gentleman was sanguine of being able to say some day that he would limit the age to 20. If that was so, so much the better; but we must remember this—that we might not always be able to recruit as readily as we did now. At present we enlisted between 19,000 and 20,000 a-year; but agriculture and trade were a little slack at present, and we must bear in mind that a day might come when we might not be able to recruit with the same facility. He hoped, therefore, that nothing would be done to tie the hands of the recruiting staff; and that they should be allowed, if necessary, to take the men as best they could. He observed that the standard of height was rather reduced, and he did not understand how that could be, whilst, at the same time, the standard of age was increased. One would have naturally supposed that as they took men of older years, so the stature would have been increased; or, at any rate, that it would not have been reduced. Another point to which he wished to draw attention in the statement made by the Inspector of Recruiting was that which related to the physique of the recruits who came into the Army. He certainly thought it was a matter for congratulation to see the remarkably good physique of our troops compared with that of the troops of foreign nations. On looking at the Return, he saw that the English recruit, as compared with the French recruit, had the advantage in height of about 3 inches, and almost a similar advantage in chest measurement. Then they came down to Austria and Germany, and in both those countries the recruits were inferior to the English recruits by about 2½ inches in height, and the same in chest measurement. That was a point which ought to be noticed, because they frequently heard remarks made on public occasions as to the miserable condition and physique of the British recruit. Statements of that kind were frequently made in the Press, and were available to anyone who chose to cast their eye over them; and when such a reply as this was possible it should be given. The right hon. Gentleman had held out some hopes of being able to do something for the Volunteers; but he did not find in the right hon. Gentleman's statement that he proposed to do much for them at present. He spoke of issuing capes to them, and it was to be hoped that would be done. It was really most essential—he (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) could not say how important he deemed it—that protection should be given to our Volunteers, who had been exposed from time to time to most inclement weather. He was surprised they had not frequently found many of the Volunteers on the sick list, in consequence of the way they were exposed. He understood that the Volunteers were to be brought, to a certain extent, within the territorial system; at all events, the names of certain regiments would appear as forming the fourth battalions of certain territorial districts. He highly approved of that plan. There was no more territorial force in the Service of the Crown; indeed, he thought it was the most territorial force; and it was very desirable that we should be able gradually to draw the Volunteers into the system. Then, with regard to what the right hon. Gentleman had said as to warrant rank, hon. Members were perfectly satisfied. Non-commissioned officers might rise to have their names in The Army List associated with the names of the right hon. Gentleman himself, the Commander-in-Chief, and the many distinguished people connected with the Army. It would, he was sure, be a great inducement to young men to join the Army to think that by good conduct they could rise to warrant rank, and have their names in The Army List.

But he wished to call attention to the fact that the right hon. Gentleman had left out the quartermaster sergeants. That was an unfortunate omission, as the quartermaster sergeant was a most important person, as they all knew. He was a more important person even than the sergeant major; not at home, perhaps—the sergeant major there being an officer, it was desirable to magnify and make as much of as possible—but on active service. The quartermaster sergeant had charge of the stores, had to face many difficulties, and was thrown into many temptations. His position was most responsible, and it would, no doubt, be to the benefit of the Service that he should be included in warrant rank.

GENERAL SIR GEORGE BALFOUR thought the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War was doing his best to give effect to all those measures which were calculated to be to the good of the Army; and the right hon. Gentleman was doing so with a liberality which could not fail to meet with success. He trusted the right hon. Gentleman would deal properly and liberally with the many officers who suffered by the changes in their military system. It was heart-breaking, in many instances, for officers who were in the prime of life to be now put aside and placed on the Retired List. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would see his way to compensate those officers to the utmost extent. Of course, the officers who entered the Army hereafter must take the chances of service according to the new rules. Several changes of great importance had been made in the mode in which the Army Estimates were framed, one important change being to use the funds derived from the sale of stores, and hitherto paid into the Exchequer as Civil Receipts, in diminution of the Army Charges; but, whilst cordially approving of those receipts being so used, having been advocated whilst employed in the War Office, at the same time, those changes deprived them of the facility of comparing the present with the past Army Expenditure. He was perfectly well alive to the financial dangers and difficulties which might attend the appropriation of the extra receipts in diminishing the expenditure of the Army; and to guard against abuse it was necessary the greatest care should be taken by the Secretary of State for War, as well as by the Public Accounts Committee, in having a public record made of all the extra receipts distinct from the Appropriation in Aid. He was not yet satisfied that they had taken all the possible precautions to guard against abuse; but the Financial Secretary to the Treasury had supplied him (Sir George Balfour) with all the information on the subject which was at his command, and he would carefully go into the matter and see if he could not make some acceptable suggestions. Another change had been made of showing the pay drawn by Staff officers in lump sums, including regimental and Staff pay. That was a right course; but it wholly deprived Members of the power of comparing the past payments with present payments. There was one point to which he earnestly hoped the right hon. Gentleman's attention would be drawn, and that was the employment of our Army in Ireland. He looked with great apprehension upon the present employment of troops in Ireland. Judging from his experience in India, nothing had tended more to produce the Mutiny in the Bengal Army than the employment of troops very much after the way our soldiers were now being employed in Ireland. They were scattered in small bodies, and often detached under young subalterns, and they were charged with duties which soldiers ought not to be called on to perform. Military and Constabulary duties were of a different character, and yet our soldiers were used for the duties which police ought to perform. He earnestly hoped the Secretary of State for War would, as soon as possible, withdraw the troops from Ireland, and collect them in places where the discipline might be properly looked after. He could not express in words too strong the danger there was to the discipline of the Army by the employment of soldiers in the manner they were now employed in Ireland. There was another point to which he also desired to draw attention. They had long had doubts with regard to the efficiency of the troops in the field in the matter of firing. A Committee had inquired into the subject, but the Report of that Committee had never been made public; indeed, the Secretary of State had refused to make it public. He presumed that the very reason which existed to prevent the publication of the Report ought to induce the Secretary of State for War to see to the efficiency of the troops in regard to firing. In the interest of the Army one essential point was that the men should be withdrawn from every duty which interfered with their efficient training as soldiers—for instance, every guard which could be dispensed with ought to be done away with, because it was well that, as far as possible, soldiers should be kept together in bodies, and day by day subject to military training under their regimental officers. In this country we had never attended to that with sufficient care; but in India, when he (Sir George Balfour) had the honour of being connected with military finance there, the guard and sentry employment of every kind by which soldiers could be taken away from their regiments was, with the approval of Lord Canning, done away with. Even the ordinary military guards for Commissariat and other Stores, treasure, and other minor purposes, were abolished, and watchmen employed, wherever it was practicable. Then, as regarded the formation of the regiments of Cavalry and Infantry. First, concerning the Cavalry, he wished to point out that 12 years ago a very important change was made under the administration of Lord Hampton, on the advice of the late Sir Hope Grant, by which the Cavalry was formed into squadrons. After the lapse of two years, however, Mr. Cardwell thought fit to change the system, and to return to the troop formation, mainly on account of the difficulty of reconciling the Purchase system with the squadron formation. That difficulty no longer existed. He (Sir George Balfour) regretted the retrograde step at the time, and he regretted it now. He would not at present express any opinion as to the recently proposed formation of Cavalry into brigades; but he thought that squadrons ought to be adopted at once. As to the strength and efficiency of battalions being improved, as supposed, by organizing that body in companies 10 in number, as formerly, and now in eight companies, he thought that a blunder, unless each company had at least 100 privates. But with battalions of 800 privates and under, he thought a six-company formation was the utmost that ought to be practised, and that, instead of having small companies of 30 or 40 men, no company should be composed of less than 100 up to 150 men. In that formation there would then be a captain and three subalterns effective with each company, and the Regimental Establishment should provide for having the officers and non-commissioned officers needed for that strength thoroughly effective. He approved of all the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) had said with regard to warrant officers, and he was proud that the Secretary of State for War had created that rank. Whilst at the War Office that rank was earnestly urged; but the opposition of the Horse Guards' Branch prevented its creation. But by its creation the Secretary of State had effected a great improvement in the Army in this respect. He was confident that great good to the Army would result from the formation of the rank of warrant officers, inasmuch as a number of young men would now be induced to enter the Army who would not otherwise think of doing so. There was no part of the Indian military system that had been of so much benefit to the Army as the creation of warrant officers. At the time when every branch of the Imperial Army was in want of recruits, the Indian Army obtained an unlimited supply, and mainly because promotion to warrant rank could be secured. He spoke from experience when he said that the warrant officers in the Indian Army had behaved themselves fully as well as the commissioned officers. He would even go so far as to say that they would find fewer courts martial in regard to warrant officers than in respect to officers of the Army. Any distinction that the right hon. Gentleman could make with regard to warrant officers would have his warm approval. Another subject on which he (Sir George Balfour) wished to speak was in connection with the responsibilities and division of work at the War Office. No doubt the Secretary of State was wholly charged with every duty; but there existed a division of work of a rather curious character. Under the present system the Commander-in-Chief, the Financial Secretary, and the Surveyor General of Ordnance acted under Orders in Council issued 10 years ago during the administration of Lord Cardwell. Their responsibilities and duties were defined by those Orders, which ought to have been specially laid before Parliament in a direct and formal manner, instead of becoming known through a Select Committee. It was fully admitted that no duties assigned to those officers by the Orders in Council could be performed except under the distinct control of the Secretary of State. But in order to show that those officers, charged, as they were, with such important duties in this special and formal manner, had an appreciation of their duties, and that they did attend to them, it was essentially necessary that they should be required to present an annual Report on all the heads and duties detailed in the Orders in Council. For instance, his hon. Friend the Financial Secretary to the War Office should submit a Report concerning the whole of his Department to the Secretary of State for War. So, also, the Surveyor General of the Ordnance and the Commander-in-Chief should report on the working of the several branches assigned to them in the Orders; and the Secretary of State, in turn, would be enabled to lay a full and ample Statement before the House, as well as the Reports in question. There were many points connected with the administration of the Army with which it was impossible for the Secretary of State for War, in his Annual Statement, to deal. Able as the speeches of the right hon. Gentleman were, they were usually confined to generalities. The Reports, however, to which he (Sir George Balfour) had referred would supply a great deal of the required but omitted information. He thought that the right hon. and learned Judge Advocate General should also be called upon to report upon the administration of justice in the Army, and generally on the working of the Army Act. And now he would ask the Secretary of State for War if he would be good enough, when making his Statement next year, to compare the present expenditure on the Army and Navy with the expenditure under those heads in the year 1869-70? In the latter year the Army Expenditure was brought down to less than £14,000,000, being a lower sum than it had stood at since the Crimean War, and since that time it had been increasing yearly, and now it was upwards of £16,000,000. Of course, if they wished to have efficiency, they must expect to have a heavy expenditure; but still he could not help thinking that if they were to compare the details of the present expenditure with that of 1869-70 some mode could be shown by which economy might be effected. The right hon. Gentleman had said he was going to make some saving by a reduction in the number of general officers. He (Sir George Balfour) heartily approved of the suggestion, for he was satisfied a smaller number of officers of this rank would be quite competent to perform the necessary duties. He had also again to complain of the mode in which the military expenditure was swollen by the charges on account of the guns, projectiles, ammunition, and warlike stores needed for the Navy. In the present Estimate the sum of £616,000 was charged to the Army, which really belonged to the Navy. That was a higher amount for their Supplies than hitherto charged in any year before. Surely the Navy could take that expenditure which was incurred by the re-organization of the Naval Ordnance upon their own shoulders. These re-organizations were constantly occurring. During the last 2 years there had been four or five Naval re-organizations of guns, and probably before they had paid the money necessary for the purpose of carrying out the present re-organization they would have another re-organization, so that there would never be an end to the Army military expenditure bearing a new charge. All these changes in a degree flowed from the erroneous course of making the Army Estimates bear the cost of the Naval Stores. But he (Sir George Balfour) was fully willing to admit that the like mistaken course was followed in making the Naval Estimates bear the cost of the Transports required for the Army. Both practices caused carelessness in regard to the expenditure. But as he saw there were other hon. Members who wished to take part in the debate, so he would reserve whatever else he was inclined to say till a future occasion.

Sir Robert Lloyd Lindsay

COLONEL ALEXANDER said, there were one or two points in connection with these Estimates upon which, with the permission of the Committee, he would like to address a few observations to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War. In the first place, he would remind the right hon. Gentleman that in his recent ~~speech~~ at Pontefract he said that the compulsory retirement of officers at the early age of 40 was an evil the most dangerous to the efficiency of our officers that could possibly be imagined; and he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether this danger was not likely to occur shortly in the Brigade of Guards unless steps were taken speedily to stop the present stagnation of promotion which prevailed in that corps? The causes of that stagnation were not far to seek. When, in 1871, the privileges of the Guards were prospectively abolished, the intention was expressed of assimilating the Guards in every respect to the regiments of the Line; but, in one very important particular, that intention had never been fulfilled—namely, no second lieutenant colonels were appointed to the battalion of Guards, as was the case in the Line; and, consequently, promotion which would result from those appointments was seriously affected. In the Line two lieutenant colonels retired within a period of six years; but in the Guards there were only two retirements in eight years. It appeared to him that the only remedy for this evil was the immediate appointment of second lieutenant colonels to the battalion of Guards. Certainly, unless some steps were taken, and that speedily, to remove the present block of promotion, the professional prospects of many promising young officers who entered the Service immediately after the privileges of the Guards were abolished would be seriously endangered. He made this appeal to the right hon. Gentleman, not so much in the interest of the officers themselves, but in the interest of the efficiency of the Brigade of Guards, which, as all would admit, ought to be maintained so long as the brigade itself was maintained. Passing to the important subject of recruiting, he heartily congratulated the right hon. Gentleman on the large number of recruits which he had at present obtained. He had correspondents in the recruiting districts who fully bore out the statement of the right hon. Gentleman in that respect. What was the cause of this sudden development of martial ardour? The right hon. Gentleman, in his speech at Pontefract, attributed it to the advantages which he recently conferred on the non-commissioned officers. He (Colonel Alexander) did not wish to underrate in any way those advantages. On the contrary, he thought that in conferring them the right hon. Gentleman had established a lasting claim to the gratitude of the Army; but he was bound to say, for the information of the Committee, that the Inspector General of Recruiting, in his Report, assigned other reasons for the exceptionally large influx of recruits at the present time. The Inspector General of Recruiting said that the result was due partly to the lower standard of height prevailing in the Infantry, and partly to the localization of that arm. Now, it did appear to him (Colonel Alexander) somewhat strange that in the long and interesting speech of the right hon. Gentleman in explaining the Estimates—a speech to which he (Colonel Alexander) listened with the greatest attention—the right hon. Gentleman passed by, as if beneath notice from him, the fact that last year the standard of height in the Infantry was reduced to a lower point than it had touched at any period since the year 1870, when short service was first introduced. If the right hon. Gentleman was obtaining such a large number of recruits—almost more than he wanted (as Sir John Adye boasted at the Guildhall)—why, then, by reducing the standard of height, did he disregard the advice given last year by the Inspector General, who, in his Report, said—

“That the standard, once fixed, ought never to be disturbed, and that the conditions of recruiting ought always to be as simple and as permanent as possible.”

The Inspector General, in his present Report, took very good care not to revert to this extremely inconvenient subject; but he made a casual remark which went far to explain the reasons which actuated the right hon. Gentleman in reducing the standard for the Infantry last year to 5 feet 4 inches. The Inspector General remarked, in his Report, that the minimum age of recruits was raised last year to the physical equivalent of 19 years, and that the standard of height for the Infantry, was at the same time, reduced to 5 feet 4 inches. Now, the Committee would recollect that last year the right hon. Gentleman took great credit to himself for raising the minimum of age to what he called the physical equivalent of 19 years, adding that he hoped, after a time, to make the minimum 20 years. The right hon. Gentleman never said at that time that the carrying out of his scheme would involve a reduction of one inch in the standard of height for the Infantry. The right hon. Gentleman evidently felt that he owed some apology for making this reduction in the standard of height, for the Inspector General of Recruiting, in an Appendix to his Report, said that, even with a standard of 5 feet 4 inches, our Army would still be taller than any other Army in Europe. That the large influx of recruits was almost entirely due to the reduction of the standard of height was conclusively proved by the remark of the Inspector General that neither for the Guardsmen or gunners of the Royal Artillery the recruiting came up to the standard required, because both for the Guards and gunners of the Royal Artillery superior qualifications were required. He understood that within the last few weeks the chest measurement for gunners of the Royal Artillery had actually been reduced from 35 to 34 inches. It was all very well for the right hon. Gentleman to talk of the increasing popularity of the Service; but if the Service was so popular as he alleged it to be, how did it happen, as mentioned by the Inspector General in his Report, that so large a number of men purchased their discharge just before the completion of their period of service? Now, in his Report last year, the Inspector General reckoned the discharge by purchase as part of the waste of the Army; and it was now proposed to diminish, or rather to utilize, this waste by allowing men who would otherwise have purchased their discharge to pass into the Reserve after three years' service with the Colours. It appeared to him that this artificial increase of the Reserve was strongly to be condemned, for the men who would thus pass prematurely into the Reserve, and who would otherwise have purchased their discharge, would, in his opinion, and, he knew, in the opinion of many competent officers, be amongst the discontented spirits of the Army, and would have, moreover, nine years in which to forget the little they had learnt. He was surprised to see in The Times, a few days ago, a rumour—he believed it was something more than a rumour—that a certain proportion of the First Class Army Reserve were to receive an immediate discharge on the condition of taking military service in South Africa. He must confess it passed his comprehension how the right hon. Gentleman, after laboriously building up the First Class Army Reserve at the expense of the active Army, could, with so little consideration, recklessly disperse it. The right hon. Gentleman had told the Committee that he was getting not only more men, but better men, and that characters were now required with recruits. He was very much astonished by that statement, because a commanding officer of Infantry and an adjutant of Cavalry had both assured him that under no circumstances whatever was a character required with a recruit; and the commanding officer of Infantry had added that, under such circumstances, the number of recruits obtained would have been infinitesimally small. The fact was, the less that was said about character the better. The Police Gazette of a very recent date contained the names of no fewer than 319 deserters; and, until the right hon. Gentleman succeeded in materially reducing that very ominous list, it was absolutely idle to talk of a better class of men now pervading the ranks of the Army. He regretted that the hon. Member for Hackney (Mr. John Holms) was now gagged. Hon. Gentlemen who sat in the last Parliament would remember how eloquently that hon. Member used to descant upon this theme. He did not deny that a considerable number of recruits now presented themselves for enlistment, and it was said that the territorial system was the cause of the increase. The Inspector General, in his last Report, admitted that there was a great variation in the recruiting capabilities of the various districts, and that, so far, the territorial system had been interfered with; and he expressed a hope that, in the course of time, the recruits required for each regiment would, in the majority of cases, be found in their own districts. Except for the principle that "hope springs eternal in the human breast," the foundation for this expectation appeared to him extremely slender, for surely it was obvious that in maintaining so many districts varying in their recruiting capabilities there must always be a surplus in one district and a deficit in another; and where there was a surplus, that must be got rid of, either by passing men prematurely into the Reserve, or by transferring them into other regiments. The Committee would see that the latter course was not likely to conduce to the popularity of the Service, for men, instead of being allowed to serve in their own local regiments, would be forced to enlist for general service. Would not the right hon. Gentleman do much better to get rid of some of those recruiting districts? What possible use could there be, for instance, in maintaining the 32nd District, which produced last year exactly 40 recruits? This territorial system was avowedly based on the German system; but in Germany the conscription was the keystone of the arch, and without conscription the territorial system was like the play of Hamlet with the part of the Prince of Denmark omitted. If the system was the success which the right hon. Gentleman asserted it was, how did it happen that no fewer than 20 territorial regiments, including the Regiment of Pontefract, were now without any fourth battalion, while one regiment had neither the third nor fourth battalion? Did the right hon. Gentleman ever expect to raise another battalion of Militia in Cornwall, where, as the hon. Baronet the Member for West Cornwall (Sir John St. Aubyn) told the Militia Committee, the population preferred either the Navy or the Marines? The fusion between the Line and the Militia was little more than nominal, for if it were real officers would be interchangeable. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he was aware that at Hamilton, which, in answer to a Question he had put last year, the right hon. Gentleman had prophesied would be the great recruiting ground for Highlanders, had gained, between the 1st of July last year and the 1st of January this year, exactly five Highland recruits for the two battalions of Highland Line Infantry? The fact was that Hamilton was much too near Glasgow, and Glenconce too near Edinburgh, to make those stations of any practical use for recruiting under the present system. One-third of our Infantry consisted of attenuated battalions of, perhaps, 450 men, and great fault was often found with commanding officers, because they did not like these attenuated battalions. But why did not they like them? Not because, as was alleged, of their poor appearance on parade, or because of the absence of the "pomp and circumstance of war," but because those attenuated battalions offered no adequate means of instruction to officers or men. A general officer commanding a district had told him that, with two of its battalions, he could not place more than 80 men on parade. Our case was very much like that of the French Army, as described a few months ago by the Correspondent of The Times, who stated that for many months to come tactical instruction in the French Army would be practically in abeyance, for, after making some necessary deductions for sick, guards, and employed, there would not be a dozen men per company for parade. Before Easter the right hon. Gentleman had stated that in each of the 71 battalions stationed at home there would be, on an average, 270 recruits—in other words, that nearly one-half of the forces available at home must always consist, under any circumstances, of recruits. Even at the risk of being called a pessimist and a croaker, he could not help expressing a fear that we should suffer in the future, as we had suffered before, from the fatal youthfulness of our Army. He was quite aware that the right hon. Gentleman had denied the youth of the Army which was defeated last year by the Boers in South Africa; and the Secretary of State for the Home Department, at Glasgow, had attributed the defeat, not to the youth of the men, but to a mistake committed by a most gallant but unfortunate commander. Upon that point he should not like to say much, for he could not help remembering a short time ago The Times stated that without promotion by selection we must inevitably recur to the military imbecility of former days; but he would ask whether last year we had not in South Africa the pick of the choicest talent which the Staff College could afford? Further, he would ask whether any of the "military imbecility" displayed in former days could have been attended with more fatal results than were the battles of Laing's Nek and Majuba Hill? There was a disposition at this moment on the part of the public to believe that we had the best possible Army. God grant that the public might not be some day fatally undeceived! But, in the meantime, if our Ministers prophesied falsely, they were entitled to take refuge in the plea that the people loved to have it so.

COLONEL COLTHURST said, he wished to call attention to the case of those soldiers who were entering now upon their 12th year of service, and would suffer great hardship through the operation of the Queen's Regulations of last year. From a Return which the right hon. Gentleman had furnished him with, it appeared that there were over 4,000 private soldiers who enlisted in 1870, under the Act of 1867, who were now eligible for re-engagement. The Act of 1867 gave these men the privilege of re-engaging after seven years' service. It did not give them the right of re-engagement; but they were encouraged to do so by an additional 1*d.* a-day, and, from his knowledge and experience, he could say that no man of good character had ever been refused. But the Act of 1870 took away the privilege of re-engagement after seven years, but put it at 12 years, and so it remained until the issue of the Queen's Regulations last year. By those Regulations the re-engagement was almost absolutely forbidden; it was only allowed under special circumstances, and each of such cases was to be submitted to the Adjutant General for his approval, accompanied by a statement of the grounds on which re-engagement was recommended. In 1880, 2,000 men were re-engaged; and, therefore, he assumed that of the 4,300 who were now eligible, or would have been eligible under the old system, somewhere about one-half wished to re-engage. The right hon. Gentleman had assured him that he would construe the new Regulations liberally, and he was certain the right hon. Gentleman would do so if he could. But there was the litera scripta manet. There were the words of the Queen's Regulations, upon which a commanding officer must act, and commanding officers might not take a liberal view of such Regulations. They considered that they were only entitled to recommend private soldiers for re-engagement when there were special grounds; when, for instance, the soldier was an artificer, or in some other way useful. The system of not retaining old soldiers was a bad one; and nearly all the commanding officers examined before Lord Airey's Committee had agreed that 25 per cent of these men should be re-engaged. After this year there would, of course, only be soldiers in the Army who enlisted under the Act of 1870, and, therefore, enlisted with their eyes open; but those men who enlisted under the Act of 1867 were entitled to some special consideration; and, however favourably the right hon. Gentleman might consider the matter, it would be of little use to them, unless he would issue an Order, or in some other way provide that these men should be treated exceptionally—that they should be re-engaged now, if they would have been re-engaged under the Regulations prior to 1881. The new Regulations ought not to be used to their detriment. He thought the right hon. Gentleman ought to make this concession, because every one of these men, if discharged against their will, would be warning beacons against recruiting in the districts to which they went. Men who went to India in 1870 had no chance of going to the Reserve, and after serving 10 years in India they were now to be sent adrift. It would be for the interest of the Service, and to the credit of the country, if the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider this matter.

LORD EUSTACE CECIL: I must preface my remarks by expressing my great regret that we were not able to bring on this discussion before 10 o'clock to-night. I do not think it is quite fair in the case of these Army Estimates, in which there is a vast sum of money at stake, and upon which a certain number of Gentlemen come down at a certain stated hour to discuss, that we should be driven to the hour of 10 o'clock before discussing them. I say this on behalf of some of my absent Friends, particularly in regard to the hon. and gallant Member for West Sussex (Sir Walter B. Barttelot), who is unable to be present to-night. He would have been glad of an opportunity of discussing several of the important matters which the right hon. Gentleman has brought forward. I must also express my regret that I do not see those Liberal Benches on the opposite side very largely filled. There are Gentlemen on that side of strong politics, and with a keen eye to reducing as far as they can, in the interests of the taxpayer, the great expenditure on the Army. I do not see in his place, for instance, the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir Wilfrid Lawson) or the hon. Member for Burnley (Mr. Rylands).

Those Gentlemen, so far as my experience extends—and on the question of the Army Estimates it extends over many years—have always been in their places; and although I do not always agree with them, still they have always upheld the interests of the public, so far as financial matters are concerned. I was much disappointed because the hon. and gallant Member for Kincardineshire (General Sir George Balfour) did not touch a little more upon the question of expenditure. I must give my right hon. Friend (Mr. Childers) a great deal of credit for the clearness and facility with which he put his proposals before the Committee; at the same time I observed that he was very apologetic. He entered into a long disquisition in order to compare the Estimates of this year with the question of population, and even with the amounts received from the Wine and Malt and Spirit Duties; and he produced figures showing, as compared with the population and Revenue, we were paying very much less for our Army than we were 25 years ago. I will not follow him in a matter of that kind; but I will go simply to the year 1880, when we left Office. In the year 1880—I take the figures he gave us—the net Expenditure was £14,980,000. What is the Expenditure this year? £15,458,000. That is to say, an increase of £500,000 upon the amount three years ago. That is a very serious addition in three years; and I think the question which the Committee and the public generally have to consider is, what additional value have we got in efficiency for this larger expenditure of money? I have made a careful computation, from which I will give a summary of the number of men in all the branches of the Service this year as compared with the number in 1880. I find that this year we have 2,671 fewer Regular soldiers, 6,036 fewer Reserve men—in the First Class Army Reserve—and 26,138 fewer trained Militiamen than we had in 1880. It is true that we have 2,000 more Volunteers and about 109 more Yeomanry. Then, if I go further and consider what the military necessities of the moment are—and I also consider the fact that something like 10,000 more men have been required for Ireland than two years ago—it makes the account on the bad side, as far as regards our efficiency, for defensive purposes very much worse. I find that we are really practically weaker in all ranks by something like 45,000 men this year than we were in 1880, and, at the same time, we are paying something like £500,000 more. If my calculations are at all correct, I must say that that is a very serious indictment. I give my right hon. Friend a great deal of credit for what he has done for the non-commissioned officers and in some other ways; but still the expenditure on the Army has gone on gradually increasing, while the number of men is diminishing. Then I come to one portion of the Expenditure which I shall have to touch upon again, and which I touched upon last year—namely, the Non-Effective Vote. Last year I never got any explanation upon this matter, although I brought it forward in order to give the right hon. Gentleman an opportunity of explaining it. I will repeat now what I read last year, but which was not explained. In 1880-1 the Non-Effective Vote amounted to £2,743,000; in 1881-2 it jumped up suddenly to £3,019,000; and this year it is £3,049,000. Therefore there is something like a £250,000 increase upon this one Vote since 1880-1 when we left Office. That would account for half the increased Expenditure, and it is this Expenditure, as I pointed out then and again point out, which we had a right to hope would diminish rather than increase; because it was certainly the expectation of Lord Cardwell, when he introduced the short service system, that if that system did nothing else, at least within a certain time—which must now have nearly elapsed—there would be a decrease in the Non-Effective Vote. But that has not taken place. On the contrary, it has gone on increasing, and has made a very sudden and extraordinary jump within the last three years. I should like to pass now to something more interesting than figures, and to touch upon the question of the age of recruits. Something has already been said upon that matter. For many years past I have wished, if possible, to get seasoned men of 20 years of age. I give the right hon. Gentleman great credit for having increased the minimum age to 19; but I must remind him of his promise last year, which he has renewed this year, that before long he would raise the minimum from 19 to 19½ years. I hope before long he may be able to raise it to 20 years. I would like to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that one recommendation of Lord Airey's Committee was that recruits should, if possible, be enlisted, for two reasons, at the age of 20—first, because they would be much better seasoned; and, second, because they would cost a great deal less than younger men. The Committee reported that every efficient Infantry soldier cost the country no less than £100, and every Cavalry soldier £96—that is to say, if the men are enlisted at 19; and they pointed out, also, that if the men enlisted at 20, an Infantry soldier would cost £58, and a Cavalry soldier £57—that is, nearly 50 per cent less. If these calculations of the Committee are correct, and by enlisting soldiers at 20 years of age 50 per cent of the cost would be saved, I cannot help thinking it would be better to offer some extra inducement, whether in the shape of pay or as extra bounty, in order to get better and more seasoned soldiers at a cheaper rate. I believe the right hon. Gentleman is most anxious to arrive at such a state of things; and what I wish to do, if I may use the words without offence, is to grease his wheels—that is to say, to give him every assistance in arriving at that result, which, I am sure, will be of great benefit to the Service and to the taxpayer. Then I would like to say something about the Militia. The reason why there has been a great falling-off in the Militia is that the Irish Militia have not been called out for the last two years. The result is that whereas we had in 1880 113,500 trained Militiamen, we have now only 87,000 trained Militiamen upon whom we can depend. We are thus deprived of 26,000 trained Militiamen upon whom we have a right to depend. I have no wish to enter into the political reasons for this reduction. This is not the time to do so. I only wish to point out that, so far as the strength of the Militia is concerned, it has been reduced by the number of 26,000 in consequence of the Irish Militia not having been called out during the last two years, and that is a very serious matter. And while I am upon this subject I should like to call attention to an expression made use of by the right hon. Gentleman in his speech, upon which he appeared to lay great stress at the time. The right hon. Gentleman was talking about the Militia

Artillery, and he said—"The Militia Artillery would become Royal." I did not quite understand what he meant by that—whether he meant that the Militia Artillery was to become Regular Artillery by becoming "Royal," or what, in fact, was the full force of the term "Royal." There have been reports abroad that not only the Militia, but the Volunteers are to be incorporated with the Regular Forces before long. If that is the case—and I appeal to the frankness and candour of the right hon. Gentleman to say whether it is so or not—I think we ought to have been told so earlier. We ought now to be distinctly informed whether there is an intention before long of incorporating the Militia with the Regular Forces, and that the incorporation will be extended bye-and-bye to the Volunteers. Such an expression as the official statement of the right hon. Gentleman that the Militia Artillery would become "Royal" certainly puzzled me at the time, and I shall be glad if the right hon. Gentleman will explain what the full force of the term is. I come next to a question which I do not think has been at all touched upon in the remarks which have been made by other hon. Gentlemen who have addressed the Committee. I do not think that any hon. Member has mentioned the fact that there is a proposition to reduce the number of regimental officers by something like 500. Now, the reduction of 500 regimental officers is a very serious matter. I used to hear it said, in my professional days, that we had not one officer too many. I am perfectly ready to admit that when we come to the Non-Effective Services it is quite possible to make a reduction; but, as far as the working regimental officers are concerned, I do not believe that there is one too many; and when I heard the statement that the right hon. Gentleman was going to reduce the regimental officers by 500 I did think that that was a very large number out of something like 5,000. I dare say that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to explain the matter. The right hon. Gentleman touched upon another question in regard to the regimental officers—namely, that it was his intention to abolish all extra subscriptions. I do not object to that. On the contrary, I am very glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman proposes to make regimental life as inexpensive as possible. There could be no greater boon to the regimental officers than to abolish those extra expenses of which they complain. I hear that there is also a proposition under consideration with regard to the furniture and mess property. If that question is under consideration, I must say it seems to me that there are a great many important matters now under consideration; and although, of course, I do not wish for one moment to ask precisely what are the instructions which have been given to these Committees, or to expect them to be laid upon the Table, yet there are certain ways of finding out, besides the rumours that are abroad, that great and serious changes are contemplated. I should, therefore, be very glad to know what the right hon. Gentleman can tell us upon these matters. There are three Committees sitting at this moment. There may be more; but there are certainly three sitting now—one on the very serious question of the retention of Chelsea and Kilmainham Hospitals; another sitting, I am told, on a question of the change of dress in the Army; and there have been rumours abroad that the old traditional red coat is to be done away with. That may, or may not, be so; but if there is any intention of the kind, I think the public and the House cannot be too soon informed. There have also been reports and rumours that may not be true; but they only show how very much excited the public mind is about these matters; and there have been so many changes in the Army that it is impossible to predict what other changes may not be in store. There have been rumours abroad that the patronage of the colonels of the Guards is to be done away with, and that they are no longer to appoint to first commissions. That may be, or may not be, true. I do not for a moment say that it is so; but I wish to point out, in regard to this and other matters, that when we find two or three Committees appointed to consider what may turn out to be very serious changes in the Army, and we have hints dropped here, and hints dropped there, and remarks made that certain services are to become "Royal," and so forth, it is impossible for us to know exactly where we are; and I am bound to say that the impression is gaining ground that revolutionary changes are in contemplation, and that, notwithstanding the changes which have taken place within the last 10 years, the Army is not yet to be allowed to rest. I must protest, in the name of the Army, against the course which has been pursued with regard to it. It has been practically turned inside out. Every grade, from the general down to the drummer boy, has had its pay, its retirement, its promotion, and its prospects considered in every possible way; and the result is that many of the older officers are now trembling in their shoes, not knowing what may come next. I put a Question only to-day with regard to the promotion of general and field officers under certain circumstances. No doubt the right hon. Gentleman understood perfectly well what the purport of that Question was. It is not my intention to go into the matter now; but I wish to say most distinctly that it only shows, at the present time, how much our officers are afraid that some change in their promotion may occur which they have not calculated on, and which may tend still further to disgust many of them with a Service in which it is of the greatest possible importance that they should be retained. And now I should like, with the permission of the Committee, to say one or two words on the subject of the guns. I dare say that we shall have to say something about it on Vote 12; but as I put a Question on this subject also some time ago, and as the right hon. Gentleman informed me there was little or no truth in the matter, I think it only right to say that, from inquiries I have been able to make, I have been told that, although, of course, the newspaper paragraph from which I obtained my original information was not strictly true, still there is a certain amount of truth in the statement. This is what appeared not very long ago with regard to the subject of the breech-loaders of the Woolwich pattern. It was stated—

"That about 27 of the guns were ordered of a particular contractor, and a similar order was given to the Royal Gun Factories. None of the latter have failed; indeed, the failure of a Government made gun has been a thing unknown for years past. Four or more of the contract guns are, however, reported to have failed at proof. Neither of them has burst, bursting being scarcely to be expected in guns of the coiled wrought iron type; but the coils have opened, which is much the same thing."

These were the observations made in regard to the contract guns, and the answer which I got from the right hon. Gentleman was that I was mistaken, and that the report which had appeared in the newspapers was not correct. Now I am informed that there has been a failure of some kind. [Mr. CHILDERS: I said something more.] I believe that the right hon. Gentleman did say something more; but I cannot give his exact words, as I have not got them with me. But I understood the right hon. Gentleman to say that I was not quite correct, or, at all events, that this paragraph was not quite correct, in what it stated. Now, this is a very serious matter. The question of the guns has been under consideration for something like three years. I recollect before the late Government left Office that the whole matter was thoroughly well considered; and it was thought that within a year, or at any rate within a limited time, we certainly should be able to obtain a gun which would not only pass every proof, but be an entirely effective gun. That limited time—whether it was a year or more—has long since passed. We still hear that the New Ordnance Committee is doing a great deal; but so it has been doing a great deal for some years, and as yet no positive conclusion has been come to, and it is becoming a serious matter for the interests of the country. I should like to know from the right hon. Gentleman if there is any chance of the Committee arriving at a conclusion within a reasonable time. We hear of foreign nations arming themselves with guns of powerful calibre; that their Navies are very much more powerful than our own; and that they are far better prepared with war material of all kinds than we are. It is, therefore, most necessary and most important that our Ordnance Committee, which I, for one, have every confidence in, should come to a speedy conclusion upon the matter. I know that this question will probably be brought on again when the Navy Estimates are before us; but it would be satisfactory if the right hon. Gentleman would inform the Committee what is now being done, and will further tell us when the Financial Report of the Ordnance Committee may be expected. I do not know that I have anything further to observe which I cannot reserve for the discussion of the other Votes; but I should be extremely glad if my right hon. Friend will add to what, if he will allow me to say, was his very businesslike and lucid statement some information on two or three matters which were somewhat lightly passed over. I think my right hon. Friend will admit that one or two questions were very lightly passed over and that other questions of the very highest importance have been handed over to the decision of Committees—questions which, if they are to be decided upon and carried into effect in future years without being first considered by the House and the public, will certainly occasion a good deal of alarm and disappointment. I will not trouble the Committee with any further remarks, but I hope that my right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for War will be able to give the Committee an explanation upon the various points to which his attention has been called.

SIR HARRY VERNEY said, in referring to the Institution which has been mentioned, Chelsea Hospital, he trusted that no efforts and no expense would be spared to add to the comfort of our soldiers. There were something like 85,000 old soldiers, almost all desiring admission there; and he should be glad to learn that they were placed in a condition of comfort and contentment. The noble Lord who had just spoken (Lord Eustace Cecil) had drawn attention to the fact that, at the present moment, there were various Committees sitting upon Army matters, one of which was engaged in an inquiry into the question of the dress of the Army. He confessed that, so far as his own opinion went, he thought a great deal might be done to improve the dress of the Army. Tight red coats were a most uncomfortable costume to march in, and an improvement in that respect was most desirable. He was also in favour of any plan by which a supply of furniture could be provided for married men which would diminish the amount of baggage which often accompanied a regiment on the march. The establishment of coffee shops in the different barracks had also been of great advantage to the soldiers, and, as he believed, very much appreciated by them. Indeed, he believed that few more valuable boons had ever been conferred upon the men; and he sincerely thanked his right hon. Friend the

Secretary of State for the steps he had taken in the matter. With regard to the condition of the Army, it was very well known that we had not got either too many men or too many officers. We had a very small Army indeed, for so important a country; and, so far as the officers were concerned, it must be borne in mind that they were becoming more and more instructed every year in the duties of their Profession, and were, consequently, rendered more valuable to the country. He was, therefore, very sorry to hear that there was any idea of reducing the number of officers. Our officers ought to be the best instructed in the world, and there was no difficulty in obtaining the best men, because there was a strong desire shown by numbers of the most intelligent classes in the country to enter the ranks of the Army. At the present moment we had not got one man too many; and he believed that it would be of great benefit to the country if the services of many officers who were now subject to retirement at an age when they were still able to do duty were retained. The last time that the House was engaged in a discussion of Army questions he had mentioned his extreme anxiety that something should be done to make better provision for the welfare of sick and wounded soldiers; and his right hon. Friend stated at the time that steps would be taken in that direction. He should be glad to learn what steps had been taken. He had himself moved for Returns with regard to the Army Hospital Corps which would show their present state of efficiency, and how far they had been doing their duty. There was one other subject which he desired to mention to his right hon. Friend, in which he had always taken a deep interest—namely, the superannuation of men at a time when they were not incapacitated from doing duty. In the present state of the Army, he felt that that was a very serious matter, and one in which the interests of the country were greatly concerned. He believed that, under the system now prevailing, the country, both in connection with the Army and Navy, had lost the services of officers who were in a perfect state of efficiency, and who ought to have been retained. As he had said already, they did not possess one man too many; and it was most desirable that so long as an officer was thoroughly efficient, and not incapacitated by old age or infirmity, he should be retained, and that when it became absolutely necessary that he should retire from the Service of the country he should receive a bonus. He believed that many perfectly efficient officers would prefer to continue in the Service rather than accept the pecuniary reward they received on leaving the Army. He was satisfied that if any means could be devised by his right hon. Friend and the Government by which they could retain for the Service of the country those officers of the Army and Navy who were thoroughly efficient and willing to remain very great advantage would be derived.

SIR HENRY FLETCHER said, that he entirely concurred in the observations which had been made a short time ago by the hon. and gallant Member for the County of Cork (Colonel Colthurst) with regard to old soldiers being allowed to re-engage after the short period of service. He thought they had been placed in a somewhat unfair position, because they enlisted in 1870 and 1871 under the supposition that they were to be allowed to re-engage. He therefore trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War would take into consideration the case of those men who were under the idea, when they enlisted, that they might continue to perform the full service for which they engaged. With regard to the remarks which had been made by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Ayrshire (Colonel Alexander) in reference to the Guards, he could substantiate all that his hon. and gallant Friend had said. Indeed, he was able to go still further, and to give even stronger reasons and figures than his hon. Friend had done in the matter. The senior subalterns in the Guards averaged now a little over 12 years' service, whereas the senior subalterns in the Line averaged only nine years' service; and he would venture to say that there was no prospect whatever of the junior subaltern officers in the Guards obtaining any kind of promotion for some time to come. The rule was that a major was to be retired at the end of seven years' service; but it must be borne in mind that there were very few officers of that rank who would retire during the next two or three years, and, further, that the Guards had a certain number of officers who would have to be absorbed before any promotion could take place. He believed he was correct in stating that in the Grenadier Guards there were five cases of senior officers who would have to be absorbed. No doubt he would be told that two of these officers had been retired within the last few weeks; but there would still remain three officers who would have to be absorbed. In the Coldstream Guards there were three officers still to be absorbed, and in the Scots Guards also three; but he admitted that one of these had only retired a very short time ago. He must also recall to the recollection of the Committee that, since the new Warrant had come out, there had hardly been one case of a senior officer having been retired from the Brigade of Guards since 1881; and he feared that the cases of retirement in future would be very rare. He did not wish for one moment to say anything against the regulations which the right hon. Gentleman had proposed and carried out for the senior officers of the Guards, because he thought that their retiring pensions and retiring allowances were very handsome indeed; but what he wished to bring before the Committee was the condition, and what would be the condition, of the subordinate and junior subalterns of the Brigade of Guards. They could not hope to obtain promotion for some time to come; and while the promotion was, as it were, in a state of abeyance, it must be borne in mind that there could be no fresh appointments for some time to come, while the matter remained in its present condition. He would now pass on to another point, because he believed that he was in Order in speaking upon the present Vote on Army matters generally. Having taken the greatest interest in all Army matters during the past year since the new Warrant came out, he thought he was justified in making a few remarks in regard to that Warrant, and the grievances which had been brought about by its promulgation. He would allude first to a grievance which he knew had already been brought under the notice of the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War, and which he (Sir Henry Fletcher) brought before the House some time ago—namely, the question of the retired purchase captains under the Warrants of 1877 and 1878. Last year he felt it his duty to call attention to the question of what he might term the existing purchase captains before the new Warrant of the 25th of June came into existence; and he felt bound to thank the right hon. Gentleman for having taken into consideration the matters which he had brought forward in connection with these officers. The right hon. Gentleman most kindly paid attention to all the arguments used on the occasion referred to, and most certainly the right hon. Gentleman had taken steps to promote the interests of the officers, and to benefit them to an extent which he (Sir Henry Fletcher) had hardly expected. But there was a case of another class of purchase officers which he had felt it his duty to bring before the Committee that evening—namely, the case of the purchase captains who were retired under the Warrants of 1877 and 1878. He was aware that it was a question of finance, and he must appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War to use his best endeavours with Her Majesty's Treasury, in order that he might induce them, if possible, to bestow justice upon these officers. He was perfectly aware that the matter did not rest entirely with the right hon. Gentleman as Secretary of State for War; but he hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would make an appeal to the Treasury, in order that he might obtain funds to apply to the benefit of these officers. They were retired under the Warrants of 1877 and 1878, and a Memorial had recently been forwarded to the right hon. Gentleman on their behalf for his consideration. He would not trouble the Committee with reading the words of the Memorial, because, no doubt, they would be in the recollection of the right hon. Gentleman. A reply was sent to the Memorial, stating that the application of these officers could not be considered; and, when the reply was received, he (Sir Henry Fletcher) was asked to make a further statement to the right hon. Gentleman. He did so, and he held in his hand the answer he had received, and which, he hoped, the Committee would allow him to read. It was dated the 11th of February, 1882—Financial Secretary's Department, War Office—and it said—

“Sir,—I am directed to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 29th ult., forwarding a letter and copy of Memorial from purchase captains retired on pensions prior to the issue of the Royal Warrant of the 25th of June 1881, and to inform you, in reply, that the Secretary of State for War is unable to give retrospective effect in the cases of officers who voluntarily retired."

In connection with that reply of the Secretary of State for War, he humbly begged leave to state that the officers whose cause he was advocating did not voluntarily retire. There were, no doubt, some officers, and perhaps many officers, who did voluntarily retire under the Warrant of 1877 and 1878; but the case of the officers whose cause he was advocating was this. They were under the Warrant; but they had arrived at the age of 45, at which the Warrant stated they should retire; and it was impressed upon them that they would not receive promotion from the rank of captain to that of major on account of age; and they were told that if they remained in the Service they would be superseded by junior officers, who would be passed over their heads. What he maintained was, that when an officer was placed in such a position he had no alternative left him but to retire. It might be said that this was voluntary retirement; but he maintained that it was not voluntary retirement in the ordinary sense. When an officer was placed in that peculiar position, and told that his juniors would be passed over his head, he had, in his (Sir Henry Fletcher's) opinion, no other course open to him than to ask to be allowed to leave the Service. He would now quote the cases of some officers, each of 25 or 26 years' service, which appeared to him to be most prominent, and should be happy to furnish the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War with the list, which he held in his hand. The officers whose cases he selected did not form the whole number of those retired under the Warrant; but he thought they would be sufficient to convince the Committee that the class in question had not been quite fairly dealt with. In giving the details he should have no hesitation in mentioning the names of the officers to whom he particularly referred, inasmuch as they were public property. Lieutenant Colonel Beasley served 29 years—19 years as captain; he passed through the Staff College; served on the Staff; obtained extra first-class certificate in musketry; passed the highest examination in Hindostanee, and qualified himself in every way for command when senior captain of his regiment. A junior officer, however, was put over his head; and he felt, under the circumstances, that no other course was open to him but to retire, which he did, on a pension of £280 a-year. The next officer to whose case he would ask the attention of the Committee was Lieutenant Colonel Rawlins, of 26 years' service—19 years as captain; he was officially informed that he would be superseded if he remained in his regiment, and retired in consequence on a pension of £259 a-year. Had this officer served five months longer, he would have retired under the Warrant—of which he received no notice—on £300 a-year. The next case was that of Lieutenant Colonel Clark, of the 50th Foot, who was informed, from the Horse Guards, that he had become ineligible for regimental promotion on account of age, and was, therefore, compelled to retire on a pension of less than £300 a-year. He contended that if these three officers had been allowed to remain in the Service, they would, under this new Warrant, have obtained the maximum pension of £300, instead of the amounts he had named. Therefore, he appealed to the right hon. Gentleman to use his influence, if possible, with the Treasury, in order that a certain number of officers—not the whole, as he said before, of those who retired under the Warrant—who had retired on pensions varying from £259 to £280 per annum, might be allowed to take the benefit of the new Warrant. He thought the cases he had referred to deserved more consideration, because, although the right hon. Gentleman had said, in answer to a Question put by him upon the subject, that they could not be further considered, inasmuch as the officers in question had received a step of honorary rank, he (Sir Henry Fletcher) wished to point out that purchase captains, under the Warrant of 1881, received two steps in rank, which these officers did not. If the right hon. Gentleman would reconsider these cases, he would, undoubtedly, receive the thanks of a most deserving body of officers, who, for a considerable number of years, had served their Queen and country with credit. He would now turn to another subject that had been before the House during the present Session of Parliament and on previous occasions. The new Warrant of the Secretary of State for War was issued last June, and he had certainly been led to understand that brevet promotion was to be abolished. But since that time a corrigenda Warrant had been issued, under which the right hon. Gentleman had again introduced brevet promotion, and that simply for corps of Royal Artillery and Engineers. He pointed out to the Committee that by this unexpected system of brevet promotion a certain number of majors of Line regiments had been superseded and their interests materially prejudiced. The officers in question were men who had served with the rank of major for more than seven years, most or many of them having received their proper rank for services in the field. By the Return which he held in his hand it appeared that the average length of service of these 20 majors was 27 years; that three of them had been wounded severely; that the number of medals possessed by them was 34; that nine of them were promoted for distinguished service, and that eight of them were mentioned in despatches. Notwithstanding these facts, the officers in question had, by the corrigenda Warrant and the brevet of last October, been passed over by 75 officers of the Ordnance Corps of Royal Artillery and Engineers, and it was only natural that they should feel aggrieved in consequence. It might be said that a precedent would be created if these officers were placed in a position of seniority to the officers of the Royal Artillery and Engineers; but he could safely say that there were only seven Line majors on the Active List who could be superseded before the year 1886, and many of these would probably receive regimental rank before that time. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would endeavour to do justice to these aggrieved officers. He would now briefly allude to a subject which was touched upon by the right hon. Gentleman in the Statement made by him a few weeks ago, and which had also been referred to by an hon. Member opposite—namely, the mess and furniture of officers of the Army. This question had been specially dwelt upon by previous Secretaries of State for War, and it was one which required great consideration. In the first place, the right hon. Gentleman proposed that the officers' mess should be limited to the sum of 4s. per diem. Now, as an old soldier of the Line, and one who had for many years kept up his connection with his brother officers, he ventured to think that this arrangement would interfere very much with the social life of officers in Her Majesty's Service. Further, he would like very much to know from the right hon. Gentleman how it was proposed to carry out a plan by which an officer should be able to get his three meals a-day for the sum of 4s.? Was it intended that the Government should find sergeant caterers or mess-sergeants, or were the officers of the regiment to seek out some person who would undertake to mess them at the rate of 4s. a-day? He ventured to say it was impossible for any private person to provide for the officers at that rate; and if it was to be dependent on the officers to select a sergeant from their own regiment to do it, a considerable portion of their time would be spent in endeavouring to carry out the necessary arrangements. He did not for one moment wish to see extravagant messes in the Service; but he thought that this laying down of a hard-and-fast line of 4s. a-day, which was not to be exceeded, would greatly interfere with the social life of officers, and would have the effect of driving men away from the regimental mess to hotels and other places where they could meet with better accommodation. He remembered that 28 years ago, when he was in a Line regiment—a four-company dépôt, which he was sorry at that moment was not in favour with the right hon. Gentleman—a squadron of Cavalry was stationed near them, and even their four-company mess was not considered good enough for the Cavalry officers, who would not condescend to dine there, and went to various hotels in the neighbourhood. On the whole, he felt sure that the officers of regiments would not like to have their social affairs interfered with in the manner proposed. In connection with this subject there was another matter to which he would refer. Was it the intention of the right hon. Gentleman to dispose of, or take over, the regimental plate, which was the property of the officers of various regiments? How were the knives, forks, spoons, centre pieces, and goblets, the presents from old officers who had served in the regiment, and the collection, perhaps, of 100 years—how were these to be disposed of in view of the right hon. Gentleman's arrangements for diminishing the expense of transport? If it was intended to take over all the plate from the officers at a certain price, he thought they were clearly entitled to information on this head, or sufficient notice to enable them to make their own arrangements, if an answer to this inquiry could not be given at once. There was another matter to which he would call the attention of the Committee—namely, the present position of colour sergeants transferred to the Volunteers. A Question had been asked in the House upon this subject last year; but no reply, as far as he was aware, had been given to it. Previous to last year colour sergeants of the Army were transferred to the Volunteers under certain regulations. They had to revert to the rank of sergeant in order to become sergeant instructors and to serve out their Army engagements. At the time they were transferred the rate of pension was the same for colour sergeants and sergeants; but by the new Warrant brought out by the right hon. Gentleman an additional 3*d.* per day was granted to colour sergeants. Therefore, as he understood the matter, the colour sergeants who were transferred to the Volunteers before the year 1881 would be losers of 3*d.* a-day. He maintained that this amount of 3*d.* a-day should be extended to the colour sergeants now serving as instructors with the Volunteers under their Army engagements; and he could not but think that their exclusion was due to an omission on the part of certain officials at the War Office. The matter being one of great importance to sergeants in the Army, he trusted the right hon. Gentleman would be able to say that it should be inquired into. He agreed with the hon. and gallant Member for Berkshire (Sir Robert Loyd Lindsay) that the Home battalions of the territorial regiments were mere shadows under the present system. The Home battalion now consisted of 420 men; but it was quite impossible for the commanding officer to get anything like that number on parade. After a regiment came home from foreign service it consisted simply of a number of recruits, and for years it was nothing else than a travelling dépôt, the commanding officer having the greatest difficulty in getting 200 men to appear on parade by turning out servants, tailors, cooks, and others. He maintained that, under the present system, it was impossible to make the Home battalions for the first few years of Home service efficient or ready for any emergency. It might be said that they were not required to be kept ready for any emergency; but they had seen, during the last few months, that battalions which had come home from foreign service had been sent to Ireland, and that might occur for some time to come. He therefore urged upon the right hon. Gentleman that every inducement should be held out, and every method devised, in order to enable officers commanding Home battalions to get as many men together, and as much drill out of them, as possible. He was unable to see why men, when they enlisted as soldiers, should be compelled to spend so much time in attending school and gymnasium, which took them away from their military duties. As a matter of fact, recruits were overworked, and were disgusted with having to go back to school. Commanding officers were unable to get their men together, and the consequence was that they had no opportunity of instructing their young officers in drill and other matters connected with their business. He would urge that the attendance at school and at the gymnasium should be limited as much as possible, especially as the soldier was now only allowed to remain a few years in the Service. In his opinion, those few years should be devoted entirely to instructing the soldier in the duties of his Profession. Again, he desired to call attention to the practice of employing men as clerks and otherwise in general offices. When a regiment arrived where there was a general office, the commanding officer was applied to for men to fill clerkships and other subordinate offices connected with it. He considered this objectionable, because it was desirable that every available man should be at the disposal of the commanding officer for military purposes; and he thought that the staff of clerks and others should be formed and supplied by pensioners and Army Service men. Finally, he would refer to fraudulent enlistment, which the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for War said, on a former occasion, was a most difficult matter to counteract; but added that for this offence the House of Commons would not for one moment tolerate branding. He (Sir Henry Fletcher) submitted that the word "branding" ought never to be used in connection with this subject. There were certain ways of marking a man without branding that would enable him to be identified as having previously served in Her Majesty's Forces; and as fraudulent enlistment was one of the great evils to which the Army was at present exposed, he trusted that the authorities at the War Office would use their best endeavours to cope with a grievance that tended so much to the detriment of Her Majesty's Service.

MR. SEELY (Nottingham) asked for information as to the proportion which the Artillery bore to the other branches of the Service. He understood that the usual proportion of Artillery in European Armies was three guns to 1,000 men. The 300 guns which we had were, therefore, in correct proportion to the Regular Army of the country; but it must be borne in mind that the Government were forming a Reserve of between 40,000 and 50,000 men, which would increase the number of guns that we ought to have at our disposal to 450. Again, there were the Militia and Volunteers to be taken into account, which brought up the Forces of the country to something like 450,000 or 500,000 men, the requisite number of guns for which force would be 1,200 or 1,500. But, instead of that number, it appeared that we had only 300 guns; and, therefore, he asked the right hon. Gentleman to state what he considered ought to be the proportion of Field Artillery to the other Forces of the country?

COLONEL WALROND said, he understood that the territorial regiments were established for the purpose of enlisting in them men belonging to the same part of the country. But he was also informed that, supposing a Devonshire man came to the London dépôt for the purpose of enlistment, although the authorities could send him to Scotland, they could not send him down to Devonshire—he would have to go there at his own expense. He believed this question was one which might be fairly considered by the right hon. Gentleman. He was glad to see that it was proposed to add £10,000 to the sum assigned for Volunteer camps, which there could be no doubt were amongst the best means for increasing the efficiency of the Volunteer Forces. Still, there were other matters in connection with this subject that he might be excused for alluding to. The right hon. Gentleman had invited 15,000 Volunteers to assemble at Aldershot, to take part in the Autumn Manœuvres, which, he believed, extended over a period of three days. It appeared that the Volunteers were to pay their expenses to Aldershot, but that they were to receive 4s. a-day after arrival. He therefore asked the right hon. Gentleman whether the three days over which the Manœuvres extended would be distinct from the eight days which it had been the custom to assign to the Volunteers during the month of August? He suggested that it would be far easier and cheaper in the long run if the counties of Devon, Cornwall, and Somerset had a brigade camp within easy distance of Plymouth, at which the Volunteers of those counties could assemble, under the command of officers from the garrison, the same privileges being granted to them as at Aldershot. This arrangement, he believed, would be productive of the best results, and he commended it to the consideration of the right hon. Gentleman. In his own county four battalions of Volunteers went out under canvas, within a fortnight of each other; and he believed that, with a little arrangement, they might be able to get all the four regiments under canvas at the same time. If they could do this it would be an immense boon, not alone to the men, but to the officers also. The five commanding officers in Devonshire—of whom he was one—had no chance whatever of taking part in brigade drill. He had been trying hard to get up a brigade drill for Whit Monday; but he was met by the excuse from the other battalions that the expense would be too great. He was aware that the battalions situate in and near London had great advantages in this matter; and he should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Childers) could see his way to making a grant, in order that other battalions might have opportunities of rendering themselves efficient in this drill. The efficiency of the Volunteer Force would be greatly increased thereby. He should like to say a word as to the arming of the

Volunteers. It was with great satisfaction he had learnt that an additional issue of Martini-Henry rifles was to be made to the Force. They were to have 4,500 distributed to them this year, in addition to the 3,000 they had already, for purposes of match shooting. He should be glad if the right hon. Gentleman could at once see his way to arming the whole Force with this weapon. At any rate, he believed the time was not far distant when they would have it. Perhaps, after what had taken place in regard to the Militia, they might look forward to having it served out to them next year. It would be a good opportunity then for the right hon. Gentleman to carry out the scheme he foreshadowed in his speech, of making the efficiency of the Volunteers depend more on their efficiency as marksmen than on their efficiency in drill. There might not be the same number of efficient in every regiment; but it would give an additional inducement to the officers to look after the shooting, if efficiency more largely depended on it. But it must be borne in mind that it would open a very wide field for dishonesty, especially where canvas targets were used. It was well known that even in the Standing Army, where no money was at stake, men were sometimes passed through their third class when they really had not obtained the requisite number of points. More care, particularly where sums of money depended on it, should be exercised in providing safeguards to prevent "chizeling"—if he might be allowed to use the expression—by the markers at the butts. A great deal had been said about the shooting of the Force during the past 12 months, it having been brought prominently before the mind of the public by the disasters which had been met with in South Africa. Well, he should be glad to see more practice in field firing given to the Volunteers. So far as he and his men were concerned, they were rather fortunately situated in Devonshire, inasmuch as they were within easy reach of a range where they could practice field firing. The officer who superintended the range at Oakehampton had invited them down to shoot last year, and after the practice had expressed himself well satisfied with the result. They had been obliged to go down at their own expense, and he believed that if some pecuniary assistance were given to the men by the State a great many more would, on another occasion, be induced to take part in the work. Some hon. Members had alluded to the Army firing, and to the Committee sitting to consider the question. All he had to say about that was that he should be very glad indeed if every commanding officer had an unlimited supply of ammunition at his command, for this would tend to encourage practice in shooting. The expense would not be very great—he should think £100,000 a-year would cover it—and, of course it would increase the efficiency of the men enormously. He should like to say one word with regard to uniforms. At the present moment the Volunteers wore uniforms of three shades—namely, red, green, and grey; and, so far as he understood it, it was optional with each regiment what colour it should wear. There had been rumours that the Government intended to issue an Order requiring all Volunteer regiments to adopt one colour; and as these rumours had not been contradicted, and tended very much to prevent officers from joining the Force, he should like the right hon. Gentleman to say whether or not any Order was to be issued on the subject. At present the regiment he belonged to wore a green uniform, and the fear that an Order might come down at any moment requiring them to wear red restrained gentlemen from accepting commissions, as, if such an Order did come down, the amount they had expended on their green uniforms would have been thrown away. There was an element of uncertainty about the matter which it would be advantageous for the right hon. Gentleman to dispel, seeing that Volunteer officers were very much wanted. He had been asked to say a word respecting an Order issued not very long ago respecting adjutants of the Volunteer Force being detailed for duty in their regimental districts. He was right, he believed, in saying that an Order was issued stating that Volunteer adjutants might be detailed for garrison duty in their regimental districts. This operated very hardly sometimes where the place to which the adjutant was called was a long way from the town in which he was located. The right hon. Gentleman had allowed the officers of the Auxiliary Forces to render themselves proficient in tactics; and he was informed that his
